tempt and ridicule—this was one of the ἀσθένειαι. He now comes to another: but that other inseparably connected with, and forming the sequel of, a glorious revelation vouchsafed him by the Lord. This therefore he relates, at the same time repudiating it as connected with himself, and fixing attention only on the ἀσθένεια which followed it. 1.] (I have in recent editions suspended the very difficult question of this reading, not finding it possible to decide whether of the two deserves a place in the text. Meantime, the rec. is left in, and on it the following note is written.) Let only the two readings καυχᾶσθαι δὴ οὐ συμφέρει μοι, ἐλεύσομαι γάρ, and καυχᾶσθαι δεῖ, οὐ συμφέρον μέν· ἐλεύσομαι δέ, be compared, and it would certainly seem as if the former more resembled the nervous elliptic irony of the great Apostle, and the latter the tame conventional propriety of the grammatical correctors. The other variations, δέ for δή, and the prefixing of εἰ, are too palpable emendations to require critical treatment. The difficulty however is considerably lessened, when the right connexion is borne in mind. To boast, verily, is not to my advantage: for (i. e. it will be shewn to be so, by the following fact of a correction administered to me ἵνα μὴ ὑπεραίρωμαι) (on the other reading, I must boast, though it is not to my advantage: but) I will proceed to visions and revelations of the Lord. δή in this sense implies a consciousness of a reason why the assertion is true, and is therefore naturally followed by γάρ, if the sentence is completed. The same sense is found in Plato, Phæd. p. 60, ὦ Σώκρατες, δοκοῦσί μοι νῦν οἱ ἐπιτήδειοι, καὶ σὺ τοῦτο, — the completion of the sense being,—'for you are to die to-night:'—πολλοὶ κακῶς πράσσουσιν, οὐ σὺ δὴ μόνος, Eur. Hec. 464: i. e. οὐ σὺ δὴ μόνος κακῶς πράσσεις, πολλοὶ γὰρ ἄλλοι . . . . (See Hartung, Partikellehre i. 270, who however explains δή in these examples somewhat differently.) The force of it here then, is: "I am well aware that to boast is not good for me: for I will come to an instance in which it was so shewn to me." εἰς ὀπτ. κ. ἀπ. κυρ.] q. d. 'and the instances I will select are just of that kind in which, if boasting ever were good, it might be allowed:' thus the γάρ gives a more complete proof. ὀπτασία is the form or manner of receiving ἀποκάλυψις, the revelation. There can hardly be an ὀπτασία without an ἀποκάλυψις of some kind. Therefore Theophylact's distinction is scarcely correct, ἡ ἀποκάλυψις πλέον τι ἔχει τῆς ὀπτασίας· ἡ μὲν γὰρ μόνον βλέπειν δίδωσιν· αὕτη δὲ καί τι βαθύτερον τοῦ ὁρωμένου ἀπογυμνοῖ. κυρίου, gen. subj., vouchsafed me by the Lord,—not obj., 'of [i. e. revealing] the Lord' [as the subject of the vision], for such is not that which follows. No particular polemical reason, as the practice of particular parties at Corinth to allege visions, &c. (Baur), need be sought for the narration of this vision: Paul's object is general, and the means taken to attain it are simply subordinate to it, viz. the vindication of his apostolic character. 2—4.] An example of such a vision and revelation. The adoption of the third person is remarkable: it being evident from ver. 7 that he himself is meant. It is plain that a contrast is intended between the rapt and glorified person of vv. 2, 4,—and himself, the weak and afflicted and almost despairing subject of the σκόλοψ τῇ σαρκί of vv. 7 ff. Such glory belonged not to him, but the weakness did. Nay, so far was the glory from being his, that he knew not whether he was in or out of the body when it was put upon him: so that the ἐγὼ αὐτός, compounded of the νοῦς and σάρξ (Rom. vii. 25), clearly was not the subject of it, but as it were another form of his personality, analogous to that which we shall assume when unclothed of the body.

It may be remarked in passing, as has been done by Whitby, that the Apostle here by implication acknowledges the possibility of consciousness and receptivity in a disembodied state. Let it not be forgotten, that in the context, this vision is introduced not so much for the purpose of making it a ground of boasting, which he does only passingly and under protest, but that he may by it introduce the mention of the σκόλοψ τῇ σαρκί, which bore so conspicuous a part in his ἀσθένειαι, TO BOAST OF WHICH is his present object.

2.] I know (not, 'knew,' as E. V.: which [is a mistake in grammar, and] introduces serious confusion, making it seem as if the πρὸ ἐτῶν δεκατ. were the date of the knowledge, not, as it really is, of the vision) a man in Christ (ἐν χρ. belongs to ἄνθρ., not to οἶδα, as Beza; ἄνθ. ἐν χρ.=

'a Christian,' 'a man whose standing is in Christ:' so οἱ καὶ πρὸ ἐμοῦ γέγοναν ἐν χριστῷ, Rom. xvi. 7),—fourteen years ago (belongs not to οἶδα, nor to ἐν χρ. as Grot.: 'hominem talem, qui per 14 annos Christo serviat;'—but to ἁρπαγέντα. On the idiom see reff.,—the date probably refers back to the time when he was at Tarsus waiting for God to point out his work, between Acts ix. 30 and xi. 25. See the chronological table in the Prolegomena), whether in the body, I know not, or out of the body, I know not: God knoweth (if in the body, the idea would be that he was taken up bodily: if out of the body, to which the alternative manifestly inclines,—that his spirit was rapt from the body, and taken up disembodied. Aug. de genesi ad litteram xii. 2—5 (3—14), vol. iii. pp. 455 ff., discusses the matter at length, and concludes thus,—'Proinde quod vidit raptus usque in tertium cœlum, quod etiam se scire confirmat, proprie vidit, non imaginaliter. Sed quia ipsa a corpore alienata utrum omnino mortuum corpus reliquerit, an secundum modum quendam viventis corporis ibi anima fuerit, sed mens ejus ad videnda vel audienda ineffabilia illius visionis arrepta sit, hoc incertum erat,—ideo forsitan dixit, "sive in corpore sive extra corpus, nescio, Deus scit."' And similarly Thom. Aq. and Estius: not, as Meyer thinks, making the alternative consist between reality and a mere vision, but between the anima, the life, being rapt out of the body, leaving it dead, and the mens, the intelligence or spirit, being rapt out of the body, leaving it 'secundum modum quendam vivens'); such an one (so τὸν τοιοῦτον resumes after a parenthesis, 1 Cor. v. 5), rapt (snatched or taken up, reff.) as far as the third heaven. What is the third heaven? The Jews knew no such number, but commonly (not universally: Rabbi Judah said, "Duo sunt cœli, Deut. x. 14") recognized seven heavens: and if their arrangement is to be followed, the third heaven will be very low in the celestial scale, being only the material clouds. That the threefold division into the air (nubiferum), the sky (astriferum), and the heaven (angeliferum), was in use among the Jews, Meyer regards as a fiction of Grotius. Certainly no Rabbinical authority is given for such a statement: but it is put forward confidently by Grotius, and since his time adopted without enquiry by many Commentators. It is uncertain whether the sevenfold division prevailed so early as the Apostle's time: and at all events, as we must not invent Jewish divisions which never existed, so it seems rash to apply here, one about whose date we are not certain, and which does not suit the context:—for to be rapt only to the clouds, even supposing ver. 4 to relate a further assumption, would hardly be thus solemnly introduced, or the preposition ἕως used. The safest explanation therefore is, not to follow any fixed division, but judging by the evident intention of the expression, to understand a high degree of celestial exaltation. I cannot see any cogency in Meyer's argument, that 'the third heaven must have been an idea well known and previously defined among his readers,' seeing that in such words as τρὶς μακάριος, &c. it is manifestly inapplicable.

3, 4.] A solemn repetition of the foregoing, with the additional particular of his having had unspeakable revelations made to him. Some, as Clem. Strom. v. 12 (80), p. 693 P., Ireu. ii. 30. 7, p. 162, Athan. Apol. 20, vol. i. p. 263, Orig. (or his interpreter) on Rom. xvi. lib. x. 43, vol. iv. p. 688, Œcum., al., think that this was a fresh assumption, ἕως τρίτου οὐρανοῦ κἀκεῖθεν εἰς τὸν παράδεισον, and with these Meyer agrees: but surely had this been intended, some intimation would have been given of it, either by καί, or by placing εἰς τὸν παράδεισον (as the stress would be then no longer on the fact ἁρπαγῆναι as before, but on the new place to which ἡρπάγη) in the place of emphasis before ἡρπάγη;—or, by both combined,—ὅτι καὶ εἰς τὸν παράδεισον ἡρπάγη. with the verb preceding in both clauses, and therefore no prominence given to the places as distinguished from one another, I must hold ἕως τρίτου οὐρ. to be at least so far equivalent to εἰς τὸν παράδεισον, as to be a general local description of the situation in which ὁ παράδεισος is found. The repetition of εἴτε . . . . οἶδεν is equally accountable on either explanation, being made for solemnity and emphasis. The παράδεισος cannot here be the Jewish Paradise, the blissful division or side of Hades (Scheol), where the spirits of the just awaited the resurrection, see note on Luke xvi. 22,—but the Paradise of which our Lord spoke on the Cross,—the place of happiness into which He at His Death introduced the spirits of the just: see on ref. Luke. ἄρρητα ῥήματα, i. e. as explained below, words which it is not lawful to utter:—as Vulg., "arcana verba, quæ non licet homini loqui." The interpretation, "quæ dici nequeunt," as Beza, Estius, Calov., Olsh., al., is hardly consistent with the narrative; for in that case, as Bengel remarks, 'Paulus non potuisset audire.' The passages adduced by Wetst. mostly refer to the mysteries, or some secret rites: e. g. Demosth. contra Neæram, p. 1369, αὕτη ἡ γυνὴ ὑμῖν ἦλθε τὰ ἄῤῥητα ἱερὰ ὑπὲρ τῆς πόλεως, καὶ εἶδεν, ἃ οὐ προσῆκεν αὐτὴν ὁρᾶν ξένην οὖσαν. ἃ οὐκ ἐξόν] which it is not lawful for a MAN to utter (see above):—imparted by God, but not to be divulged to others: and therefore, in this case, intended, we may presume, for the Apostle's own consolation and encouragement. Of what kind they were, or by whom uttered, we have no hint given, and it were worse than trifling to conjecture. "Sublimitatis certe magnæ fuere: nam non omnia cœlestia sunt ineffabilia, v. gr. Ex. xxxiv. 6, Isa. vi. 3, quæ tamen valde sublimia." Bengel. 5.] Of such a man he will boast, but not (see above on ver. 1) of himself, except it be in his infirmities. τοῦ τοιούτου must be masc. as before, not neuter, as Luth., al., take it. This is shewn by ὑπέρ, used of the person respecting whom (reff.), whereas ἐν is said of the thing on account of which, a man boasts. He strikes here again the keynote of the whole—boasting in his infirmities. He will boast of such a person, so favoured, so exalted; but this merely by the way: it is not his subject: it was introduced, not indeed without reference to the main point, but principally to bring in the infirmity following. 6.] For (supply the sentence for which γάρ renders a reason: 'Not but that I might boast concerning myself if I would')—if I shall wish to boast (ὑπὲρ ἐμαυτοῦ), I shall not be a fool (I shall not act rashly or imprudently, for I shall not boast without solid ground for it): for I shall speak the truth:—but I abstain (reff.), that no one may reckon of me (reff. and add εἰς μαλακίαν σκέπτων, Demosth. 308. 18) beyond (by a standard superior to that furnished by) what he sees me (to be), or hears (if τι form part of the text, or hears any thing: a pleonastic construction = ἢ εἴ τι ἀκούει) from me. Lest he should seem to undervalue so legitimate a subject of boasting, he alleges the reason why he abstains: not that he had not this and more such exaltations, truly to allege: but because he wished to be judged of by what they really had seen and heard of and from himself in person. 7—10.] He now comes to that for which the foregoing was mainly alleged: the infirmity in his flesh, which above others hindered his personal efficiency in the apostolic ministry. 7.] And that I might not, by the abundant excess of revelations (made to me), be uplifted (the order of the words is chosen to bring τῇ ὑπερβ. κ.τ.λ into the place of foremost emphasis: see reff. The διό can hardly stand with the present punctuation. If it forms part of the text, it must begin the sentence, and we must with Lachmann join καὶ τῇ ὑπερβ. τῶν ἀποκ. to the foregoing, as in apposition with ἀσθενείαις. But thus a very strange sense would be given), there was given me ('by God:' certainly not, as Meyer, al., by Satan, of whom such an expression as ἐδόθη would surely hardly be used: cf. ἡ χάρις ἡ δοθεῖσά μοι, so often said by the Apostle,—Rom. xii. 3, 6; xv. 15 al., and the absolute use of ἐδόθη for bestowed, portioned out by God, 1 Cor. xi. 15; xii. 7, 8; Gal. iii. 21; James i. 5) a thorn (the word may signify a stake, or sharp pointed staff, ξύλον ὀξύ, Hesych.,—so in Hom. Il. σ. 176, κεφαλὴν . . . πῆξαι ἀνὰ σκολόπεσσι; but in the LXX, reff, it is 'a thorn,' and such is the more likely meaning here. Meyer cites from Artemid. iii. 33, ἄκανθαι καὶ σκόλοπες ὀδύνας σημαίνουσι διὰ τὸ ὀξύ (compare ref. Ezek., σκόλοψ πικρίας καὶ ἄκανθα ὀδύνης). See however Stanley's note, who rejects the meaning 'thorn,' and supposes the figure to refer to the punishment of impalement) in my flesh (the expression used Gal. iv. 14 of this same affliction, τὸν πειρασμὸν ὑμῶν ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου, seems decisive for rendering the dative thus, and not as a dativus incommodi: see also ref. 1 Cor.), the (or an) angel of Satan (even if we read σατᾶν, it can only be the genitive. If taken as the nom., the expression would mean either, a hostile angel, which would be contrary to the universal usage of Satan, as a proper name: or, the angel Satan, which is equally inconsistent with N. T. usage, according to which Satan, though once an angel, is now ἄρχων τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ ἀέρος, Eph. ii. 2, and has his own angels, Matt. xxv. 41), that he (the angel of Satan,—not the σκόλοψ, which would be an unnecessary confusion of metaphors. 'The continuation of a discourse often belongs to the word in apposition, not to the main subject,' Meyer) may buffet me (κολαφίζῃ is best thus expressed, in the present. The aorist would denote merely one such act of insult. Thus Chrys.: . . ὥστε . . διηνεκοῦς δεῖσθαι τοῦ χαλινοῦ· οὐ γὰρ εἶπεν, Ἵνα κολαφίσῃ, ἀλλ' Ἵνα κολαφίζῃ,—Theophyl., οὐχ Ἵνα ἅπαξ με κολαφίσῃ, ἀλλ' ἀεί,—and similarly Œcum.), that I may not be uplifted (the repetition gives force and solemnity,—expressing his firm persuasion of the divine intention in thus afflicting him). As regards the thorn itself, very many, and some very absurd conjectures have been hazarded. They may be resolved into three heads, the two former of which are, from the nature of the case, out of the question (see below): (1) that Paul alludes to spiritual solicitations of the devil ('injectiones Satanæ'), who suggested to him blasphemous thoughts,—so Gerson, Luther (how characteristically!), Calov.,—or remorse for his former life, so Osiander, Mosheim, &c.: or according to the Romanist interpreters, who want to find here a precedent for their monkish stories of temptations,—incitements to lust,—so Thom. Aq., Lyra, Bellarmin, Estius, Corn.-a-Lapide, al. (2) that he alludes to opposition from his adversaries, or some one adversary κατ' ἐξοχήν; so many ancient Commentators, Chrys., Theophyl., Œcum., Theodoret,—Calvin, Beza, al., and more recently, Fritzsche, and Schrader. (3) that he points to some grievous bodily pain, which has been curiously specified by different Commentators. The ancients (Chrys., Theophyl., Œcum., Jerome on Gal. iv. 14 (lib. ii. 4, vol. vii. p. 460)) mention κεφαλαλγία: some have supposed hypochondriac melancholy, which however hardly answers the conditions of a σκόλοψ, in which acute pain seems to be implied; alii aliter, see Pool, Synops. ad loc.; and Stanley's note, which is important in other respects also, and full of interest. On the whole, putting together the figure here used, that of a thorn, occasioning pain, and the κολαφισμός, buffeting or putting to shame, it seems quite necessary to infer that the Apostle alludes to some painful and tedious bodily malady, which at the same time put him to shame before those among whom he exercised his ministry. Of such a kind may have been the disorder in his eyes, more or less indicated in several passages of his history and Epistles (see notes on Acts xiii. 9; xxiii. 1 f.:—and Gal. iv. 14 (15 ?); vi. 11 (?)). But it may also have been something besides this, and to such an inference probability would lead us; disorders in the eyes, however sad in their consequences, not being usually of a very painful or distressing nature in themselves. 8.] In respect of this (angel of Satan, not σκόλοψ, see below) I thrice (τρίς, not indefinite as Chrys., Hom. xxvi. p. 621, τουτέστι, πολλάκις. The poverty of our language in the finer distinctions of the tenses often obliges us to render inaccurately, and fall short of, the wonderful language with which we have to deal. How this was said, whether accompanied by an appearance of Christ to him or not, must remain in obscurity), My grace (not,—'My favour generally;'—'My imparted grace') is sufficient for thee (ἀρκεῖ, spoken from the divine omniscience, 'suffices, and shall suffice:' q. d. 'the trial must endure, untaken away: but the grace shall also endure, and never fail thee'), for (the reason lying in My ways being not as man's ways, My Power not being brought to perfection as man's power is conceived to be) (My) Power is made perfect (has its full energy and complete manifestation) in (as the element in which it acts as observable by man) weakness. See ch. iv. 7, and 1 Cor. ii. 3, 4,—where the influence of this divine response on the Apostle, is very manifest. If I mistake not, the expression τῆς δυνάμεως, there, favours the omission of μου here, as in our text, and makes it probable that it was inserted for perspicuity's sake, and to answer to ἡ δύν. τοῦ χρ. below. Most gladly therefore will I rather (than that my affliction should be removed from me, which before that response, I wished) boast (καυχ. is in the emphatic place,—I will rather boast in mine infirmities. Had μᾶλλον signified 'rather than in revelations,' or 'rather than in any thing else,' it would have been μᾶλλον ἐν ταῖς ἀσθενείαις μου καυχήσομαι) in my infirmities, that (by my ἀσθένειαι being not removed from me, but becoming my glory) the Power of Christ may have its residence in me (see ref. Polyb.—'may carry on in me its work unto completion,' as above). 10.] Wherefore (because of this relation to human weakness and divine power) I am well content [cf. the same expression Matt. iii. 17] in infirmities (four kinds of which are then specified,—all coming also, as well as ἀσθ. proper,

Wetst. quotes from Philo, Vita Mosis, i. 13, vol. ii. p. 92, μὴ ἀναπίπτετε. τὸ ἀσθενὲς ὑμῶν δύναμίς ἐστι. 11—18.] He excuses his boasting, and is thereby led to speak of the signs of an Apostle wrought among them, and to reassert his disinterestedness in preaching to them, on occasion of his past and intended visits.

But it is still ironical, spoken from the situation of his adversaries) a fool: ye compelled me (ὑμεῖς emphatic). For I (ἐγώ also emphatic, but more with reference to what has passed: 'ye compelled me, it was no doing of mine, for I &c.' The meaning is not, as De W., "I, not mine adversaries," who are an element foreign to the present sentence) ought to have been recommended by you (emphatic, by you, not by himself): for I was nothing behind (when I was with you) these overmuch Apostles (see on ch. xi. 5: but here even more plainly than there, the expression cannot be applied to the other Apostles, seeing that the aor. would in that case be inconsistent with the fact—the Corinthians never having had an opportunity of comparing him with them), even though I am nothing (see similar expressions of humility, 1 Cor. xv. 9—11).

12.] Confirmation of the οὐδὲν ὑστέρησα .... The question τί γὰρ κ.τ.λ. is asked in bitter irony. It is an illustration of ἐν πάσῃ ὑπομονῇ, and of the distinction conferred on them by so long manifestation of the signs of an Apostle among them. 'Was this endurance of working which I shewed, marred by the fact that I worked gratuitously among you?' ἡσσ. ὑπέρ does not imply that all churches suffered loss, and that the loss of the Corinthians was only not greater than that of other churches: but the comparative, implied in ἡσσ. is carried out by the ὑπέρ,—'ye suffered loss in comparison with the other Churches.' 13. εἰ μὴ ὅτι] except that one point, in which of all others they had least reason to complain. This one is put forward to indicate their deep ingratitude, if they did complain, seeing that the only point of difference in their treatment had been a preference: 'die tief gekränkte Liebe redet,' Meyer. On κατενάρκ. see ref. χαρ. μ. τ. ἀδ. ταύτην] The irony here reaches its height. 14.] τρίτον (the τοῦτο, though so strongly attested, can hardly have been omitted, had it ever been in the text, and therefore has probably been inserted from ch. xiii. 1) ἑτ. ἔχω ἐλθ., must, from the context, mean, I am ready to come the third time;—not, 'I am the third time ready to come,' i. e. 'this is the third time that I have been ready to come to you.' This latter meaning has been adopted by Beza, Grot., Estius, al., Paley, al., and even De Wette, hesitatingly, in order to evade the difficulty of supposing Paul to have been before this twice at Corinth. But on this see Prolegomena to 1 Cor. § v. Here, the context has absolutely nothing to do with his third preparation to come, which would be a new element, requiring some explanation, as in 1 Thess. ii. 18. The natural, and, I am persuaded, only true inference from the words here is, 'I am coming to you a third time,—and I will not burden you this time, any more than I did at my two previous visits.' Our business in such cases is, not to wrest plain words to fit our preconceived chronology, but to adapt our confessedly uncertain and imperfect history of the Apostle's life, to the data furnished by the plain honest sense of his Epistles.

οὐ γὰρ ζητῶ . . . .] Wetst. quotes Cicero de Fin. ii. 26: 'Me igitur ipsum ames oportet, non mea, si veri amici futuri sumus.'—μείζονα ἐπιζητῶ, ψυχὰς ἀντὶ χρημάτων, σωτηρίαν ἀντὶ χρυσίου, Chrys., p. 629. οὐ γὰρ ὀφείλει . . .] Paul was the spiritual father of the Corinthian Church, 1 Cor. iv. 14, 15: he does not therefore want to be enriched by them, his children, but rather to lay up riches for them, seeking to have them as his treasure, and thus to enrich them, as a loving father does his children. The θησαυρός is left indefinite: if pressed strictly, it cannot be earthly treasure in the negative part of the sentence, heavenly, in the positive;—cf. next verse.

Notice, ὀφείλει is not impersonal, but the common verb to τέκνα and γονεῖς, agreeing by proximity with the former.

15.] ἐγὼ δὲ τῶν φύσει πατέρων καὶ πλέον τί ποιεῖν ἐπαγγέλλομαι, Theodoret: and similarly Chrys. and Theophyl. They lay up treasures: I will spend them:—καὶ τί

Od. i. 12. 38: 'animæque magnæ prodigum Paullum.' εἰ is less strong than εἰ καί, which has been apparently a gloss on it. It assumes the case, but does not bring out the contrast between the course of action and the state of circumstances so strongly. Here, it appears as if ἧσσον ἀγαπῶμαι were by the εἰ connected with ἐκδαπανηθήσομαι,—'and will be spent, used up, in the service of your souls, if, the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved:' implying, that such a return for his love was leading to, and would in time accomplish, the ἐκδαπανηθήσομαι.

We certainly have not elsewhere any hint of ὁ ἀδελφός having accompanied him on this journey: but this is no reason why it should not have been so. τὸν ἀδελφόν—perhaps, one of the two mentioned ch. viii. 18, 22: some other, well known to the Corinthians, but absolutely unknown to us: but not, a brother, as in E. BEFORE THEM as judges, see 1 Cor. iv. 3; and assures them that he does all for their good, fearing in what state he might find them on his arrival. 19.] πάλαι was misunderstood, and πάλιν appears to have been a conjectural emendation, from ch. iii. 1; v. 12. πάλαι does not suit the interrogative form of the sentence, which would throw it out into too strong emphasis. Lachmann, Tischdf. (ed. 7 [and 8]), Meyer, De Wette read it as in text:—Ye have been some time imagining (i. e. during this my self-defence) that it is to you that I am defending myself. Then the answer follows: the assumption being made, and elliptically answered, as in ver. 16.

κατ. θεοῦ is emphatic, and opposed to ὑμῖν. ἐν χρ. λαλοῦμεν, as in ch. ii. 17, which see. τὰ δὲ πάντα] supply either λαλοῦμεν, or better understand τὰ πάντα as 'all our things' (1 Cor. xvi. 14), i. e. our words and deeds, and supply γίνεται, as there. Grot., Griesbach, Scholz, and Olsh., would read τάδε πάντα, and join with λαλοῦμεν. But (1) Paul never uses the pronoun ὅδε; and (2) if he did, it must apply to what follows, not to what has preceded. The insertion of the personal pronoun between the article and the noun, as in τῆς ὑμ. οἰκοδομῆς, occurs, as A. Buttmann has correctly remarked (see Moulton's Winer, p. 193, note 4), in Paul only (see reff.), and with no other pronoun than ὑμῶν. 20.] 'Edification, of which you stand in need, for, &c.' He here completely and finally throws off the apologist and puts on the Apostle, leaving on their minds a very different impression from that which would have been produced had he concluded with the apology. Lest, when I arrive, I should find you not such as I wish (in οὐχ οἵους θέλω is an indefinite possibility of aberration from οἵους θέλω, presently particularized, μή πως ἔρεις, κ.τ λ.), and I should be found by you (ὑμῖν merely the dative of the agent after the passive verb. Meyer makes it 'in your judgment,' but I much prefer the other: the passive form is adopted to bring out the ἐγώ into emphatic contrast), such as ye wish not (not οὐχ οἷον θέλετε, because there is now no indefiniteness; his disposition towards them in such a case could be but of one kind, viz. severity: τουτέστι, τιμωρὸς κ. κο- λαστής, Theophyl. Chrys., p. 634, brings out another point,—οὐκ εἶπεν, οἷον οὐ θέλω. ἀλλὰ πληκτικώτερον,—οἷον οὐ βούλεσθε).

What follows, viz. μή πως . . . ἔπραξαν, is an epexegesis of the last sentence, but in it the definiteness is on the side of the οὐχ οἵους θέλω, the indefiniteness on that of οἷον οὐ θέλετε, which latter is only hinted at by the mild expressions of being humbled, and lamenting the case of the impenitent. μή πως, scil. ἔσειν (or εὑρεθῶσιν) ἐν ὑμῖν. "The vehemence of his language has caused him to omit the verb." μή carries on the μή πως . . . μή πως, but with more precision, dropping the indefinite πως. The sentence loses much in force and, indeed, becomes inconsistent with the context, if with Lachmann (and Lücke, Conjectanea exeget. i. De W.) it be made interrogative (which it may be grammatically with either reading, ταπεινώσει or -σῃ), in which case the answer would be negative. πάλιν here, as Meyer observes, must belong to the whole ἐλθόντος μου ταπεινώσει με ὁ θ. μ. πρὸς ὑμ., because, ἐλθών having been used without πάλιν just before, the emphatic situation of πάλιν as applying to it would be unmeaning: see also the very different way in which it is connected with ἔλθω, ch. xiii. 2.

ταπεινώσει] 'Nihil erat quo magis exultaret apostolus, quam prospero suæ prædicationis successu (1 Thess. ii. 20): contra nihil erat, unde tristiore et demissiore animo redderetur, quam quum cerneret, se frustra laborasse,' Beza (Meyer). The fut. (ref.) indicates an assumption that the supposed case will really be. That this humbling, and not that of being obliged to punish, is intended, seems evident: the exercise of judicial authority being no humiliation, but the contrary, and humiliation being the natural result of want of success.

ὁ θεός μου expresses the conviction that whatever humiliation God might have in store for him would be a part of His will respecting him. πρὸς ὑμᾶς] among you, as the generality of interpreters: 'in regard to you,' in my relation to you, as Meyer. Either may be meant: but if we take the former, we must not join it, as Grot., al., with ἐλθόντος: it belongs at all events to ταπεινώσει.

πενθήσω] Theophyl. explains, μὴ ἐλθὼν κολάσῃ αὐτούς, καὶ πενθήσῃ διὰ τοῦτο· τουτέστι, τὰ ἔσχατα λυπηθῇ: so also al. and Billroth, Rückert, Olsh., and De Wette. But punishment seems out of place in this verse, which expresses his fear lest he should be humbled for, and have to lament the case of the impenitent,—and then, as he declares ch. xiii. 2, be forced to proceed to discipline; but this point is not yet introduced. I much prefer therefore taking it as Chrys., p. 635, —τοὺς μὴ μετανοοῦντας πενθεῖ, τοὺς τὰ ἀνίατα νοσοῦντας, τοὺς ἐν τῷ τραύματι μένοντας. ἐννόησον τοίνυν ἀποστολικὴν ἀρετήν, ὅταν μηδὲν ἑαυτῷ συνειδὼς πονηρόν, ὑπὲρ ἀλλοτρίων θρηνῇ κακῶν, καὶ ὑπὲρ τῶν ἑτέροις πλημμεληκότων ταπεινοῦται. τοῦτο γὰρ μάλιστα τοῦ διδασκάλου, τὸ οὕτω συναλγεῖν ταῖς τῶν μαθητῶν συμφοραῖς, τὸ κόπτεσθαι καὶ πενθεῖν ἐπὶ τοῖς τραύμασι τῶν ἀρχομένων. Similarly Calvin: 'veri et germani Pastoris affectum nobis exprimit, quum luctu aliorum peccata se prosequuturum dicit. Et sane ita agendum est, ut suam quisque Pastor Ecclesiam animo inclusam gestet, ejus morbis perinde ac suis afficiatur, miseriis condoleat, peccato lugeat.' So Estius, but perhaps too minutely fixing the meaning of πενθεῖν to mourning them as "Deo mortuos:" and Calovius (Meyer): "non de pœna hic Corinthiorum impœnitentium, sed de mœrore suo super impœnitentia:" and so likewise Meyer. πολλ. τ. προημ.] Why πολλούς? Why not all? I believe he uses πολλοὺς τῶν προημαρτηκότων as a mild expression for τοὺς πολλοὺς τοὺς προημαρτηκότας, and that we must not therefore press too closely the enquiry as to what the genus οἱ προημ. is, of which the πολλοί are the species. Lücke (as above) cited by Meyer, explains—"Cogitavit rem ita, ut primum poneret Christianorum ex ethnicis potissimum τῶν προημ. κ. μὴ μετανοησάντων genus universum, cujus generis homines essent ubique ecclesiarum, deinde vero ex isto hominum genere multos eos qui Corinthi essent, designaret definiretque." But this seems travelling quite out of the way. Meyer explains the genus to be all the sinners spoken of in ver. 20, the species (πολλούς) those designated by ἀκαθαρσ., πορν., and ἀσελγ. But this again is unnatural; and does not accurately fit ver. 20, in which not so much the προημαρτημένα as the present state at the Apostle's coming, is the subject. The distinction between the two participles, προημ. and μετανοησάντων, should be observed. As Meyer well remarks, the perf. προημαρτηκότων denotes the permanence of the state from the time of the committal of the sin: whereas the aor. μετανοησάντων has the sense of the 'futurum exactum,' —"and who at my coming shall not have repented." To what does προ- refer? to the time before their conversion? Hardly so: for the sins, of the incestuous person 1 Cor. v., and of these also, which would give the Apostle such pain, must be conceived to have been committed in their Christian state: being in fact those against which we find such repeated cautions in ἐπὶ στόμ.] i. e. 'I will not now, as before, be with you ἐν πάσῃ ὑπομονῇ as regards the offenders: but will come to a regular process, and establish the truth in a legal manner,' see reff. This explanation, however, has not been the usual one: Chrys., Calvin, Estius, al., and recently Neander and Olsh. and Stanley, understanding the two or three witnesses, of Paul's two or three visits, as establishing, either (1) the truth of the facts, or (2) the reality of his threats: so Chrys., Hom. xxix. p. 639 f.: ἅπαξ εἶπον κ. δεύτερον, ὅτε παρεγενόμην· λέγω καὶ νῦν δὶς γραμμάτων. καὶ μὴν ἐὰν ἀκούσητέ μου (al. ἐὰν μὲν ἀκούσητε), ὅπερ ἐπεθύμουν γέγονεν. ἐὰν δὲ παρακούσητε, ἀνάγκη λοιπὸν στῆσαι τὰ εἰρημένα, καὶ ἐπαγαγεῖν τὴν τιμωρίαν, —and Theophyl., πᾶν ῥῆμα ἀπαλητικὸν κατασταθήσεται. But it is decisive against the whole interpretation, as Meyer remarks, that thus the sins committed since the Apostle's last visit would remain altogether unnoticed. Another view, connected with the rendering of ἔρχομαι 'am intending to come,' is given by Wetstein: "Spero jam denique mihi successurum, ut vobis demonstrem, serio me desiderasse ad vos venire: sicut ea quæ trium hominum testimonio probantur, in judicio fidem faciunt." Similarly Grotius and Le Clerc. But it is fatal to this, that according to it, the δύο μάρτυρες had failed to establish it. καὶ τρ., not for ἢ τρ.,—two (where only two can be had), and three (where so many can be obtained): 'two and three respectively.' μαρτύρων, the dual number not occurring in the N. have forewarned you, and I now forewarn you, as (I did, προειρηκα) when present the second time, so also (I do) now (προλέγω) when absent. It certainly seems to me that this is the only natural way of taking the words. Grot., Est., Bengel, al., and De Wette, take ὡς παρὼν τὸ δεύτ. to mean, 'as if I were present the second time,' meaning this next time. But is it possible that the Apostle should have written so confusedly, as to have said in the same sentence τρίτον τοῦτο ἔρχομαι, and ὡς παρὼν τὸ δεύτερον, both, according to these interpreters, with reference to the same journey? And would he not have even on such an hypothesis have said τὸ δεύτερον τοῦτο? But if we render as above, the προείρηκα (perf. because the warning yet endured in force) refers to his second visit (παρὼν τὸ δεύτ.), and the προλέγω to his present condition of absence (ἀπὼν νῦν), ὡς being as ('I did' or 'do,' for it applies to both clauses), and καί the simple copula. τοῖς προημ.] the same persons as are thus designated above, ch. xii. 21. It is not necessary to fix the προ- any more accurately.

1 Cor., e.g. ch. v. 11; vi. 15, 18; x. 8; xv. 33, 34. I would therefore understand the προ indefinitely, almost pleonastically—pointing to the priority of sin implied in the idea of repentance. μετανοησάντων. ἐπί] Meyer would join together πενθήσω . . . ἐπί, and indicates this as the natural connexion of verb, object, and ground. But to say nothing of the harshness of πενθήσω πολλοὺς ἐπί, and the almost necessarily reflective form of μετανοησ. ἐπὶ τῇ ἀκ. . . . ἧ ἔπραξαν,—I conceive the aorist ἔπραξαν to be fatal to this arrangement. Thus taken, it would make the Apostle lament over these impenitents, on account of the impurity, &c., which they ἔπραξαν—i. e. once practised, but which is now gone by. The sense would require πεπράχασι. Whereas if connected with μετανοησάντων, the aorist expresses 'and shall not have (repented of the ἀκ., &c., which they practised),' and would thus come rightly after μετανοησ., implying the removal of the former state of sin. μεταν. is usually constructed with ἀπό, Acts viii. 22 (Heb. vi. 1), or ἐκ, Rev. only,—ii. 21 f.; ix. 20 f.; xvi. 11: but as Paul only uses the word this once, and as the construction with ἐπί is perfectly legitimate and highly expressive (see reff. LXX), there can be no objection to it here. Chap. XIII. 1—10.] He warns them of the severity which on his arrival, if such be the case, he will surely exercise, and prove his apostolic authority. To this proof, however, he exhorts them not to put him. 1.] This third time I am coming to you: i. e. 'this is the third visit, which I am now about to pay you.' Had not chronological theories intervened, no one would ever have thought of any other rendering. The usual one, 'This is the third time that I have been intending to come to you,' introduces here, as also in ch. xii. 14, an element not only foreign to, but detrimental to, the purpose. The Apostle wishes to impress on them the certainty of this coming, and to prepare them for it by solemn self-examination; and in order to this, he (on this interpretation) uses an expression which would only remind them of the charge of ἐλαφρία which had been brought against him, and tend to diminish the solemnity of the warning. As another chronological refuge, Beza, al., suppose his two Epistles to be meant by the two former 'profectiones ad illos.' In answer to all attempts to give here any but the obvious sense, we may safely maintain that had any other been meant, we should certainly have had more indication of it, than we have now. On τρίτον τοῦτο, Meyer compares Herod. v. 76, τέταρτον δὴ τοῦτο . . . . ἀπικόμενοι: see also reff.: and on Paul's visit to Corinth, the Prolegomena to 1 Cor. § v.

τοῖς λοιποῖς πᾶσιν] all the rest of you, who may not have actually sinned, but still require warning, on account of your own personal danger, connexion with the προημαρτηκότες, &c. ἐὰν ἔλθω εἰς τὸ π.] at my next coming. This was what he προείρηκεν when he was last there, and now προλέγει. 3.] ἐπεί gives the reason why he will not spare: they required the exertion of discipline; and they challenged him to the proof of his apostolic authority. δοκιμὴν . . . χριστοῦ] The genitive is either objective, a proof of Christ speaking in me, i.e. 'that Christ speaks in me,'—or subjective, a proof given by Christ speaking in me—'a token of my authority vouchsafed by Christ speaking in me.' This latter meaning is more suited to what follows, where Christ becomes the subject. Such proof would be, the immediate execution, by divine power, of some punishment denounced by Paul's word, as in Acts xiii. 11. ὅς, i.e. Christ: see above. δυνατεῖ, to answer to ἀσθενεῖ, refers both to gifts and miracles, and to the Power of Christ which He would exert in punishment—εἰς ὑμᾶς and ἐν ὑμῖν differ—the εἰς being hypothetical, —the ἐν, matter of fact. The assertion tends to remind them of the danger of provoking Christ, who spoke by Paul.

4.] Confirmation of the foregoing οὐκ ἀσθενεῖ, ἀλλὰ δυνατεῖ. The rec. text, καὶ γὰρ εἰ, would be quite beside the purpose, and would mean, 'For even if He were crucified,' 'for even putting the case that He was crucified:' καὶ εἰ cannot be = εἰ καί, though, as in Vulg. 'etsi,'—and E. V. Hartung, Partikellehre i. 139, shews that in καὶ εἰ, the climax belongs only to the hypothetical particle εἰ, not as in εἰ καί, to the fact presupposed: 'even if,' not 'if even,' or 'although.' Examples of καὶ εἰ are Plato, Sympos. 185, καὶ ἐὰν τοῦτο ποιήσῃς ἅπαξ ἢ δίς, καὶ εἰ πάνυ ἰσχυρά ἐστι, παύσεται. Eur. Androm. 266, καὶ γὰρ εἰ πέρᾳ σ' ἔχει τηκτὸς μόλυβδος, ἐξαναστήσω σ' ἐγώ. Sappho, καὶ γὰρ αἱ φεύγει, ταχέως διώξει. See more in Hartung, l. c. For he was even crucified (that καὶ γάρ always means 'for . . . even' . . ., or 'for . . . also,' and never simply 'for,' see Hartung, i. 137 f., where he has collected many examples, e.g.: Il. a. 63, καὶ γάρ τ' ὄναρ ἐκ Διός ἐστιν,—Herod. i. 77, καὶ γὰρ πρὸς τούτους αὐτῷ ἐπεποίητο συμμαχίη) from (as the source,—the conditional element,—by which His crucifixion became possible) weakness, yet He lives by (source [of His life]) the Power of God (which raised Him from the dead, Rom. vi. 4; viii. 11; Eph. i. 20; Phil. ii. 9). For we also are weak in Him (i. e. in Him, in our communion with and imitation of Christ, we, as He did, lay aside our power and spare you: we partake of His voluntary abnegation of power which we might have used. The context requires this explanation, and refutes that of Chrys., p. 644, τί ἐστιν, ἀσθ. ἐν αὐτῷ; διακόμεθα, ἀλανώμεθα, τὰ ἴσχατα πάσχομεν, so Theodoret, Theophyl., Grot., Estius, al.), but shall live (exercise our apostolic authority, in contrast to the ἀσθένεια above) with Him (as He now exercises His power in His glorified resurrection life) from (source) the power of God [with respect to you (εἰς ὑμᾶς, if genuine, may belong either to δυνάμεως θεοῦ, = δυνάμ. θεοῦ τῆς εἰς ὑμᾶς, the art. being often omitted in such constructions, —or to ζήσομεν, 'we shall live with respect to you,' which agrees better with the parallelism, but not so well with the arrangement of the sentence. The sense seems to require the latter interpretation, for the δύναμις θεοῦ εἰς ὑμ. would be rather the result, than the source of the apostolic energy indicated by ζήσομεν)]. δοκιμὴν λαβεῖν, οὐκ ἀπορήσομεν τοῦ δοῦναι ὑμῖν τὴν ἀπόδειξιν). 7.] Yet he prays God rather that they may require no such demonstration of his apostolic power, even though he lose in reputation by it. μὴ ποιῆσ. ὑμ. κακ. μηδ.] Not, as Grot., al., 'that I may not have to inflict on you any evil' (an extraordinary rendering of κακὸν ποιεῖν), but that ye may do no evil, corresponding to ἵνα ἡμεῖς τὸ καλὸν ποιῆτε below. οὐχ ἵνα . . . .] 'And the purpose of this my prayer is not to gain any repute by your Christian graces, but that you may be highly endowed with them, and (if it so happen) we may be as of no repute ('hominum scilicet judicio,' Beza).' That this is the sense, and that δόκιμοι is not in this verse to be applied to substantiation of power by punishment, is necessitated by the construction,—it being plainly shewn by the infin. after εὐχόμ., that ἵνα is not here meant to apply, even in part, to the purport of the prayer (as in Col. i. 9; 2 Thess. i. 11; see note on 1 Cor. xiv. 13), but to its purpose. And that being settled,—we pray . . . . not in order that we may appear δόκιμοι,—it follows that the appearing δόκιμοι would be a result of the fulfilment of the prayer, viz. of your doing no evil, and this it could only be by their doing no evil bringing credit on the Apostle's ministry. It is not for this end that we pray that you may do no evil, but for your own good, even if that tend to the non-exercise, and so depreciation, of our apostolic power. 8.] For we have no power against the truth (of the Gospel, as Meyer; not of the facts, as Chrys., al., and De Wette, which might suit κατὰ τῆς ἀλ., but comes in very lamely with ὑπὲρ τῆς ἀλ.—'If you walk in the truth, we shall be at one with you and so have no opportunity of shewing our power') but (only) on behalf of (in furtherance of the cause and spread of) the truth. 9.] For (confirmation of ver. 8 by the still stronger assertion, WHEREIN his joy consists, and for what he prays) our joy is, when we are weak (have no opportunity for shewing our power in punishment) but ye are mighty (in Christian graces, and requiring no exercise of our authority): this (viz. that the state of the case may be as just mentioned) we also pray for, viz. your perfection (generally,—in all good things, see καταρτισμόν, Eph. iv. 12: not, as Bengel, 'ne opus sit quenquam de corpore rescindere;' the reference here being far more general).

Library of Spiritual Works for English Catholics.

It is hoped that the "Library of Spiritual Works for English Catholics," which will comprise translations, compilations, and other works, will meet a need which has long been felt. As the devotional life of the Church of England has increased, so the demand for spiritual treatises has become more and more urgent, and has arisen from all classes of society. This series of books, some well-known, some already oftentimes translated, and others, it may be, yet to be presented for the first time in an English dress, is intended to meet this want.

The aim of the translators is twofold. First, to provide the reader with a fair rendering of the original as far as possible unmutilated. It has been a common complaint of late, that translations have been marred by the absence of parts of the original, the exclusion of which a more intelligent view of Catholic devotion in the present day has rendered unnecessary. In these editions these omissions have been to a great extent supplied; yet at the same time any term or expression which may come under the imputation of being "un-English" has been reduced, as far as may be without destroying the thought, to its equivalent in Anglican phraseology and belief. Secondly, to translate the original into ordinary English, and thus to avoid the antiquated and stilted style of writing, which often makes books of this kind distasteful, or even sometimes unintelligible.

Elegantly printed with red borders, on extra superfine toned paper.

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

TO THE

FOURTH EDITION.

THIS Volume was in the Third Edition made uniform with the rest of the work as regards the revision and augmentation of the references, and the re-writing of the critical digest and consequent occasional changes in the text. The notes were also in parts considerably modified and augmented.

In this Fourth Edition, the readings of the Codex Sinaiticus have been incorporated in the Digest, and some consequent alterations have been made in the text.

Some changes, but not many, have been made in the notes.

THE EPISTLE TO THE GALATIANS.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. Of all the Epistles which bear the characteristic marks of St. Paul's style, this one stands the foremost. See below, on its style, § 4. So that, as Windischmann observes, whoever is prepared to deny the genuineness of this Epistle, would pronounce on himself the sentence of incapacity to distinguish true from false. Accordingly, its authorship has never been doubted.

2. But that authorship is also upheld by external testimony:

(α) Irenæus, adv. Hær. iii. 7. 2, p. 182, quotes the Epistle by name: "Sed in ea quæ est ad Galatas, sic ait: Quid ergo lex factorum? posita est usque quo veniat semen, cui promissum est &c." (Gal. iii. 19.)

Many allusions to it are found.

(β) Polycarp, ad Phil. cap. iii.: p. 1008.

Παύλου . . . ὃς καὶ ἀπὼν ὑμῖν ἔγραψεν ἐπιστολάς, εἰς ἃς ἐὰν ἐγκύπτητε, δυνηθήσεσθε οἰκοδομεῖσθαι εἰς τὴν δοθεῖσαν ὑμῖν πίστιν, ἥτις ἐστὶ μήτηρ πάντων ἡμῶν (Gal. iv. 26). And again, cap. v., p. 1009: εἰδότες οὖν, ὅτι θεὸς οὐ μυκτηρίζεται . . . . (Gal. vi. 7.)

(γ) Justin Martyr, or whoever was the author of the Oratio ad Græcos, printed among his works, seems to allude to Gal. iv. 12, in the words γίνεσθε ὡς ἐγώ, ὅτι κἀγὼ ἤμην ὡς ὑμεῖς: and to Gal. v. 20, in these, ἔχθραι, ἔρεις, ζῆλος, ἐριθεῖαι, θυμοί, κ. τὰ ὅμοια τούτοις, c. v., p. 5.

(δ) Besides these, there are many more distant allusions in the works of Ignatius, Polycarp, and Justin, which may be seen cited in Lardner and Windischmann, and Davidson, Introd. to N. T. vol. ii. pp. 318-19.

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. This Epistle was written ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τῆς Γαλατίας (ch. i. 2). GALATIA (Γαλλογραικία Strabo xii. 566, Gallogræcia Liv. xxxvii. 8, xxxviii. 12) was a district of Asia Minor (once part of Phrygia, Strabo xii. 571, ii. 130), bounded N. by Paphlagonia and Bithynia, E. by Pontus and Cappadocia (divided from both by the Halys), S. by Cappadocia and Phrygia, W. by Phrygia and Bithynia. Notwithstanding its mountainous character, it was fruitful, especially near the river Halys (Strabo xii. 567). The principal cities were Ancyra, Pessinus, and Tavium. Ancyra was declared the capital by Augustus. The inhabitants (Γαλάται, only a later form of Κέλται, Pausan. i. 3. 5,—also Gallogræci) were Gauls in origin. The Gallic tribes of the Trochmi and Tolistoboii, with the German tribe of Tectosagi (or Toctosages), crossed over from Thrace into Asia Minor, having formed part of the Gallic expedition which pillaged Delphi, in the third century B.C. (cir. 280.) In Asia they at first became mercenary troops under Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, but soon overran nearly the whole of Asia Minor, till Antiochus Soter and Eumenes drove them into its central portion, afterwards called Galatia. There they were at first ruled by tetrarchs, and afterwards (when their real independence had been taken from them by the Consul Manlius Vulso, B.C. 189,—see Livy xxxviii. 16—27) by kings; of whom the two Deiotari, father and son, are known to us, the former as having been defended by Cicero in a speech still extant, the latter as also a friend of the great orator's (Epp. ad Attic. v. 17). Amyntas, the successor of this latter, was their last king: at his death (B.C. 26) Galatia was reduced to a Roman province. See for full accounts, Strabo, book xiii. ch. 5: Livy, as above: the Introductions to this Epistle in Meyer, De Wette, and Windischmann: Winer's Realwörterbuch, art. Galatia: Conybeare and Howson, vol. i. p. 284 ff., edn. 2: and the learned dissertation on the question whether the Galatians were Teutons or Celts, appended to Prof. Lightfoot's edition of this Epistle.

2. The character of the people, as shewn in this Epistle, agrees remarkably with that ascribed to the Gallic race by all writers[1]. They received the Apostle at his first visit with extreme joy, and shewed him every kindness: but were soon shaken in their fidelity to him and the Gospel, and were transferring their allegiance to false teachers.

3. The Galatian churches were founded by St. Paul at his first visit, when he was detained among them by sickness (ch. iv. 13: see note and compare Acts xvi. 6), during his second missionary journey, about A.D. 51 (see chronol. table in Prolegg. to Acts, Vol. II.). Though doubtless he began his preaching as usual among the Jews (cf. Jos. Antt. xvi. 6. 2, for the fact of many Jews being resident in Ancyra), yet this Epistle testifies to the majority of his readers being Gentiles, not yet circumcised, though nearly persuaded to it by Judaizing teachers. At the same time we see by the frequent references to the O. T. and the adoption of the rabbinical method of interpretation by allegory (ch. iv. 21—31), that he had to do with churches which had been accustomed to Judaizing teaching, and familiarized with the O. T. See Meyer, Einl. p. 3. In the manifold preparations for the Gospel which must have taken place wherever Jews were numerous, through the agency of those who had at Jerusalem heard and believed on Jesus, we need not wonder at any amount of judaistic influence apparent even in churches founded by St. Paul himself: nor need any hypotheses respecting his preaching be invented to account for such a phænomenon.

SECTION III.

WITH WHAT OBJECT IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. Judaizing teachers had followed, as well as preceded, the Apostle in Galatia, and had treated slightingly his apostolic office and authority (ch. i. 1, 11), giving out that circumcision was necessary (ch. v. 2; vi. 12). Their influence was increasing, and the churches were being drawn away by it (i. 6; iii. 1, 3; iv. 9—11; v. 7—12). Against these teachers he had already testified in person (i. 9; iv. 16, where see notes, and cf. Acts xviii. 23),—and now that the evil was so rapidly and seriously gaining ground, he writes this Epistle expressly to counteract it.

2. The object then of the Epistle was (1) to defend his own apostolic authority; and (2) to expose the judaistic error by which they were being deceived. Accordingly, it contains two parts, the apologetic (ch. i. ii.) and the polemic (ch. iii.—v. 12). These are naturally followed by a hortatory conclusion (ch. v. 13—end). See these parts subdivided into their minor sections in the notes.

SECTION IV.

ITS MATTER, AND STYLE.

1. The matter of the Epistle has been partly spoken of in the last section. In the first, or apologetic portion, it contains a most valuable historical résumé of St. Paul's apostolic career, proving his independence of human authority, and confirming as well as illustrating the narrative in the Acts, by mentioning the principal occasions when he held intercourse with the other Apostles: relating also that remarkable interview with St. Peter, so important for its own sake, and giving rise to his own precious testimony to Christian truth in ch. ii. 14—21.

2. The polemical portion has much in common with the Epistle to the Romans. But this difference is observable; that whereas in that Epistle, the whole subject is treated, as belonging to the great argument there handled, logically, and without reference to any special circumstances,—here all is strictly controversial, with immediate reference to the judaizing teachers.

3. In style, this Epistle takes a place of its own among those of St. Paul. It unites the two extreme affections of his remarkable character: severity, and tenderness: both, the attributes of a man of strong and deep emotions. Nothing can be more solemnly severe than its opening, and ch. iii. 1—5; nothing more touchingly affectionate than some of its appeals, e. g. ch. iv. 18—20. It is therefore quite a mistake to characterize its tone as altogether overpowering and intimidating[1]. A half-barbarous people like the Galatians, known for their simplicity and impressibility, would be likely to listen to both of these methods of address: to be won by his fatherly pleading, as well as overawed by his apostolic rebukes and denunciations.

4. There are several points of similarity in this Epistle to the peculiar diction of the Pastoral Epistles. The student will find them pointed out in the reff., and for the most part remarked on in the notes. They seem to indicate, in accordance with our interpretation of ch. vi. 11, that he wrote this Epistle, as those, with his own hand, without the intervention of an amanuensis. This matter will be found more fully treated below, ch. vii. on the Pastoral Epistles, § i. 32.

SECTION V.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

1. We have no date in the Epistle itself, which may enable us to determine the time when it was written. This can only be gathered from indirect sources. And consequently, the most various dates have been assigned to it: some, as Marcion in old times, and Michaelis, al., in modern, placing it first among St. Paul's Epistles: and others, as Schrader and Köhler, last. The following considerations will narrow our field of uncertainty on the point:

2. If the reasoning in the note on the chronological table, Vol. II. Prolegg. pp. 26, 27, be correct,—the visit to Jerusalem mentioned Gal. ii. 1 ff. is identical with that in Acts xv. 1 ff. It will thence follow that the Epistle cannot have been written before that visit: i. e. (see Chron. Table as above) not before A.D. 50.

3. I have maintained, in the note on Gal. iv. 16, that the words there used most naturally refer to the Apostle's second visit to the churches of Galatia, when Acts xviii. 23, he went through τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν . . . . στηρίζων πάντας τοὺς μαθητάς. If so, this Epistle cannot date before that visit: i. e. (Chron. Table as above) not before the autumn of the year 54.

4. The first period then which seems probable, is the Apostle's stay at Ephesus in Acts xix., from autumn 54, till Pentecost 57. And this period is so considerable, that, having regard to the οὕτως ταχέως of ch. i. 6, it must be regarded as quite possible that our Epistle may have been written during it. The above is the view of Hug, De Wette, Olsh., Usteri, Winer, Neander, Greswell, Anger, Meyer, Wieseler, and many others.

5. The next period during which it might have been written is, his stay at Corinth, Acts xx. 2, 3, where he spent the winter of the year 57-8, and whence he wrote the Epistle to the Romans. This is the opinion of Conybeare and Howson (vol. ii. p. 162, edn. 2). They support their view entirely by the similarity of this Epistle and that to the Romans. "It is," they say (p. 165, note), "exactly that resemblance which would exist between two Epistles written nearly at the same time, while the same line of argument was occupying the writer's mind, and the same phrases and illustrations were on his tongue." It has also been maintained with much skill and learning, since the first edition of this volume appeared, by Prof. Lightfoot, in an article in the Journal of Sacred and Classical Philology for Jan. 1857: which article is reproduced in the Introduction to his edition of the Epistle, 1865. He traces the sequence of the lines of thought in the greater Epistles, and finds internal evidence enough to make him decide strongly that it is very improbable, that the two Epistles to the Corinthians intervened between those to the Galatians and Romans, or that to the Galatians between the second to the Thessalonians and the first to the Corinthians.

6. I own that these considerations seem to me weighty ones, and have caused me to modify the decided preference which I gave in my first edition to the earlier date. Still, I do not feel Prof. Lightfoot's argument to have settled the question. It might be that the elementary truths brought out amidst deep emotion, sketched, so to speak, in great rough lines in the fervent Epistle to the Galatians, dwelt long on St. Paul's mind (even though other subjects of interest regarding other churches intervened), and at length worked themselves out, under the teaching and leading of the Spirit, into that grand theological argument which he afterwards addressed, without any special moving occasion, but as his master-exposition of Christian doctrine, to the church of the metropolis of the world.

7. I think then that it must always remain a question between these two periods. In favour of the former of them it may be said that, considering the οὕτως ταχέως[3], we can hardly let so long a time elapse as the second would pass over,—and that probability is in favour of strong emotion having, in the prompting of God's Spirit, first brought out that statement of Christian truth and freedom, which after-deliberation expanded, and polished, and systematized, in the Epistle to the Romans: and in favour of the latter may be alleged the interesting considerations respecting the grouping of St. Paul's Epistles, and the parallels between 2 Corinthians, Galatians, and Romans, which Prof. Lightfoot has adduced.

8. Of course my objection to the date implied in the common subscription, ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Ῥώμης, adopted by Theodoret, Calov., Hammond, al., is even stronger than that stated above. Those who wish to see the matter discussed at more length, may refer to Davidson, Introd. ii. p. 292 ff., and to Prof. Lightfoot's edition of the Epistle, pp. 35—55.

CHAPTER II.

THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. THE ancient testimonies to the Apostle Paul having been the author of this Epistle, are the following:

(α) Irenæus adv. Hær. v. 2. 36, p. 294:
καθὼς ὁ μακάριος Παῦλός φησιν ἐν τῇ πρὸς Ἐφεσίους ἐπιστολῇ ὅτι μέλη ἐσμὲν τοῦ σώματος, ἐκ τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐκ τῶν ὀστέων αὐτοῦ (Eph. v. 30). Again i. 8. 5, p. 42, τοῦτο δὲ καὶ ὁ Παῦλος λέγει· πᾶν γὰρ τὸ φανερούμενον, φῶς ἐστίν (Eph. v. 13).

(β) Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. § 65, p. 592 P.:
διὸ καὶ ἐν τῇ πρὸς Ἐφεσίους γράφει (cf. supra, § 61, φησὶν ὁ ἀπόστολος, where 1 Cor. xi. 3, &c. is quoted, § 62, ἐπιφέρει γοῦν, citing Gal. v. 16 ff.: and infra, § 66, κἀν τῇ πρὸς Κολοσσαεῖς . . . . from which it is evident that the subject of γράφει is 'St. Paul') ὑποτασσόμενοι ἀλλήλοις ἐν φόβῳ θεοῦ κ.τ.λ. Eph. v. 21—25.

(γ) ib. Pæd. i. § 18, p. 108 P.:
ὁ ἀπόστολος ἐπιστέλλων πρὸς Κορινθίους φησίν, 2 Cor. xi. 2. . . . . σαφέστατα δὲ Ἐφεσίοις γράφων ἀπεκάλυψε τὸ ζητούμενον ὧδέ πως λέγων· μέχρι καταντήσωμεν οἱ πάντες κ.τ.λ. Eph. iv. 13—15.

[3] For I cannot accept the suggestion of Prof. Lightfoot, which would make ταχέως subjective to μετατίθεσθε, 'ye are so rapidly changing.' I have treated on this view in my note on Rev. i. 1, where much depends on it.

2. Further we have testimonies to the Epistle being received as canonical Scripture, and therefore, by implication, of its being regarded as written by him whose name it bears: as e. g.:

(δ) Polycarp, ad Philippenses, c. xii., p. 1013 ff.:

"Ut his scripturis dictum est, 'Irascimini et nolite peccare,' et 'Sol non occidat super iracundiam vestram.'" Eph. iv. 26[3].

(ε) Tertullian adv. Marcion. v. 17, p. 512 (see below, § ii. 17 c).

(ζ) Irenæus several times mentions passages of this Epistle as perverted by the Valentinians: e. g. ch. i. 10 (Iren. i. 3. 4, p. 16): iii. 21 (Iren. i. 8. 1, p. 14): v. 32 (Iren. i. 8. 4, p. 40): and in many other places (see the Index in Stieren's edn.) cites the Epistle directly.

3. I have not hitherto adduced the testimony ordinarily cited from Ignatius, Eph. 12, p. 656, on account of the doubt which hangs over the interpretation of the words[4]:

παρρησίᾳ ἐστὲ τῶν εἰς θεὸν ἀναιρουμένων, Παύλου συμμύσται τοῦ ἡγιασμένου, τοῦ μεμαρτυρημένου, ἀξιομακαρίστου, οὗ γένοιτό μοι ὑπὸ τὰ ἴχνη εὑρεθῆναι ὅταν θεοῦ ἐπιτύχω, ὃς ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ μνημονεύει ὑμῶν ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ.

I conceive however that there can be little doubt that these expressions are to be interpreted of the Epistle to the Ephesians. First, the expression συμμύσται seems to point to Eph. i. 9, as compared with the rest of the chapter,—to ch. iii. 3—6, 9. And it would be the very perversity of philological strictness, to maintain, in the face of later and more anarthrous Greek usage, that ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ must mean, 'in every Epistle,' and not 'in all his Epistle.' Assuming this latter meaning (see note on Eph. ii. 21), the expression finds ample justification in the very express and affectionate dwelling on the Christian state and privileges of those to whom he is writing—making mention of them throughout all his Epistle[5].

[3] Meyer, Einl. p. 24, prefers to consider both these citations as made from the O. T. Ps. iv. 4, and Deut. xxiv. 15 (?), on the ground of the title 'Scripture' never occurring of the N. T. in the apostolic fathers.

[4] The chapter itself is wanting in the ancient Syriac version published by Mr. Cureton. But this will hardly be adduced as affecting its genuineness. Hefele's view, "pius ille monachus, qui versionem Syriacam elaboravit, omnia omisisse videtur quæ ipsi et usui suo ascetico minus congrua minusve necessaria putabat," seems to be the true one.

[5] Pearson's remarks on this point are worth transcribing: "Hæc a martyre non otiose aut frigide, sed vere, imo signanter et vigilanter dicta sunt. Tota enim Epistola ad Ephesios scripta, ipsos Ephesios, eorumque honorem et curam maxime spectat, et summe honorificam eorum memoriam ad posteros transmittit. In aliis epistolis apostolus eos ad quos scribit sæpe acriter objurgat aut parce laudat. Hic omnibus modis perpetuo se Ephesiis applicat, illosque tanquam egregios Christianos tractat, evangelio salutis firmiter credentes, et Spiritu promissionis obsignatos, concives sanctorum, et domesticos Dei. Pro iis sæpe ardenter orat, ipsos hortatur, obtestatur, laudat, utrumque sexum sedulo instruit, suum erga eos singularem affectum ubique prodit." Vindiciæ Ignatianæ, pt. ii. ch. 10, end.

4. In the longer recension of this Epistle of Ignatius, the testimony is more direct: in ch. vi., p. 737, we read,

> δι' οὓς ἀγαλλιώμενος ἠξιώθην δι' ὧν γράφω προσομιλῆσαι τοῖς ἁγίοις τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, τοῖς πιστοῖς ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ.

5. As we advance to the following centuries, the reception of the authorship of St. Paul is universal[6]. In fact, we may safely say that this authorship was never called in question till very recent times.

6. Among those critics who have repudiated our Epistle as not written by the Apostle, the principal have been De Wette and Baur. The ground on which they build their reasoning is, for the most part, the same. De Wette holds the Epistle to be a verbose expansion of that to the Colossians. He describes it as entirely dependent on that Epistle, and as such, unworthy of a writer who always wrote in freshness and fulness of spirit, as did St. Paul. He believes he finds in it every where expressions and doctrines foreign to his diction and teaching. This being so, he classes it with the Pastoral Epistles and the first Epistle of Peter, and ascribes it to some scholar of the Apostles, writing in their name. He is not prepared to go so far as Baur, who finds in it the ideas and diction of Gnostic and Montanistic times. On this latter notion, I will treat below: I now proceed to deal with De Wette's objections.

7. First of all, I would take a general view of their character, and say that, on such a general view, they, as a whole, make for, rather than against, the genuineness of the Epistle. According to De Wette, a gifted scholar of the Apostles, in the apostolic age itself, writes an Epistle in imitation, and under the name, of St. Paul. Were the imitation close, and the imitator detected only by some minute features of inadvertent inconsistency, such a phænomenon might be understood, as that the Epistle found universal acceptance as the work of the Apostle: but according to our objector, the discrepancies are wide, the inconsistencies every where abundant. He is found, in his commentary, detecting and exposing them at every turn. Such reasoning may prove a passage objectively (as in the case of Mark xvi, 9—20, or John vii. 53—viii. 11) to be out of place among the writings of a particular author, all subjective considerations apart: but it is wholly inapplicable when used to account for the success of a forger among his contemporaries, and indeed acts the other way.

8. Let us view the matter in this light. Here is an Epistle bearing the name of St. Paul. Obviously then, it is no mere accidental insertion among his writings of an Epistle written by some other man, and on purely objective grounds requiring us to ascribe it to that other unknown author; but it is either a genuine production of the Apostle, or a forgery. Subjective grounds cannot be kept out of the question: it is a successful forgery: one which imposed on the post-apostolic age, and has continued to impose on the Church in every age. We have then a right to expect in it the phænomena of successful forgery: close imitation, skilful avoidance of aught which might seem unlike him whose name it bears;—construction, if you will, out of acknowledged pauline materials, but so as to shun every thing unpauline.

9. Now, as has been seen above, the whole of De Wette's reasoning goes upon the exact opposite of all these phænomena. The Epistle is unpauline: strange and surprising in diction, and ideas. Granting this, it might be a cogent reason for believing an anonymous writing not to be St. Paul's: but it is no reason why a forgery bearing his name should have been successful,—on the contrary, is a very sufficient reason why it should have been immediately detected, and universally unsuccessful. Let every one of De Wette's positions be granted, and carried to its utmost; and the more in number and the stronger they are, the more reason there will be to infer, that the only account to be given of a writing, so unlike St. Paul's, obtaining universal contemporary acceptance as his, is, that it was his own genuine composition. Then we should have remaining the problem, to account for the Apostle having so far departed from himself: a problem for the solution of which much acquaintance with himself and the circumstances under which he wrote would be required,—and, let me add, a treatment very far deeper and more thorough than De Wette has given to any part of this Epistle.

10. But I am by no means disposed to grant any of De Wette's positions as they stand, nor to recognize the problem as I have put it in the above hypothetical form. The relation between our Epistle and that to the Colossians, I have endeavoured to elucidate below (§ vi. and Prolegg. to the Col., § iv.). The reasonings and connexions which he pronounces unworthy of the Apostle, I hold him, in almost every case, not to have appreciated: and where he has appreciated them, to have hastily condemned. Here, as in the instance of 1 Tim., his unfortunate prejudgment of the spuriousness of the Epistle has tinged his view of every portion of it: and his commentary, generally so thorough and able, so fearless and fair, is worth hardly more than those of very inferior men, not reaching below the surface, and unable to recognize the most obvious tendencies and connexions.

11. The reader will find De Wette's arguments met in detail by Rückert (Comm. p. 289 ff.), Hemsen (der Apostel Paulus, pp. 629—38); and touched upon by Harless (Comm. Einleit. p. lxvi ff.), Neander (in a note to his Pfl. u. Leit. edn. 4, p. 521 ff.), and Meyer (Einl.

p. 20 ff.). Davidson also treats of them in full (Introd. to N. T. vol. ii. pp. 352—60), and Eadie very slightly (Introd. p. xxx f.) [7].

12. Baur's argument will be found in his 'Paulus, der Apostel Jesu Christi &c.' pp. 417—57. It consists, as far as it is peculiar to him, mainly in an attempt to trace in our Epistle, and that to the Colossians (for he holds both to be spurious), expressions and sentiments known to be those of Gnosticism and Montanism: and in some few instances to shew that it is not probable that these heresies took their terms from the Epistles, but rather the Epistles from them. This latter part, on which indeed the conclusiveness of the whole depends, is very slightly, and to me most inconclusively done. And nothing is said in Baur of the real account of the occurrence of such terms in the Epistle, and subsequently in the vocabulary of these heretics: viz. that the sacred writer laid hold of them and employed them, so to speak, high up the stream of their usage, before they became polluted by heretical additions and misconceptions,—the heretics, lower down the same stream, when now the waters were turbid and noxious: his use of them having tended to impress them on men's minds, so that they were ready for the purpose of the heretics when they wanted them. That those heretics used many other terms not known to these Epistles, is no proof that their account was the original one, and this of our Epistles borrowed from it, but simply proves nothing. Some of these terms were suited to the Apostle's purpose in teaching or warning: these he was led to adopt: others were not so suitable,—those he left alone. Or it may be that between his writing and their development, the vocabulary had received additions, which consequently were never brought under his notice. Eadie refers, for an answer to Baur, to Lechler, das apostolische u. nachapostolische Zeitalter, u. s. w. Haarlem, 1852, a work which I have not seen.

13. Taking then the failure of the above objections into account, and strengthening it by anticipation with other considerations which will come before the reader as we advance, we see no reason whatever against following the universal view of the Church, and pronouncing St. Paul to be, as he is stated to be (ch. i. 1), the author of our Epistle.

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. In treating of this part of our subject, that city and church seem first to deserve notice, to which the Epistle, according to our present text, is addressed. We will first assume, that it was an Epistle to the EPHESIANS.

[7] See also "Ad Ephesios revera dabatur Epistola illa canonica, Paulo non Pseudopaulo auctore:" a Prælectio which I read at Cambridge in 1849; the chronological view of which I have seen reason since to modify, but not its argument respecting this Epistle.

2. EPHESUS, in Lydia, was situated in an alluvial plain (Herod. ii. 10) on the south side of and near the mouth of the Caystrus. "The city stood on the S. of a plain about five miles long from E. to W., and three miles broad, the N. boundary being Mount Gallesius, the E. Mount Pactyas, the S. Mount Coressus, and on the W. it was washed by the sea. The sides of the mountains were very precipitous, and shut up the plain like a stadium, or race-course." Lewin, i. p. 344. See his plan, p. 362: and the view of the site of Ephesus in C. and H. vol. ii. p. 83, edn. 2. For its ancient history, see Lewin, and C. and H. ib., and the art. 'Ephesus,' in Smith's Dict. of Geography. It was a place of great commerce (Strabo xiv. 641), but was principally noted for its beautiful temple of Artemis (Herod. i. 26; ii. 148. Strabo, l. c. Plin. v. 37. Pausan. vii. 2. 4; iv. 31. 6, &c.), which was at the head of its harbour Panormus, and was from very ancient times the centre of the worship of that goddess. This temple was burnt down by Herostratus, in the night of the birth of Alexander the Great (B.C. 355; see Plut. Alex. c. 3; Cicero de Nat. Deor. ii. 27), but rebuilt at immense cost (Strabo, l. c.), and was one of the wonders of the ancient world. On the worship of Artemis there, &c., see Acts xix. 24 ff. and notes, and Winer RWB. 'Ephesus.' The present state of the site of the city, the stadium, theatre, supposed basement of the temple, &c., are described in Smith's Dict. of Geogr., his Bible Dict., and in C. and H., as above.

3. St. Paul's first visit to Ephesus is related Acts xviii. 19—21. It was very short, as he was hastening to reach Jerusalem by the next Pentecost. The work begun by him in disputations with the Jews, was carried on by Apollos (ib. 24—26), and by Aquila and Priscilla (ib. 27). After visiting Jerusalem, and making a journey in the Eastern parts of Asia Minor, he returned thither (ib. xix. 1) and remained there τριετίαν (ib. xix.; xx. 31): during which period the founding of the Ephesian church must be dated. From what is implied in Acts xix. and xx., that church was considerable in numbers: and it had enjoyed a more than usual portion of the Apostle's own personal nursing and teaching. It will be important to bear this in mind when we come to consider the question of this section.

4. On his last recorded journey to Jerusalem he sailed by Ephesus, and summoned the elders of the Ephesian church to meet him at Miletus, where he took what he believed to be his last farewell of them, in that most characteristic and wonderful speech, Acts xx. 18—35.

5. At some subsequent time (see Prolegg. to the Pastoral Epistles), he left Timotheus behind in Ephesus, at which place the first Epistle was addressed to him (1 Tim. i. 3), and perhaps (?) the second. The state of the Ephesian church at the time of these Epistles being written, will be found discussed in the Prolegomena to them.

6. Ecclesiastical tradition has connected the Apostle John with Ephesus: see Vol. I. Prolegg. ch. v. § i. 9 ff.: and his long residence and death there may with safety be assumed.

7. To this church our Epistle is addressed, according to our present text. And there is nothing in its contents inconsistent with such an address. We find in it clear indications that its readers were mixed Jews and Gentiles[8],—that they were in an especial manner united to the Apostle in spiritual privilege and heavenly hope[9]:—that they resided in the midst of an unusually corrupt and profligate people[1].

8. Nor are minor indications wanting, which possess interest as connecting our Epistle with the narrative in the Acts. He had preached to them τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς χάριτος τοῦ θεοῦ, Acts xx. 24; and he commits them τῷ λόγῳ τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ, ib. ver. 32. In this Epistle alone, not in the contemporary and in some respects similar one to the Colossians, do we find such expressions as δόξης τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ, ch. i. 6,—τὸ πλοῦτος τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ, ib. 7, and ii. 7,—and an unusual recurrence of χάρις in all its forms and energies. If he preached among them 'the good tidings of the grace of God,' this may well be called 'the Epistle of the grace of God.' In no other of his writings, not even in the Epistle to the Romans, is grace so magnified and glorified. Again in Acts xx. 22 f. we read δεδεμένος ἐγὼ τῷ πνεύματι πορεύομαι εἰς Ἰερουσαλήμ, τὰ ἐν αὐτῇ συναντήσοντά μοι μὴ εἰδώς, πλὴν ὅτι τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον κατὰ πόλιν διαμαρτύρεταί μοι λέγων ὅτι δεσμὰ καὶ θλίψεις με μένουσιν. And accordingly, here only in his Epistles addressed to churches[8], and not in that to the Colossians, do we find him calling himself ὁ δέσμιος (ch. iii. 1; iv. 1).

He had not shrunk from declaring to them πᾶσαν τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ θεοῦ (Acts xx. 27): and accordingly, in this Epistle alone is βουλή used by St. Paul of the divine purpose,—κατὰ τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ θελήματος αὐτοῦ, ch. i. 11.

In Acts xx. 28 it is said of God and the church, ἣν περιεποιήσατο διὰ τοῦ αἵματος τοῦ ἰδίου: and in Eph. i. 14, we have the singular expression εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῆς περιποιήσεως, i. e. of that which He περιεποιήσατο (see note there).

In Acts xx. 32, he commits them to God and the word of His grace, τῷ δυναμένῳ οἰκοδομῆσαι καὶ δοῦναι τὴν κληρονομίαν ἐν τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις πᾶσιν. Not to lay any stress on the frequent recurrence of the image of οἰκοδομή, as being common in other Epistles,—the concluding words can hardly fail to recall Eph. i. 18, τίς ὁ πλοῦτος τῆς δόξης τῆς κληρονομίας αὐτοῦ ἐν τοῖς ἁγίοις,—Eph. i. 14, ὅ ἐστιν ἀρραβὼν τῆς κληρονομίας ἡμῶν,—and v. 5, οὐκ ἔχει κληρονομίαν ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ (see Acts xix. 8) τοῦ χριστοῦ καὶ θεοῦ.

9. I would not lay the stress which some have laid on the prevalence of the figure of 'the spiritual building' in this Epistle, as having any connexion with the famous temple of Diana. We should, I think, be suspicious of such supposed local and temporal references (see on 1 Cor. v. 7), unless the context (as e. g. in 1 Cor. ix. 24, 25) plainly points them out.

10. But various objections have been brought against the view that this Epistle was really addressed to the Ephesians. I will take these as recently summed up by Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, vol. ii. pp. 486 ff.

11. "First, it would be inexplicable that St. Paul, when he wrote to the Ephesians, amongst whom he had spent so long a time, and to whom he was bound by ties of such close affection (Acts xx. 17, &c.), should not have a single message of personal greeting to send. Yet none such are found in this Epistle." It may be well, in dealing with this, to examine our Apostle's practice in sending these greetings. They are found in greatest abundance in the Epistle to the Romans, written to a church which, as a church, he had never seen, but which, owing to its situation in the great metropolis, contained many of his own friends and fellow-labourers, and many friends also of those who were with him at Corinth. In 1 Cor., written to a church which he had founded, and among whom he had long resided (Acts xviii. 11), there is not one person saluted by name[3];—and one salutation only sent, from Aquila and Priscilla. In 2 Cor., not one personal salutation of either kind. In Gal., not one: a circumstance commonly accounted for by the subject and tone of the Epistle: and if there, why not here also? In Phil., not one: though an approach may be said to be made to a personal greeting in μάλιστα οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας. In Col., the Epistle sent at the same time as this, and by the same messengers, several of both kinds. In 1 Thess. and 2 Thess., none of either kind. In 1 Tim., sent to Ephesus (see Prolegg. to Pastoral Epistles), none: in 2 Tim., several of both kinds: in Philemon, salutations from brethren, but not to any.

The result at which we thus arrive, without establishing any fixed law as to the Apostle's practice, shews us how little weight such an objection as this can have. The Philippians were his dearly beloved, his joy and his crown: yet not one of them is saluted. The Galatians were his little children, of whom he was in labour till Christ should be formed in them: yet not one is saluted. The Thessalonians were imitators of him and of the Lord, patterns to all that believed in Macedonia and Achaia: yet not one of them is selected for salutation. The general salutations found in several of these cases, the total omission of all salutation in others, seem to follow no rule but the fervour of his own mind, and the free play of his feeling as he writes. The more general and solemn the subject, the less he seems to give of these individual notices: the better he knows those to whom he is writing, as a whole, the less he seems disposed to select particular persons for his affectionate remembrance. May we not then conceive it to be natural, that in writing to a church with which he had been so long and intimately acquainted, in writing too on so grand and solemn a subject as the constitution and prospects of Christ's universal church, he should pass over all personal notices, referring them as he does to Tychicus, the bearer of the Epistle? I own I am unable to see any thing improbable in this:—but it seems to me, as far as we can trace his practice, to be in accordance with it.

[3] It is plain that the salutations sent from persons who were with the Apostle, would depend on his circumstances at the time, and on the connexion between those with him and the church to which he was writing. When he wrote from Corinth to Rome they were abundant.

12. "Secondly, he could not have described the Ephesians as a church whose conversion he knew only by report" (ch. i. 15).

The answer to this is very simple. First, he nowhere says that he knew their conversion only by report, but what he does say is, ἀκούσας τὴν καθ' ὑμᾶς πίστιν ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ Ἰησοῦ, καὶ τὴν [ἀγάπην τὴν] εἰς πάντας τοὺς ἁγίους: an expression having no reference whatever to their conversion, but pointing to the report which he had received of their abounding in Christian graces;—and perfectly consistent with, nay, explained as it seems to me most simply on, the hypothesis of his having known their previous circumstances well. Any supposition of allusion to their conversion robs the καθ' ὑμᾶς of its fine distributive force, and misses the point of the sentence. But, secondly, if there were any doubt on this point,—if any were disposed to charge us with thus understanding the words merely as a help out of the difficulty,—their meaning is decided for us by the Apostle himself. Philemon was his ἀγαπητός and συνεργός (Philem. 1). He was his son in the faith (ib. ver. 19). Yet he addresses him in almost the same words, and in the same connexion with εὐχαριστῶν κ.τ.λ. He says, ἀκούων σου τὴν ἀγάπην καὶ τὴν πίστιν ἣν ἔχεις εἰς τὸν κύριον Ἰησοῦν καὶ εἰς πάντας τοὺς ἁγίους. It is strange that after this had been pointed out, the objection should ever have been again raised.

13. "Thirdly, he could not speak to them as only knowing himself (the founder of their church) to be an Apostle by hearsay (ch. iii. 2), so as to need credentials to accredit him with them" (iii. 4).

This objection, as will be seen by the notes on iii. 2, is founded on inattention to the force of εἴ γε[1], and of the aorist ἠκούσατε. The meaning is not, as E. V., 'If ye have heard,' implying a doubt whether they ever had heard, but as given in my note in loc., 'If, that is, ye heard,'—i. e. 'assuming that, when I was with you, ye heard;' and the words convey a reminiscence of that which they did hear. The cre-

[1] In Conybeare's version he gives the force of εἴ γε, but, as so often, renders the aorist by a perfect, 'for I suppose that you have heard.'

dential view of ver. 4 falls with this mistaken rendering of ver. 2: not to mention that it could not for a moment stand, even were that other possible, the reference being to what was before written in ch. i.[5]

14. "Fourthly, he could not describe the Ephesians as so exclusively Gentiles (ch. ii. 11; iv. 17), and so recently converted" (v. 8: i. 13; ii. 13).

To the former objection I reply, 1) that the Ephesian church, as other churches out of Judæa, would naturally be composed for the most part of Gentiles, and as such would be addressed in the main as Gentiles: so we have him writing to the Romans, xi. 13, ὑμῖν δὲ λέγω τοῖς ἔθνεσιν. And if exception be taken to this reference, and it be understood as rather marking off the Gentile portion of those to whom he was then writing, the same exception cannot be taken to 1 Cor. xii. 2, where, in writing to a mixed church (Acts xviii. 4, 8), he says, almost in the same words as in Eph. ii. 11, οἴδατε ὅτι ὅτε ἔθνη ἦτε, κ.τ.λ.: 2) that in this Epistle, of all others, we might expect to find the distinction between Jew and Gentile pass into the background, the subject being, the constitution and glories of the universal Church: 3) that, as before remarked (under 7), indications are not wanting of the mixed composition of the Ephesian Church. Surely the ἵνα τοὺς δύο κτίσῃ ἐν αὐτῷ εἰς ἕνα καινὸν ἄνθρωπον (ii. 15) would not have been written to a Church exclusively Gentile.

To the latter objection I answer, that in no one of the passages cited is there the slightest intimation of their having been recently converted;—but, if any temporal conclusion can be drawn from them, all three testify rather to a considerable period having elapsed since that event. In ch. v. 8 we have, ἦτε γὰρ ποτὲ σκότος, νῦν δὲ φῶς ἐν κυρίῳ: in i. 13, ἐν ᾧ καὶ πιστεύσαντες ἐσφραγίσθητε . . .: in ii. 13, ὑμεῖς οἱ ποτὲ ὄντες μακρὰν ἐγενήθητε ἐγγύς.

Of the first and third of these, we may observe that the same ποτέ designates their unconverted state, by which he designates his own in Gal. i. 13, 23 bis, Tit. iii. 3: yet his conversion was by many years antecedent to that of the Ephesians. Of the second and third, that the aorists serve to remove both the things spoken out of the category of recent events. Had their conversion been recent, and its presence, as an act, still abiding, we should have read perfects here and not aorists[6].

15. Having endeavoured to give a reply to these internal objections to the Ephesian view of the Epistle, I go on to notice the external difficulties besetting the view which I have taken.

[5] This indeed is confessed in Conybeare's note, in loc. p. 497.

[6] The force of the former aorist is preserved in Conybeare's version, "you believed in him and received his seal:" but the latter is made into a perfect, "ye who were once far off have been brought near;" this not being one of those cases where νυνί makes such a rendering in English necessary. See note there.

16. They may be summed up in a discussion of the various reading in ch. i. 1 (see var. readings), by which ἐν Ἐφέσῳ is omitted from the text. Basil the Great, contra Eunom. ii. 19, vol. i. p. 254 f., says: τοῖς Ἐφεσίοις ἐπιστέλλων ὡς γνησίως ἡνωμένοις τῷ ὄντι διʼ ἐπιγνώσεως, ὄντας αὐτοὺς ἰδιαζόντως ὠνόμασεν εἰπών· τοῖς ἁγίοις τοῖς οὖσιν καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. οὕτω γὰρ οἱ πρὸ ἡμῶν παραδεδώκασι, καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐν τοῖς παλαιοῖς τῶν ἀντιγράφων εὑρήκαμεν. From this we infer, that Basil received our Epistle as really written to the Ephesians, but read ch. i. 1 without the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, both traditionally, and because he had seen it so read in ancient MSS. The testimony then does not touch the recognition of the Epistle as written to the Ephesians, but simply the insertion or omission of the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ in the text; a matter with which we will deal below.

17. "This assertion of Basil's is confirmed by Jerome, Epiphanius, and Tertullian." C. and H. vol. ii. p. 487.

(a) Jerome: "Quidam . . putant . . . eos qui Ephesi sunt sancti et fideles essentiæ vocabulo nuncupatos, ut . . . ab eo qui EST, hi qui SUNT appellentur. . . . Alii vero simpliciter non ad eos qui sint (al. sunt), sed qui Ephesi sancti et fideles sint, scriptum arbitrantur." Ad Eph. i. 1, vol. vii. p. 545.

Doubtless this may point to the various reading, and I have allowed it in the Digest as a testimony that way: but it is by no means a decisive one. It may be fairly interpreted on the contrary hypothesis, as indeed Meyer takes it. "Eos qui Ephesi sunt sancti et fideles" represents τοῖς ἁγίοις τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ καὶ πιστοῖς. This he may be assumed to have read without dispute. Then he proceeds to say, that τοῖς οὖσιν was interpreted in two ways: either as an essentiæ vocabulum, or as belonging to ἐν Ἐφέσῳ. His whole sentence need not point to any omission of the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ.

(b) "Epiphanius quotes Eph. iv. 5, 6, from Marcion's πρὸς Λαοδικέας." C. and H. ib., note.

But to this I must demur, for Epiphanius in reality does no such thing. Having cited the words, εἷς κύριος, μία πίστις κ.τ.λ., he proceeds, οὐ γὰρ ἔδοξε τῷ ἐλεεινοτάτῳ Μαρκίωνι ἀπὸ τῆς πρὸς Ἐφεσίους ταύτην τὴν μαρτυρίαν λέγειν, ἀλλʼ ἀπὸ τῆς πρὸς Λαοδικέας (i. 3. 12, vol. i. p. 375). Therefore his testimony shews merely what we knew before, that Marcion, among his recognized Epistles of St. Paul, had καὶ πρὸς Λαοδικέας λεγομένης μέρη:—that this passage was one of such μέρη;—and that Epiphanius blames him for not quoting it from the Epistle to the Ephesians, where accordingly we infer that he himself read it.

Hence it is commonly argued, and conceded even by Meyer (Einl. p. 4), that Tertullian did not read the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, or he would have charged Marcion with endeavouring to falsify the text as well as to supply a new title. Certainly, it might be so: but it might also be, that he used the word titulum in a wide sense, including the title and the corresponding portion of the text. It might be again, since, as Epiphanius tells us (see above), Marcion acknowledged only fragments of an Epistle to the Laodiceans, that the beginning of our Epistle was not among them.

18. If it be thought necessary to deal with the fact of the omission of ἐν Ἐφέσῳ in B and other ancient MSS., we may find at least an illustration of it in the words ἐν Ῥώμῃ (Rom. i. 7) being omitted in G al. It seems to have been done with reference to the catholic subject of the Epistle, very possibly by churches among whom it was read, and with a view to generalize the reference of its contents [7].

19. It is necessary now to deal with two hypotheses respecting the readers to whom our Epistle was addressed; both obviously falling to the ground with the genuineness of the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, but requiring also separate treatment. The first of these is, that it was to the Laodiceans. So (see above) Marcion: so Grot., Hammond, Mill, Pierce, Wetst., Paley, and many more. But this idea has not even tradition to stand on. All the consensus of the ancient Church is against it. It has nothing to rest on but conjecture, arising out of the mention of an Epistle ἐκ Λαοδικείας, in Col. iv. 16, which seems to have induced Marcion to alter the title. No single MS. fills in the gap produced by omitting ἐν Ἐφέσῳ with the words ἐν Λαοδικείᾳ. Again, if this had been really so, is it conceivable that the Laodicean church would without protest and without any remaining sign of their right to the Epistle, have allowed that right to be usurped by the Ephesians and universally acknowledged by the church as theirs? See other minor difficulties of the hypothesis alleged by Meyer, Einl. pp. 9, 10, 19, and Harless, Einl. p. xxxix. This failing, another way has been struck out, possessing much more plausibility, and gaining many more adherents [1]. It has been supposed that the Epistle was encyclical, addressed to more churches than Ephesus only. But I cannot help regarding this hypothesis as even less worthy of our acceptance than the other. It has against it, 1) and chiefly, its total discrepancy with the spirit of the Epistle, which, to whomsoever sent, is clearly addressed to one set of persons throughout, coexisting in one place, and as one body, and under the same circumstances: 2) the improbability that the Apostle, who in two of his Epistles (2 Cor., Gal.) has so plainly specified their encyclical character, should have here omitted all such specification: 3) the even greater improbability that he should have, as on this hypothesis must be assumed, written a circular Epistle to a district of which Ephesus was the commercial capital[2], addressed to various churches within that district, yet from its very contents (as by the opponents' hypothesis) not admitting of application to the church of that metropolis, in which he had spent so long a time, and to which he was so affectionately bound: 4) the inconsistency of this hypothesis with the address of the Epistle, and the universal consensus of the ancient church, who, however they read that address, had no doubt of its being properly entitled. Nor is this objection removed by the form of the hypothesis suggested by C. and H., that copies were sent, differently superscribed, which superscriptions, perplexing the copyists, were left out, and then, as copies of the Epistle became spread over the world,—all imported from Ephesus, it was called 'the Epistle from Ephesus,' and so the name of Ephesus came into the text:—for this would, besides being very far-fetched and improbable, not account for the consensus throughout the church, in the Asiatic portion of which, at least, traces of the accurate addresses would be preserved. 5) Another objection, running counter to 1) but not therefore inconsistent with it, is that if it had been encyclical, some notice at least would have been found of special local (or rather regional) circumstances, as in those to the Corinthians and Galatians. The absence of such notice might easily be accounted for, if it were indeed written to the Ephesians alone: but not, if to various Asiatic churches, some of which were so far from having the Ephesians' intimacy with the Apostle, that they had never even seen him. There could be no reason for his addressing in common the churches of Laodicea, Hierapolis, Philadelphia, and others (I take the names from C. and H. ii. 489), except the existence of some common special dangers, and need of some common special exhortation, of neither of which do we find any hint. See various ramifications of this hypothesis dealt with and refuted in Meyer, Einl. pp. 11—13.

[7] See Meyer, Einl. p. 7.

[1] The hypothesis was started by Usher, in his Annals, on the year 64; and is upheld by Bengel, Benson, Michaelis, Schmidt, Eichhorn, Hug, Flatt, Hemsen, Schott, Feilmoser, Schrader, Guerike, Schneckenburger, Neander, Rückert, Credner, Matthies, Harless, Olshausen, Stier, Conybeare and Howson, and many more, with various subhypotheses as to the central church to which it was sent and the means by which it was to be circulated.

20. I infer then, in accordance with the prevalent belief of the Church in all ages, that this Epistle was VERITABLY ADDRESSED TO THE SAINTS IN EPHESUS, and TO NO OTHER CHURCH.

[2] See C. and H. ii. 489.

ITS OCCASION, OBJECT, AND CONTENTS.

1. The contents of the Epistle afford no indication of its having sprung out of any special circumstances of the Ephesian church. Tychicus and Onesimus were being sent to Colossæ. The former was charged with a weighty Epistle to the church there, arising out of peculiar dangers which beset them; the latter, with a private apostolic letter of recommendation to his former master, also a resident at Colossæ. Under these circumstances, the yearning heart of St. Paul went forth to his Ephesians. He thought of them as a church in Christ of his own planting—as the mystic Body of Christ, growing onwards for an habitation of God through the Spirit. And, full of such thoughts, he wrote this Epistle to them at the same time with, or immediately subsequent to, his penning of that to the Colossians (on their relation, see below, § vi., and principally, Prolegg. to Col. § iv. 4 ff.).

2. This being so, the object of the Epistle is a general one—to set forth the ground, the course, the aim and end, of the CHURCH OF THE FAITHFUL IN CHRIST. He speaks to the Ephesians as a type or sample of the Church universal. He writes to them not as an ecclesiastical father, united with others, Timotheus or the like, directing and cautioning them,—but as their Apostle and prisoner in the Lord, bound for them, and set to reveal God's mysteries to them.

3. To this intent and this spirit the contents admirably correspond. Through the whole Epistle, without one exception, we read of ἡ ἐκκλησία in the singular, never of ἐκκλησίαι in the plural. Of this Church, through the whole, he describes the origin and foundation, the work and course, the scope and end. Every where, both in its larger and smaller portions, this threefold division is found. I have endeavoured, in the notes, to point it out, as far as my space would enable me: and those who wish to see it traced yet further, will find this done even with more minuteness than I should be disposed in every particular to subscribe, in Stier's very elaborate and diffuse commentary. But in fact, the trichotomy respecting the Church rests upon another, and sublimer yet. Every where with him the origin and foundation of the Church is in the WILL OF THE FATHER, τοῦ τὰ πάντα ἐνεργοῦντος κατὰ τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ θελήματος αὐτοῦ,—the work and course of the Church is by the SATISFACTION OF THE SON, by our υἱοθεσίαν διὰ Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ,—the scope and end of the Church is the LIFE IN THE HOLY SPIRIT,—δυνάμει κραταιωθῆναι διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος αὐτοῦ εἰς τὸν ἔσω ἄνθρωπον.

4. The various sections will be found indicated in the notes. I will here give only a general summary of the Epistle.—In ch. i., after the introduction of the subject by an ascription of praise to the Father, who chose us to be holy to Himself in Christ by the Spirit [3], he opens the counsel of the Father [4], whose will it was to sum up all things in Christ [5], and above all His Church [6], composed of Jews and Gentiles, believers in Christ, and sealed with His Spirit. Then with a sublime prayer, that the eyes of their hearts might be enlightened to see the magnitude of the matter [7], he brings in the PERSON OF CHRIST [8], exalted above all for His Church's sake, to which God hath given Him as Head over all things. Thence [9] he passes to the fact of their own vivification in and with Christ, and the fellowship of the mystery which he, the Apostle of the Gentiles, was set to proclaim to the world, viz. that spiritual life, by which, rooted and grounded in love, they might come to know the knowledge-passing love of Christ, that they might be filled up to all the fulness of God. Thus having laid forth the ground, course, and scope of the Church, he ends this first part of his Epistle with a sublime doxology [1].

The rest from ch. iv. 1, is principally hortatory: but here also we have the same tripartite division. For he begins by explaining [2] the constitution of the Church, in unity and charity and spiritual gifts, by Christ: then [3] he exhorts to all these graces which illustrate the Christian life,—laying the foundation of each in the counsel of God towards us,—and proposing to us their end, our salvation and God's glory. And this he carries [4] into the common duties of ordinary life—into wedlock, and filial and servile relations. After this, in a magnificent peroration [5], he exhorts to the putting on of the Christian armour, by which the great end of the militant Church may be attained, to withstand in the evil day, and having accomplished all things, to stand firm. And most aptly, when this is concluded, he sums up all with the Catholic benediction and prayer of ch. vi. 23, 24.

SECTION IV.

AT WHAT TIME AND PLACE IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. When St. Paul wrote our Epistle, he was a PRISONER; ch. iii. 1; iv. 1; vi. 20. This narrows our choice of time to two occasions, supposing it to have been written before the period when the history in the Acts terminates:

A) his imprisonment at Jerusalem and Cæsarea (Acts xxi. 27—xxvi. 32), from Pentecost 58, to the autumn of 60 (see Chronological Table in Vol. II. Prolegg. pp. 23—25):

B) his imprisonment at Rome, commencing in February 61, and lasting to the end of the history in the Acts, and probably longer.

[3] ver. 3 ff. [4] ver. 8 ff. [5] ver. 10. [6] ver. 11 ff.
[7] ver. 15 ff. [8] ver. 20 ff. [9] ch. ii. 1 ff. [1] iii. 20 f.
[2] ch. iv. 1—16. [3] iv. 17. v. 21. [4] v. 22—vi. 9. [5] vi. 10—20.

2. Further, the three Epistles, to the Colossians, Ephesians, and Philemon, it can hardly be questioned, were sent at one and the same time. The two former are connected as well by their great similarity of contents, as by the fact that Tychicus was the common bearer of both: the two latter, by the common mention of Onesimus as sent to Colossæ, and the common mention of Epaphras, Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, as sending salutations. In speaking therefore of the time and place of writing this Epistle, we are dealing with those others likewise.

3. The view (A) has been taken by some distinguished scholars of modern times in Germany; Schulz (Stud. u. Krit. 1829, p. 612 f.), Schneckenburger (Beitr. p. 144 f.), Schott, Böttger, Wiggers (Stud. u. Krit. 1811, p. 436 ff.), Thiersch (die Kirche im apostol. Zeitalter, 1852, p. 176), and Meyer (Einl. p. 15 ff.).

4. The arguments by which it is supported are best and most compendiously stated by Meyer, and are as follows:

a) Because it is more natural and probable that the slave Onesimus fled from Colossæ to Cæsarea, than that he undertook a long sea-voyage to Rome.

b) If our Epistle and that to the Colossians were sent from Rome, Tychicus and his fellow-traveller Onesimus would arrive first at Ephesus and then at Colossæ: in which case we might expect that St. Paul would, in his notice of Tychicus to the Ephesians (ch. vi. 21, 22), have named Onesimus also, as he has done in Col. iv. 8, 9, to gain for his beloved Onesimus a good reception in Ephesus also. Whereas, if Tychicus and Onesimus travelled from Cæsarea, they would come first, according to the purpose of Onesimus's journey, to Colossæ, where the slave would be left with his master,—and thence to Ephesus: in which case Onesimus would naturally be named in the Epistle to the Colossians, and not in that to the Ephesians.

c) In Eph. vi. 21, ἵνα δὲ εἰδῆτε καὶ ὑμεῖς—καί shews that, when Tychicus should arrive at Ephesus, he would already have reported the affairs of the Apostle to some others. These others are the Colossians, whom Paul knew that he would visit first: which again speaks for Cæsarea, and not for Rome, as the place of writing. Had it been the latter, the καί would have appeared in Col. iv. 8, not in Eph. vi. 21.

d) In Philem. 22, the Apostle begs Philemon to prepare him a lodging, and seems to anticipate occupying it soon; which assumes a direct journey to Phrygia after his liberation, which he would reach almost contemporaneously with the arrival of Onesimus. Now it appears from Phil. ii. 24, that on his liberation from his Roman imprisonment, he intended to go to Macedonia, which is inconsistent with visiting Philemon.

5. The view (B) has been the general belief from ancient times downwards. Its upholders urge that every circumstance of the Epistle fits it; and reply to the considerations urged above, a) That there is no weight in this: a fugitive slave would be in fact more likely than otherwise to get on board ship and take refuge in the great metropolis. And there, notwithstanding what Meyer says to the contrary, he would be more likely to escape the search of the 'fugitivarii,' whose knowledge and occupation, we may presume, were principally local, hardly in strict organization over the whole empire.

b) This evidently requires, to be good for any thing, the assumption, that it fell in with the Apostle's plan, to recommend Onesimus to the Ephesians. But in the absence of any allusion to personal matters in this Epistle,—in the reference of all such things to Tychicus,—accordant with the very general purpose and subject of the Epistle itself, this assumption cannot be received. Meyer argues that the general character of our Epistle cannot be pleaded with regard to the one passage in it which is individual and personal. But surely, it is perfectly legitimate to say, even with regard to such a passage, that the same plan, which induced the Apostle to insert only one such passage in the Epistle, would also induce him to insert one personal notice only in such passage. To found an argument on any such omission in our Epistle, would be unsafe.

c) This, it is maintained, falls entirely to the ground on the different rendering of καί, adopted in the following commentary (see note in loc.),—viz. referring it, not to another party who were to receive notices of the Apostle, besides those to whom he was writing, but to the reciprocal introduction of ὑμεῖς, 'you also concerning me, as I have been long treating concerning you.'

d) No argument can be raised on ground so entirely uncertain as this. It is very possible that altered circumstances may from time to time have changed the Apostle's plans; and that, as we have some reason to believe his projected journey to Spain (Rom. xv. 22—24) to have been relinquished, or at all events postponed,—so also other projected journeys may have been, according as different churches seemed to require his presence, or new fields of missionary work to open before him. Besides which, it may be fairly said, that there is nothing inconsistent in the two expressions, of Phil. ii. 23 and Philem. 22, with the idea of the Apostle projecting a land journey through Greece to Asia Minor: or at all events a general visitation, by what route he may not as yet have determined, which should embrace both Philippi and Colossæ.

6. On the positive side of this view (B), it is alleged, that the circumstances of the Roman imprisonment suit those of these Epistles better than those of the Cæsarean. From Eph. vi. 19, 20, we gather that he had a certain amount of freedom in preaching the Gospel, which is hardly consistent with what we read in Acts xxiv. 23 of his imprisonment at Cæsarea, where, from the necessity of the case, a stricter watch was requisite (cf. Acts xxiii. 21), and none but those ascertained to be his friends (οἱ ἴδιοι αὐτοῦ) were permitted to see him. Among any such multitude of Jews as came to his lodgings on the other occasion, Acts xxviii. 23 ff., might easily be introduced some of the conspirators, against whom he was being guarded.

Besides, we may draw some inference from his companions, as mentioned in these Epistles. Tychicus, Onesimus, Aristarchus, Marcus, Jesus Justus, Epaphras, Lucas, Demas, were all with him. Of these it is very possible that Lucas and Aristarchus may have been at Cæsarea during his imprisonment, for we find them both accompanying him to Rome, Acts xxvii. 1, 2. But it certainly is not so probable that all these were with him at one time in Cæsarea. The two, Lucas and Aristarchus, are confessedly common to both hypotheses. Then we may safely ask, In which of the two places is it more probable that six other of his companions were found gathered round him? In the great metropolis, where we already know, from Rom. xvi., that so many of the brethren were sojourning,—or at Cæsarea, which, though the most important place in Palestine, would have no attraction to gather so many of his friends, except the prospect of sailing thence with him, which we know none of them did?

Perhaps this is a question which never can be definitely settled, so as absolutely to preclude the Cæsarean hypothesis: but I own it appears to me that the whole weight of probability is on the Roman side. Those who firmly believe in the genuineness of this Epistle, will find another reason why it should be placed at Rome, at an interval of from three to five years after the Apostle's parting with the Ephesians in Acts xx., rather than at Cæsarea, so close upon that event. In this latter case, the absence of all special notices would be far more surprising than it is at present.

7. We may then, I believe, safely assume that our Epistle was written FROM ROME,—and that probably during the period comprised in Acts xxviii. 30, before St. Paul's imprisonment assumed that harsher character which seems to come before us in the Epistle to the Philippians (see Prolegg. to that Epistle, § iii.).

8. This would bring the time of writing it within the limits A.D. 61—63: and we should not perhaps be far wrong in dating it A.D. 62.

SECTION V.

ITS LANGUAGE AND STYLE.

1. As might be expected from the account given of the object of our Epistle in § iii., the thoughts and language are elevated and sublime; and that to such a degree, that it takes, in this respect, a place of its own among the writings of St. Paul: ὑψηλῶν σφόδρα γέμει τῶν νοημάτων καὶ ὑπερόγκων· ἃ γὰρ μηδαμοῦ σχεδὸν ἐφθέγξατο, ταῦτα ἐνταῦθα δηλοῖ, Chrys., who subjoins examples of this from ch. iii. 10; ii. 6; iii. 5. Theophylact says, ἐπεὶ οὖν δεισιδαίμων τε ἦν οὕτως ἡ πόλις, καὶ οὕτω σοφοῖς ἐκόμα, πολλῇ σπουδῇ κέχρηται Παῦλος πρὸς τοὺς τοιούτους γράφων, καὶ τὰ βαθύτερα δὲ τῶν νοημάτων καὶ ὑψηλότερα αὐτοῖς ἐπίστευσεν, ἅτε κατηχημένοις ἤδη. So also Grotius, in his preface: "Paulus jam vetus in apostolico munere, et ob Evangelium Romæ vinctus, ostendit illis quanta sit vis Evangelii præ doctrinis omnibus: quomodo omnia Dei consilia ab omni ævo eo tetenderint, quam admiranda sit in eo Dei efficacia, rerum sublimitatem adæquans verbis sublimioribus quam ulla unquam habuit lingua humana." Witsius, in his Meletemata Leidensia (p. 192; cited by Dr. Eadie, Commentary on the Ephesians, Introd. p. xxxi) thus characterizes it: "Ita vero universam religionis Christianæ summam divina hac epistola exponit, ut exuberantem quandam non sermonis tantum evangelici παῤῥησίαν, sed et Spiritus Sancti vim et sensum, et charitatis Christianæ flammam quandam ex electo illo pectore emicantem, et lucis divinæ fulgorem quendam admirabilem inde elucentem, et fontem aquæ vivæ inde scaturientem, aut ebullientem potius, animadvertere liceat: idque tanta copia, ut superabundans illa cordis plenitudo, ipsa animi sensa intimosque conceptus, conceptus autem verba prolata, verba denique priora quæque subsequentia, premant, urgeant, obruant."

2. These characteristics contribute to make our Epistle by far the most difficult of all the writings of St. Paul. Elsewhere, as in the Epistles to the Romans, Galatians, and Colossians, the difficulties lie for the most part at or near the surface: a certain degree of study will master, not indeed the mysteries of redemption which are treated of, but the contextual coherence, and the course of the argument: or if not so, will at least serve to point out to every reader where the hard texts lie, and to bring out into relief each point with which he has to deal: whereas here the difficulties lie altogether beneath the surface; are not discernible by the cursory reader, who finds all very straightforward and simple. We may deduce an illustration from secular literature. Every moderately advanced schoolboy believes he can construe Sophocles; he does not see the difficulties which await him, when he becomes a mature scholar, in that style apparently so simple. So here also, but for a different reason. All on the surface is smooth, and flows on unquestioned by the untheological reader: but when we begin to enquire, why thought succeeds to thought, and one cumbrous parenthesis to another,—depths under depths disclose themselves, wonderful systems of parallel allusion, frequent and complicated underplots; every word, the more we search, approves itself as set in its exact logical place; we see every phrase contributing, by its own similar organization and articulation, to the carrying out of the organic whole. But this result is not won without much labour of thought, —without repeated and minute laying together of portions and expressions,—without bestowing on single words and phrases, and their succession and arrangement, as much study as would suffice for whole sections of the more exoteric Epistles.

3. The student of the Epistle to the Ephesians must not expect to go over his ground rapidly; must not be disappointed, if the week's end find him still on the same paragraph, or even on the same verse, weighing and judging,—penetrating gradually, by the power of the mind of the Spirit, through one outer surface after another,—gathering in his hand one and another ramifying thread, till at last he grasps the main cord whence they all diverged, and where they all unite,—and stands rejoicing in his prize, deeper rooted in the faith, and with a firmer hold on the truth as it is in Christ.

4. And as the wonderful effect of the Spirit of inspiration on the mind of man is nowhere in Scripture more evident than in this Epistle, so, to discern those things of the Spirit, is the spiritual mind here more than any where required. We may shew this by reference to De Wette, one of the ablest of Commentators. I have mentioned above, § i. 6, that he approaches this Epistle with an unfortunate and unworthy prejudgment of its spuriousness. He never thinks of applying to it that humble and laborious endeavour which rendered his commentary on the Romans among the most valuable in existence. It is not too much to say, that on this account he has missed almost every point in the Epistle: that his Handbuch, in this part of it, is hardly better than works of third-rate or fourth-rate men: and just for this reason—that he has never come to it with any view of learning from it, but with the averted eyes of a prejudiced man. Take, as a contrast, the two laborious volumes of Stier. Here, I would not deny, we have the opposite course carried into extreme: but with all Stier's faults of too minute classification,—of wearisome length in exegesis,—of unwillingness to lose, and attempts to combine, every divergent sense of the same passage,—we have the precious and most necessary endowment of spiritual discernment,—acquaintance with the analogy of the faith. And in consequence, the acquisition to the Church of Christ from his minute dissection of this Epistle has been most valuable; and sets future students, with regard to it, on higher spiritual ground than they ever occupied before.

5. It is not to be wondered at, where the subject is sui generis, and treated of in a method and style unusually sublime, that the ἅπαξ λεγόμενα should be in this Epistle more in number than common, as well as the ideas and images peculiar to it. The student will find both these pointed out and treated of in the references and the notes. I would again impress on him, as against De Wette and others, that all such phænomena, instead of telling against its genuineness, are in its favour, and that strongly. Any skilful forger would not perhaps make his work a mere cento from existing undoubted expressions of St. Paul, but at all events would write on new matter in the Apostle's well-known phraseology, avoiding all words and ideas which were in his writings entirely without example.

SECTION VI.

ITS RELATION TO THE EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS.

1. I reserve the full discussion of this subject to the chapter on the Epistle to the Colossians. It would be premature, until the student is in full possession of the object and occasion of that Epistle, to institute our comparison between the two.

2. It may suffice at present to say what may be just enough, as regards the distinctive character of the Epistle to the Ephesians. And this may be done by remarking, that we have here, in the midst of words and images common to the two, an entire absence of all controversial allusion, and of all assertion as against maintainers of doctrinal error. The Christian state, and its realization in the Church, is the one subject, and is not disturbed by any looking to the deviations from that state on either hand, nor guarded, except from that fundamental and directly subversive error of impure and unholy practice.

CHAPTER III.

THE EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS.

ITS AUTHORSHIP AND INTEGRITY.

1. It has been all but universally believed that this Epistle was written by St. Paul. Indeed, considering its peculiarly Pauline psychological character, the total absence from it of all assignable motive for falsification, the spontaneity and fervour of its effusions of feeling, he must be a bold man who would call its authorship in question[1].

2. Yet this has been done, partially by Schrader (der Apost. Paulus, vol. v.: see especially p. 233, line 14 from bottom, and following), who supposed ch. iii. 1—iv. 9 interpolated, as well as shorter passages elsewhere, conceding however the Pauline authorship in the main: and entirely by Baur (Paulus Ap. Jesu Christi u.s.w., pp. 458—475), on his usual ground of later Gnostic ideas being found in the Epistle. To those who would see an instance of the very insanity of hypercriticism, I recommend the study of these pages of Baur. They are almost as good by way of burlesque, as the "Historic Doubts respecting Napoleon Buonaparte" of Abp. Whately. According to him, all usual expressions prove its spuriousness, as being taken from other Epistles: all unusual expressions prove the same, as being from another than St. Paul. Poverty of thought, and want of point, are charged against it in one page: in another, excess of point, and undue vigour of expression. Certainly the genuineness of the Epistle will never suffer in the great common-sense verdict of mankind, from Baur's attack. There is hardly an argument used by him, that may not more naturally be reversed and turned against himself.

3. In external testimonies, our Epistle is rich.

(α) Polycarp, ad Philipp. iii., p. 1008, testifies to the fact of St. Paul having written to them,

> . . . . Παύλου . . . . ὃς καὶ ἀπὼν ὑμῖν ἔγραψεν [2] ἐπιστολάς, εἰς ἃς ἐὰν ἐγκύπτητε, δυνηθήσεσθε οἰκοδομεῖσθαι εἰς τὴν δοθεῖσαν ὑμῖν πίστιν.

(β) And ib. xi., pp. 1013 f., he writes,

> "Ego autem nihil tale sensi in vobis, vel audivi, in quibus laboravit beatus Paulus, qui estis (laudati) in principio epistolæ ejus. De vobis etenim gloriatur in omnibus ecclesiis quæ Deum solæ tunc cognoverant." Cf. Phil. i. 5 ff.

(γ) Irenæus, iv. 18. 4, p. 251:

> "Quemadmodum et Paulus Philippensibus (iv. 18) ait: Repletus sum acceptis ab Epaphrodito, quæ a vobis missa sunt, odorem suavitatis, hostiam acceptabilem, placentem Deo."

(δ) Clement of Alexandria, Pædag. i. 6 [52], p. 129 P.:

> αὐτοῦ ὁμολογοῦντος τοῦ Παύλου περὶ ἑαυτοῦ οὐχ ὅτι ἤδη ἔλαβον ἢ ἤδη τετελείωμαι κ.τ.λ. Phil. iii. 12—14.

In Strom. iv. 3 [12], p. 569 P., he quotes Phil. ii. 20: in id. 5 [19], p. 572, Phil. i. 13: in id. 13 [94], p. 604, Phil. i. 29, 30; ii. 1 ff., 17; i. 7; and ii. 20 ff., &c. &c.

(ε) In the Epistle of the Churches of Lyons and Vienne, in Euseb.

[2] Not necessarily to be understood of more than one Epistle. See Coteler and Hefele in loc.

H. E. v. 2, the words ὃς ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων οὐχ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ are cited. Cf. Phil. ii. 6.

(ζ) Tertullian, de resurr. carnis, c. 23, vol. ii. p. 826:

"Ipse (Paulus, from the preceding sentence) cum Philippensibus scribit: siqua, inquit, concurram in resuscitationem quæ est a mortuis, non quia jam accepi aut consummatus sum," &c. &c. Phil. iii. 11 ff.

(η) The same author devotes the 20th chapter of his fifth book against Marcion (p. 522 f.) to testimonies from this Epistle, and shews that Marcion acknowledged it. And de præscr. c. 36, p. 49, among the places to which 'authenticæ literæ' of the Apostle's 'recitantur,' he says, 'habes Philippos.'

(θ) Cyprian, Testt. iii. 39, p. 756:

"Item Paulus ad Philippenses: Qui in figura Dei constitutus," &c. ch. ii. 6—11.

4. It has been hinted above, that Schrader doubted the integrity of our Epistle. This has also been done in another form by Heinrichs, who fancied it made up of two letters,—one to the Church, containing chaps. i. ii., to ἐν κυρίῳ iii. 1, and iv. 21—23: the other to private friends, beginning at τὰ αὐτὰ γράφειν, iii. 1, and containing the rest with the above exception. Paulus also adopted a modification of this view. But it is hardly necessary to say, that it is altogether without foundation. The remarks below (§ iv.) on its style will serve to account for any seeming want of exact juncture between one part and another.

FOR WHAT READERS AND WITH WHAT OBJECT IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. The city of PHILIPPI has been described, and the πρώτη τῆς μερίδος τῆς Μακεδονίας πόλις, κολωνία discussed, in the notes on Acts xvi. 12 ff., to which the student is referred. I shall now notice only the foundation and condition of the Philippian Church.

2. The Gospel was first planted there by Paul, Silas, and Timotheus (Acts xvi. 12 ff.), in the second missionary journey of the Apostle, in A.D. 51. (See Chron. Table in Prolegg. to Acts.) There we read of only a few conversions, which however became a rich and prolific seed of future fruit. He must have visited it again on his journey from Ephesus into Macedonia, Acts xx. 1; and he is recorded to have done so (a third time), when, owing to a change of plan to avoid the machinations of his enemies, the Jews at Corinth, he returned to Asia through Macedonia; see Acts xx. 6. But we have no particulars of either of these visits.

3. The cruel treatment of the Apostle at Philippi (Acts xvi. l. c. 1 Thess. ii. 2) seems to have combined with the charm of his personal fervour of affection to knit up a bond of more than ordinary love between him and the Philippian Church. They, alone of all churches, sent subsidies to relieve his temporal necessities, on two several occasions, immediately after his departure from them (Phil. iv. 15, 16; 1 Thess. ii. 2): and they revived the same good office to him shortly before the writing of this Epistle (Phil. iv. 10, 18; 2 Cor. xi. 9).

4. This affectionate disposition may perhaps be partly accounted for by the fact of Jews being so few at Philippi. There was no synagogue there, only a προσευχή by the river side: and the opposition to the Apostle arose not from Jews, but from the masters of the dispossessed maiden, whose hope of gain was gone. Thus the element which resisted St. Paul in every Church, was wanting, or nearly so, in the Philippian. His fervent affection met there, and almost there only, with a worthy and entire return. And all who know what the love of a warm-hearted people to a devoted minister is, may imagine what it would be between such a flock and such a shepherd. (See below, on the style of the Epistle.)

5. But while this can hardly be doubted, it is equally certain that the Church at Philippi was in danger from Jewish influence: not indeed among themselves[a], but operating on them from without (ch. iii. 2),—through that class of persons whom we already trace in the Epistle to the Galatians, and see ripened in the Pastoral Epistles, who insisted on the Mosaic law as matter of external observance, while in practice they gave themselves up to a life of lust and self-indulgence in depraved conscience.

6. The slight trace which is to be found in ch. iv. 2, 3, of the fact related Acts xvi. 13, that the Gospel at Philippi was first received by female converts, has been pointed out in the notes there.

7. The general state of the Church may be gathered from several hints in this Epistle and others. They were poor. In 2 Cor. viii. 1, 2, we read that ἡ κατὰ βάθους πτωχεία αὐτῶν ἐπερίσσευσεν εἰς τὸ πλοῦτος τῆς ἁπλότητος αὐτῶν. They were in trouble, and probably from persecution: compare 2 Cor. viii. 2 with Phil. i. 28—30. They were in danger of, if not already in, quarrel and dissension (cf. ch. ii. 1—4; and i. 27; ii. 12, 14; iv. 2); on what account, we cannot say; it may be, as has been supposed by De W., that they were peculiarly given to spiritual pride and mutual religious rivalry and jealousy. This may have arisen out of their very progress and flourishing state as a Church engendering pride. Credner supposes (Davidson, p. 381), that it may have been a spiritual form of the characteristic local infirmity, which led them to claim the title πρώτη πόλις for their city; but this falls to the ground, if πρώτη be geographically explained: see note Acts xvi. 12.

8. The object of the Epistle seems to have been no marked and definite one, but rather the expression of the deepest Christian love, and the exhortation, generally, to a life in accordance with the Spirit of Christ. Epaphroditus had brought to the Apostle the contribution from his beloved Philippians; and on occasion of his return, he takes the opportunity of pouring out his heart to them in the fulness of the Spirit, refreshing himself and them alike by his expressions of affection, and thus led on by the inspiring Spirit of God to set forth truths, and dilate upon motives, which are alike precious for all ages, and for every Church on earth.

AT WHAT PLACE AND TIME IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. It has been believed, universally in ancient times (Chrys., Euthal., Athanas., Thdrt., &c.), and almost without exception (see below) in modern, that our Epistle was written from Rome, during the imprisonment whose beginning is related in Acts xxviii. 30, 31.

2. There have been some faint attempts to fix it at Corinth (Acts xviii. 11, so Oeder, in Meyer), or at Cæsarea (so Paulus and Böttger, and Rilliet hesitatingly; see Meyer). Neither of these places will suit the indications furnished by the Epistle. The former view surely needs no refuting. And as regards the latter it may be remarked, that the strait between life and death, expressed in ch. i. 21—23, would not fit the Apostle's state in Cæsarea, where he had the appeal to Cæsar in his power, putting off at all events such a decision for some time. Besides which, the Καίσαρος οἰκία, spoken of ch. iv. 22, cannot well be the πραιτώριον τοῦ Ἡρώδου at Cæsarea of Acts xxiii. 35, and therefore it is by that clearer notice that the πραιτώριον of ch. i. 13 must be interpreted (see note there), not vice versâ. It was probably the barrack of the prætorian guards, attached to the palatium of Nero.

3. Assuming then that the Epistle was written from Rome, and during the imprisonment of Acts xxviii. ultt., it becomes an interesting question, to which part of that imprisonment it is to be assigned.

4. On comparing it with the three contemporaneous Epistles, to the Colossians, to the Ephesians, and to Philemon, we shall find a marked difference. In them we have (Eph. vi. 19, 20) freedom of preaching the Gospel implied: here (ch. i. 13—18) much more stress is laid upon his bondage, and it appears that others, not he himself, preached the Gospel, and made the fact of his imprisonment known. Again, from this same passage it would seem that a considerable time had elapsed since his imprisonment: enough for "his bonds" to have had the general effects there mentioned. This may be inferred also from another fact: the Philippians had heard of his imprisonment,—had raised and sent their contribution to him by Epaphroditus,—had heard of Epaphroditus's sickness,—of the effect of which news on them he (Epaphroditus) had had time to hear, ch. ii. 26, and was now recovered, and on his way back to them. These occurrences would imply four casual journeys from Rome to Philippi. Again (ch. ii. 19, 23) he is expecting a speedy decision of his cause, which would hardly be while he was dwelling as in Acts xxviii. ultt.

5. And besides all this, there is a spirit of anxiety and sadness throughout this Epistle, which hardly agrees with the two years of the imprisonment in the Acts, nor with the character of those other Epistles. His sufferings are evidently not the chain and the soldier only. Epaphroditus's death would have brought on him λύπην ἐπὶ λύπην (ch. ii. 27): there was then a λύπη before. He is now in an ἀγών—in one not, as usual, between the flesh and the spirit, not concerning the long-looked for trial of his case, but one of which the Philippians had heard (ch. i. 29, 30), and in which they shared by being persecuted too: some change in his circumstances, some intensification of his imprisonment, which had taken place before this time.

6. And if we examine history, we can hardly fail to discover what this was, and whence arising. In February, 61, St. Paul arrived in Rome (see Chron. Table in Prolegg. to Acts, Vol. II.). In 62[4], Burrus, the prætorian præfect, died, and a very different spirit came over Nero's government: who in the same year divorced Octavia, married Poppæa[5], a Jewish proselytess[6], and exalted Tigellinus, the principal promoter of that marriage, to the joint prætorian præfecture. From that time, Nero began 'ad deteriores inclinare[7]:' Seneca lost his power: 'validior in dies Tigéllinus[8]:' a state of things which would manifestly deteriorate the condition of the Apostle, and have the effect of hastening on his trial. It will not be unreasonable to suppose that, some little time after the death of Burrus (Feb., 63, would complete the διετία ὅλη of Acts xxviii. 30), he was removed from his own house into the πραιτώριον, or barrack of the prætorian guards attached to the palace, and put into stricter custody, with threatening of immediate peril of his life. Here it would be very natural that some of those among the prætorians who had had the custody of him before, should become agents in giving the publicity to "his bonds," which he mentions ch. i. 13. And such a hypothesis suits eminently well all the circumstances of our Epistle.

7. According to this, we must date it shortly after Feb., 63: when now the change was fresh, and the danger imminent. Say for its date then, the summer of 63.

LANGUAGE AND STYLE.

1. The language of this Epistle is thoroughly Pauline. Baur has indeed selected some phrases which he conceives to savour of the vocabulary of the later Gnosticism, but entirely without ground. All those which he brings forward, οὐχ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο,—ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν,—μορφὴ θεοῦ,—σχῆμα,—καταχθόνιοι,—may easily be accounted for without any such hypothesis: and, as has been already observed in Prolegg. to Ephesians, peculiar expressions may just as well be held to have descended from our Epistle to the Gnostics, as vice versâ.

2. The mention of ἐπίσκοποι καὶ διάκονοι in ch. i. 1, has surprised some. I have explained in the note there, that it belongs probably to the late date of our Epistle. But it need surprise no one, however that may be: for the terms are found in an official sense, though not in formal conjunction, in speeches made, and Epistles written long before this: e. g. in Acts xx. 28; Rom. xvi. 1.

3. In style, this Epistle, like all those where St. Paul writes with fervour, is discontinuous and abrupt, passing rapidly from one theme to another[1]; full of earnest exhortations[2], affectionate warnings[3], deep and wonderful settings-forth of his individual spiritual condition and feelings[4], of the state of Christians[5] and of the sinful world[6],—of the loving counsels of our Father respecting us[7], and the self-sacrifice and triumph of our Redeemer[8].

4. No epistle is so warm in its expressions of affection[9]. Again and again we have ἀγαπητοί and ἀδελφοί recurring: and in one place, ch. iv. 1, he seems as if he hardly could find words to pour out the fulness of his love—ὥστε, ἀδελφοί μου ἀγαπητοὶ καὶ ἐπιπόθητοι, χαρὰ καὶ στέφανός μου, οὕτως στήκετε ἐν κυρίῳ, ἀγαπητοί. We see how such a heart, penetrated to its depths by the Spirit of God, could love. We can see how that feeble frame, crushed to the very verge of death itself, shaken with fightings and fears, burning at every man's offence, and weak with every man's infirmity, had yet its sweet refreshments and calm resting-places of affection. We can form some estimate,—if the bliss of reposing on human spirits who loved him was so great,—how deep must have been his tranquillity, how ample and how clear his fresh springs of life and joy, in HIM, of whom he could write, ζῶ δὲ οὐκ ἔτι ἐγὼ, ζῇ δὲ ἐν ἐμοὶ χριστός (Gal. ii. 20): and of whose abiding power within him he felt, as he tells his Philippians (ch. iv. 13), πάντα ἰσχύω ἐν τῷ ἐνδυναμοῦντί με.

CHAPTER IV.

THE EPISTLE TO THE COLOSSIANS.

AUTHORSHIP.

1. THAT this Epistle is a genuine work of St. Paul, was never doubted in ancient times: nor did any modern critic question the fact, until Schrader[1], in his commentary, pronounced some passages suspicious, and led the way in which Baur[2] and Meyerhoff[3] followed. In his later work, Baur entirely rejects it[4]. The grounds on which these writers rest, are partly the same as those already met in the Prolegomena to the Ephesians. The Epistle is charged with containing phrases and ideas derived from the later heretical philosophies,—an assertion, the untenableness of which I have there shewn as regards that Epistle, and almost the same words would suffice for this. Even De Wette disclaims and refutes their views, maintaining its genuineness: though as Dr. Davidson remarks, "it is strange that, in replying to them so well, he was not led to question his own rejection of the authenticity of the Ephesian Epistle."

2. The arguments drawn from considerations peculiar to this Epistle, its diction and style, will be found answered under § iv.

3. Among many external testimonies to its genuineness and authenticity are the following:

(a) Justin Martyr, contra Tryph. 85, p. 182, calls our Lord πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως (Col. i. 15), and similarly § 84, p. 181; 100, p. 195.

(β) Theophilus of Antioch, ad Autolycum, ii. 22, p. 365, has: τοῦτον τὸν λόγον ἐγέννησε προφορικόν, πρωτότοκον πάσης κτίσεως.

These may perhaps hardly be conceded as direct quotations. But the following are beyond doubt:

(γ) Irenæus, iii. 14. 1, p. 201:

"Iterum in ea epistola quæ est ad Colossenses, ait: 'Salutat vos Lucas medicus dilectus.'" (ch. iv. 14.)

(δ) Clement of Alexandria, Strom. i. 1 [15], p. 325 P.:

κἂν τῇ πρὸς Κολοσσαεῖς ἐπιστολῇ, "νουθετοῦντες," γράφει, "πάντα ἄνθρωπον καὶ διδάσκοντες κ.τ.λ." (ch. i. 28.)

In Strom. iv. 7 [56], p. 588, he cites ch. iii. 12 and 14:—in Strom. v. 10 [61, ff.], p. 682 f.,—ch. i. 9—11, 28, ch. ii. 2 ff., ch. iv. 2, 3 ff. In id. vi. 8 [62], p. 771, he says that Παῦλος ἐν ταῖς ἐπιστολαῖς calls τὴν Ἑλληνικὴν φιλοσοφίαν 'στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου' (Col. ii. 8).

(ε) Tertullian, de præscr. hæret. c. 7, vol. ii. p. 20:

"A quibus nos Apostolus refrænans nominatim philosophiam testatur caveri oportere, scribens ad Colossenses: videte, ne quis sit circumveniens vos &c." (ch. ii. 8.)

And de Resurr. carnis, c. 23, vol. ii. p. 825 f.:

"Docet quidem Apostolus Colossensibus scribens . . . ." and then he cites ch. ii. 12 ff., and 20,—iii. 1, and 3.

(ζ) Origen, contra Cels. v. 8, vol. i. p. 583:

παρὰ δὲ τῷ Παύλῳ, ... τοιαῦτ' ἐν τῇ πρὸς Κολασσαεῖς λέλεκται· μηδεὶς ὑμᾶς καταβραβευέτω θέλων κ.τ.λ. (ch. ii. 18, 19.)

4. I am not aware that the integrity of the Epistle has ever been called in question. Even those who are so fond of splitting and portioning out other Epistles, do not seem to have tried to subject this to that process.

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS AND WITH WHAT OBJECT IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. COLOSSÆ, or (for of our two oldest MSS.,—ℵ writes one (a) in the title and subscription, and the other (o) in ch. i. 2; and B has a with o written above by 1. m. in the title and subscription, and o in ch. i. 2) COLASSÆ, formerly a large city of Phrygia (ἀπίκετο [Xerxes] ἐς Κολοσσάς, πόλιν μεγάλην Φρυγίας, Herod. vii. 30: ἐξελαύνει [Cyrus] διὰ Φρυγίας . . . . . εἰς Κολοσσάς, πόλιν οἰκουμένην, εὐδαίμονα καὶ μεγάλην, Xen. Anab. i. 2. 6) on the river Lycus, a branch of the Mæander (ἐν τῇ Λύκος ποταμὸς ἐς χάσμα γῆς ἐσβαλὼν ἀφανίζεται[5], ἔπειτα διὰ σταδίων ὡς μάλιστά κη πάντε ἀναφαινόμενος, ἐκδιδοῖ καὶ οὗτος ἐς τὸν Μαίανδρον. Herod. ibid.). In Strabo's time it had lost much of its importance, for he describes Apamea and Laodicea as the principal cities in Phrygia, and then says, περίκειται δὲ ταύταις καὶ πολίσματα, among which he numbers Colossæ. For a minute and interesting description of the remains and neighbourhood, see Smith's Dict. of Ancient Geography, sub voce. From what is there said it would appear, that Chonæ (Khonos), which has, since the assertion of Nicetas, the Byzantine historian who was born there[6], been taken for Colossæ, is in reality about three miles S. from the ruins of the city.

2. The Church at Colossæ consisted principally of Gentiles, ch. ii. 13. To whom it owed its origin, is uncertain. From our interpretation of ch. ii. 1 (see note there), which we have held to be logically and contextually necessary, the Colossians are included among those who had not seen St. Paul in the flesh. In ch. i. 7, 8, Epaphras is described as πιστὸς ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν διάκονος τοῦ χριστοῦ, and as ὁ καὶ δηλώσας ἡμῖν τὴν ὑμῶν ἀγάπην ἐν πνεύματι: and in speaking of their first hearing and accurate knowledge of the grace of God in truth, the Apostle adds καθὼς ἐμάθετε ἀπὸ Ἐπαφρᾶ τοῦ ἀγαπητοῦ συνδούλου ἡμῶν. As this is not[7] καθὼς καὶ ἐμάθετε, we may safely conclude that the ἐμάθετε refers to that first hearing, and by consequence that Epaphras was the founder of the Colossian Church. The time of this founding must have been subsequent to Acts xviii. 23, where St. Paul went καθεξῆς through Galatia and Phrygia, στηρίζων πάντας τοὺς μαθητάς: in which journey he could not have omitted the Colossians, had there been a Church there.

3. In opposition to the above conclusion, there has been a strong current of opinion that the Church at Colossæ was founded by St. Paul. Theodoret seems to be the first who took this view (Introd. to his Commentary). His argument is founded mainly on what I believe to be a misapprehension of ch. ii. 1[8], and also on a partial quotation of

[7] The rec. has the καί: see var. readd. Its insertion would certainly primâ facie change the whole face of the passage as regards Epaphras, and make him into an accessory teacher, after the ᾗ ἡμέρᾳ ἠκούσατε. Still, such a conclusion would not be necessary. It might merely carry on the former καθὼς καί, or it might introduce a particular additional to ἐπέγνωτε, specifying the accordance of that knowledge with Epaphras's teaching.

[8] His words are: ἔδει δὲ συνιδεῖν τῶν ῥητῶν τὴν διάνοιαν. βούλεται γὰρ εἰπεῖν, ὅτι οὐ μόνον ὑμῶν ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν μὴ τεθεαμένων με πολλὴν ἔχω φροντίδα. εἰ γὰρ τῶν μὴ ἑωρακότων αὐτὸν μόνον τὴν μέριμναν περιέφερε, τῶν ἀπολαυσάντων αὐτοῦ τῆς θέας καὶ τῆς διδασκαλίας οὐδεμίαν ἔχει φροντίδα. Leaving the latter argument to go for what it is worth, it will be at once seen that the οὐ μόνον view falls into the logical difficulty mentioned in the note in loc., and fails to account for the αὐτῶν.

Acts xviii. 23, from which he infers that the Apostle must have visited Colossæ in that journey, adducing the words διῆλθε τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν, but without the additional clause στηρίζων πάντας τοὺς μαθητάς.

4. The same position was taken up and very elaborately defended by Lardner, ch. xiv. vol. ii. p. 472. His arguments are chiefly these:

1) The improbability that the Apostle should have been twice in Phrygia and not have visited its principal cities.

2) The Apostle's assurance of the fruitful state of the Colossian Church, ch. i. 6, 23; ii. 6, 7.

3) The kind of mention which is made of Epaphras, shewing him not to have been their first instructor: laying stress on the καθὼς καί in ch. i. 7 (rec. reading, but see above, par. 2), and imagining that the recommendations of him at ch. i. 7, 8, iv. 12, 13, were sent to prevent his being in ill odour with them for having brought a report of their state to St. Paul,—and that they are inconsistent with the idea of his having founded their Church.

4) He contends that the Apostle does in effect say that he had himself dispensed the Gospel to them, ch. i. 21—25.

5) He dwells on the difference (as noted by Chrysostom in his Pref. to Romans, but not with this view) between St. Paul's way of addressing the Romans and Colossians on the same subject, Rom. xiv. 1, 2, Col. ii. 20—23; and infers that as the Romans were not his own converts, the Colossians must have been.

6) From ch. ii. 6, 7, and similar passages as presupposing his own foundership of their Church.

7) "If Epaphras was sent to Rome by the Colossians to enquire after Paul's welfare, as may be concluded from ch. iv. 7, 8, that token of respect for the Apostle is a good argument of personal acquaintance. And it is allowed, that he had brought St. Paul a particular account of the state of affairs in this Church. Which is another argument that they were his converts."

8) Ch. i. 8, "who declared unto us your love in the Spirit," is "another good proof of personal acquaintance."

9) Ch. iii. 16, as shewing that the Colossians were endowed with spiritual gifts, which they could have received only from an Apostle.

10) From ch. ii. 1, 2, interpreting it as Theodoret above.

11) From the ἄπειμι of ch. ii. 5, as implying previous presence.

12) From ch. iv. 7—9, as "full proof that Paul was acquainted with them, and they with him."

13) From the salutations in ch. iv. 10, 11, 14, and the appearance of Timotheus in the address of the Epistle, as implying that the Colossians were acquainted with St. Paul's fellow-labourers, and consequently with himself.

14) From the counter salutations in ch. iv. 15.

15) From ch. iv. 3, 4, and 18, as "demands which may be made of strangers, but are most properly made of friends and acquaintance."

16) From the Apostle's intimacy with Philemon, an inhabitant of Colossæ, and his family; and the fact of his having converted him. "Again, ver. 22, St. Paul desires Philemon to prepare him a lodging. Whence I conclude that Paul had been at Colossæ before."

5. To all the above arguments it may at once be replied, that based as they are upon mere verisimilitude, they must give way before the fact of the Apostle never having once directly alluded to his being their father in the faith, as he does so pointedly in 1 Cor. iii. 6, 10; in Gal. i. 11; iv. 13: Phil. ii. 16; iii. 17; iv. 9: 1 Thess. i. 5; ii. 1, &c. Only in the Epistles to the Romans and Ephesians, besides here, do we find such notice wanting: in that to the Romans, from the fact being otherwise: in that to the Ephesians, it may be from the general nature of the Epistle, but it may also be because he was not entirely or exclusively their founder: see Acts xviii. 19—28.

6. Nor would such arguments from verisimilitude stand against the logical requirements of ch. ii. 1. In fact, all the inferences on which they are founded will, as may be seen, full as well bear turning the other way, and ranging naturally and consistently enough under the other hypothesis. The student will find them all treated in detail in Dr. Davidson's Introduction, vol. ii. pp. 402—406.

7. It may be interesting to enquire, if the Church at Colossæ owed its origin not to St. Paul, but to Epaphras, why it was so, and at what period we may conceive it to have been founded. Both these questions, I conceive, will be answered by examining that which is related in Acts xix., of the Apostle's long sojourn at Ephesus. During that time, we are told, ver. 10,—τοῦτο δὲ ἐγένετο ἐπὶ ἔτη δύο, ὥστε πάντας τοὺς κατοικοῦντας τὴν Ἀσίαν ἀκοῦσαι τὸν λόγον τοῦ κυρίου, Ἰουδαίους τε καὶ Ἕλληνας: — and this is confirmed by Demetrius, in his complaint ver. 26,—θεωρεῖτε καὶ ἀκούετε ὅτι οὐ μόνον Ἐφέσου, ἀλλὰ σχεδὸν πάσης τῆς Ἀσίας ὁ Παῦλος οὗτος πείσας μετέστησεν ἱκανὸν ὄχλον. So that we may well conceive, that during this time Epaphras, a native of Colossæ, and Philemon and his family, also natives of Colossæ, and others, may have fallen in with the Apostle at Ephesus, and become the seeds of the Colossian Church. Thus they would be dependent on and attached to the Apostle, many of them personally acquainted with him and with his colleagues in the ministry. This may also have been the case with them at Laodicea and them at Hierapolis, and thus Pauline Churches sprung up here and there in Asia, while the Apostle confined himself to his central post at Ephesus, where, owing to the concourse to the temple, and the communication with Europe, he found so much and worthy occupation.

8. I believe that this hypothesis will account for the otherwise strange phænomena of our Epistle, on which Lardner and others have laid stress, as implying that St. Paul had been among them: for their personal regard for him, and his expressions of love to them: for his using, respecting Epaphras, language hardly seeming to fit the proximate founder of their Church:—for the salutations and counter salutations.

9. The enquiry into the occasion and object of this Epistle will be very nearly connected with that respecting the state of the Colossian Church, as disclosed in it.

10. It will be evident to the most cursory reader that there had sprung up in that Church a system of erroneous teaching, whose tendency it was to disturb the spiritual freedom and peace of the Colossians by ascetic regulations: to divide their worship by inculcating reverence to angels, and thus to detract from the supreme honour of Christ.

11. We are not left to infer respecting the class of religionists to which these teachers belonged: for the mention of νουμηνία and σάββατα in ch. ii. 16, at once characterizes them as Judaizers, and leads us to the then prevalent forms of Jewish philosophy, to trace them. Not that these teachers were merely Jews; they were Christians: but their fault was, the attempt to mix with the free and spiritual Gospel of Christ the theosophy and angelology of the Jews of their time, in which they had probably been brought up. Of such theosophy and angelology we find ample traces in the writings of Philo, and in the notices of the Jewish sect of the Essenes given us by Josephus[9].

12. It does not seem necessary to mark out very strictly the position of these persons as included within the limits of this or that sect known among the Jews: they were infected with the ascetic and theosophic notions of the Jews of their day, who were abundant in Phrygia[10]: and they were attempting to mix up these notions with the external holding of Christianity.

13. There must have been also mingled in with this erroneous Judaistic teaching, a portion of the superstitious tendencies of the Phrygian character, and, as belonging to the Jewish philosophy, much of that incipient Gnosticism which afterwards ripened out into so many strange forms of heresy.

14. It may be noticed that the Apostle does not any where in this Epistle charge the false teachers with immorality of life, as he does the very similar ones in the Pastoral Epistles most frequently. The infer-

[9] Cf. B. J. ii. 8. 2—13, where, beginning τρία γὰρ παρὰ Ἰουδαίοις εἴδη φιλοσοφεῖται, he gives a full account of the Essenes. Among other things he relates that they took oaths συντηρήσειν τά τε τῆς αἱρέσεως αὐτῶν βιβλία, καὶ τὰ τῶν ἀγγέλων ὀνόματα.

[10] See Jos. Antt. xii. 3. 4, where Alexander the Great is related to have sent, in consequence of the disaffection of Lydia and Phrygia, two thousand Mesopotamian and Babylonian Jews to garrison the towns.

ence from this is plain. The false teaching was yet in its bud. Later down, the bitter fruit began to be borne; and the mischief required severer treatment. Here, the false teacher is εἰκῇ φυσιούμενος ὑπὸ τοῦ νοὸς τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ (ch. ii. 18): in 1 Tim. iv. 2, he is κεκαυτηριασμένος τὴν ἰδίαν συνείδησιν: ib. vi. 5, διεφθαρμένος τὸν νοῦν, ἀπεστερημένος τῆς ἀληθείας, νομίζων πορισμὸν εἶναι τὴν εὐσέβειαν. Between these two phases of heresy, a considerable time must have elapsed, and a considerable development of practical tendencies must have taken place.

15. Those who would see this subject pursued further, may consult Meyer and De Wette's Einleitungen: Davidson's Introduction, vol. ii. pp. 407—424, where the various theories respecting the Colossian false teachers are mentioned and discussed: and Professor Eadie's Literature of the Epistle, in the Introduction to his Commentary.

16. The occasion then of our Epistle being the existence and influence of these false teachers in the Colossian Church, the object of the Apostle was, to set before them their real standing in Christ: the majesty of His Person, and the completeness of His Redemption: and to exhort them to conformity with their risen Lord: following this out into all the subordinate duties and occasions of common life.

SECTION III.

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

1. I have already shewn in the Prolegg. to the Ephesians that that Epistle, together with this, and that to Philemon, were written and sent at the same time: and have endeavoured to establish, as against those who would date the three from the imprisonment at Cæsarea, that it is much more natural to follow the common view, and refer them to that imprisonment at Rome, which is related in Acts xxviii. ultt.

2. We found reason there to fix the date of the three Epistles in A.D. 61 or 62, during that freer portion of the imprisonment which preceded the death of Burrus: such freedom being implied in the notices found both in Eph. vi. 19, 20, and Col. iv. 3, 4, and in the whole tone and spirit of the three Epistles as distinguished from that to the Philippians.

SECTION IV.

LANGUAGE AND STYLE: CONNEXION WITH THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS.

1. In both language and style, the Epistle to the Colossians is peculiar. But the peculiarities are not greater than might well arise from the fact, that the subject on which the Apostle was mainly writing was one requiring new thoughts and words. Had not the Epistle to the Romans ever been written, that to the Galatians would have presented as peculiar words and phrases as this Epistle now does.

2. It may be well to subjoin a list of the ἅπαξ λεγόμενα in our Epistle:

ἀνταναπληρόω, ib. 24.
πιθανολογία, ch. ii. 4.
στερέωμα, ib. 5.
συλαγωγέω, ib. 8.
φιλοσοφία, ib. 8.
θεότης, ib. 9.
σωματικῶς, ib. 9.
ἀπέκδυσις, ib. 11.
χειρόγραφον, ib. 14.
προσηλόω, ib. 14.
ἀπεκδύω, ch. ii. 15; ch. iii. 9.
δειγματίζω, ib. 15. (?) (see Matt. i. 19.)
νουμηνία, ib. 16.
ἐθελοθρήσκεια, ib. 23.
ἀφειδία, ib. 23.
πλησμονή, ib. 23.
αἰσχρολογία, ch. iii. 8.
βραβεύω, ib. 15.
εὐχάριστος, ib. 15.

3. A very slight analysis of the above will shew us to what they are chiefly owing. In ch. i. we have seven: in ch. ii., nineteen or twenty: in ch. iii., seven: in ch. iv., two. It is evident then that the nature of the subject in ch. ii. has introduced the greater number. At the same time it cannot be denied that St. Paul does here express some things differently from his usual practice: for instance, ἀρέσκεια, δυναμόω, πρωτεύω, εἰρηνοποιέω, μετακινέω, πιθανολογία, ἐμβατεύω, μομφή, βραβεύω, all are peculiarities, owing not to the necessities of the subject, but to style: to the peculiar frame and feeling with which the writer was expressing himself, which led to his using these unusual expressions rather than other and more customary ones. And we may fairly say, that there is visible throughout the controversial part of our Epistle, a loftiness and artificial elaboration of style, which would induce precisely the use of such expressions. It is not uncommon with St. Paul, when strongly moved or sharply designating opponents, or rising into majestic subjects and thoughts, to rise also into unusual, or long and compounded words: see for examples, Rom. i. 24—32; viii. 35—39; ix. 1—5; xi. 33—36; xvi. 25—27, &c., and many instances in the Pastoral Epistles. It is this σεμνότης of controversial tone, even more than the necessity of the subject handled, which causes our Epistle so much to abound with peculiar words and phrases.

4. And this will be seen even more strongly, when we turn to the Epistle to the Ephesians, sent at the same time with the present letter. In writing both, the Apostle's mind was in the same general frame—full of the glories of the Person of Christ, and the consequent glorious privileges of His Church, which is built on Him, and vitally knit to Him. This mighty subject, as he looked with indignation on the beggarly system of meats and drinks and hallowed days and angelic mediations to which his Colossians were being drawn down, rose before him in all its length and breadth and height; but as writing to them, he was confined to one portion of it, and to setting forth that one portion pointedly and controversially. He could not, consistently with the effect which he would produce on them, dive into the depths of the divine counsels in Christ with regard to them. At every turn, we may well conceive, he would fain have gone out into those wonderful prayers and revelations which would have been so abundant if he had had free scope: but at every turn, οὐκ εἴασεν αὐτὸν τὸ πνεῦμα Ἰησοῦ: the Spirit bound him to a lower region, and would not let him lose sight of the βλέπετε μή τις, which forms the ground-tone of this Colossian Epistle. Only in the setting forth of the majesty of Christ's Person, so essential to his present aim, does he know no limits to the sublimity of his flight. When he approaches those who are Christ's, the urgency of their conservation, and the duty of marking the contrast to their deceivers, cramps and confines him for the time.

5. But the Spirit which thus bound him to his special work while writing to the Colossians, would not let His divine promptings be in vain. While he is labouring with the great subject, and unable to the Colossians to express all he would, his thoughts are turned to another Church, lying also in the line which Tychicus and Onesimus would take: a Church which he had himself built up stone by stone; to which his affection went largely forth: where if the same baneful influences were making themselves felt, it was but slightly, or not so as to call for special and exclusive treatment. He might pour forth to his Ephesians all the fulness of the Spirit's revelations and promptings, on the great subject of the Spouse and Body of Christ. To them, without being bound to narrow his energies evermore into one line of controversial direction, he might lay forth, as he should be empowered, their foundation in the counsel of the Father, their course in the satisfaction of the Son, their perfection in the work of the Spirit.

6. And thus,—as a mere human writer, toiling earnestly and conscientiously towards his point, pares rigidly off the thoughts and words, however deep and beautiful, which spring out of and group around his subject, putting them by and storing them up for more leisure another day: and then on reviewing them, and again awakening the spirit which prompted them, playfully unfolds their germs, and amplifies their suggestions largely, till a work grows beneath his hands more stately and more beautiful than ever that other was, and carrying deeper conviction than it ever wrought:—so, in the higher realms of the fulness of Inspiration, may we conceive it to have been with our Apostle. His Epistle to the Colossians is his caution, his argument, his protest: is, so to speak, his working-day toil, his direct pastoral labour: and the other is the flower and bloom of his moments, during those same days, of devotion and rest, when he wrought not so much in the Spirit, as the Spirit wrought in him. So that while we have in the Colossians, system defined, language elaborated, antithesis, and logical power, on the surface—we have in the Ephesians the free outflowing of the earnest spirit, —to the mere surface-reader, without system, but to him that delves down into it, in system far deeper, and more recondite, and more exquisite: the greatest and most heavenly work of one, whose very imagination was peopled with the things in the heavens, and even his fancy rapt into the visions of God.

7. Thus both Epistles sprung out of one Inspiration, one frame of mind: that to the Colossians first, as the task to be done, the protest delivered, the caution given: that to the Ephesians, begotten by the other, but surpassing it: carried on perhaps in some parts simultaneously, or immediately consequent. So that we have in both, many of the same thoughts uttered in the same words[11]; many terms and phrases peculiar to the two Epistles; many instances of the same term or phrase, still sounding in the writer's ear, but used in the two in a different connexion. All these are taken by the impugners of the Ephesian Epistle as tokens of its spuriousness: I should rather regard them as psychological phænomena strictly and beautifully corresponding to the circumstances under which we have reason to believe the two Epistles to have been written: and as fresh elucidations of the mental and spiritual character of the great Apostle.

[11] See reff.: tables of these have been given by the Commentators. I will not repeat them here, simply because to complete such a comparison would require far more room and labour than I could give to it, and I should not wish to do it as imperfectly as those mere formal tables have done it. The student may refer to Davidson, vol. ii. p. 391.

CHAPTER V.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. THIS Epistle has been all but universally recognized as the undoubted work of St. Paul. It is true (see below) that no reliable citations from it appear in the Apostolic Fathers: but the external evidence from early times is still far too weighty to be set aside.

2. Its authorship has in modern times been called in question (1) by Schrader, and (2) by Baur, on internal grounds. Their objections, which are entirely of a subjective and most arbitrary kind, are reviewed and answered by De Wette, Meyer, and Dr. Davidson (Introd. to N. T. vol. ii. pp. 454 ff.)[1]: and have never found any acceptance, even in Germany.

3. The external testimonies of antiquity are the following:

Irenæus adv. Hær. v. 6. 1, p. 299 f.: "Et propter hoc apostolus seipsum exponens, explanavit perfectum et spiritualem salutis hominem, in prima epistola ad Thessalonicenses dicens sic: Deus autem pacis sanctificet vos perfectos," &c. (1 Thess. v. 23.)

[1] I must, in referring to Dr. Davidson, not be supposed to concur in his view of the Apostle's expectation in the words ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες οἱ περιλειπόμενοι (1 Thess. iv. 15, 17). See my note there.

There is a very good statement of Baur's adverse arguments, and refutation of them, in Jowett's work on the Thessalonians, Galatians, and Romans, "Genuineness of the first Epistle," vol. i. 15—26. In referring to it, I must enter my protest against the views of Professor Jowett on points which lie at the very root of the Christian life: views as unwarranted by any data furnished in the Scriptures of which he treats, as his reckless and crude statement of them is pregnant with mischief to minds unaccustomed to biblical research. Among the various phænomena of our awakened state of apprehension of the characteristics and the difficulties of the New Testament, there is none more suggestive of saddened thought and dark foreboding, than the appearance of such a book as Professor Jowett's. Our most serious fears for the Christian future of England, point, it seems to me, just in this direction: to persons who allow fine æsthetical and psychological appreciation, and the results of minute examination of spiritual feeling and mental progress in the Epistles, to keep out of view that other line of testimony to the fixity and consistency of great doctrines, which is equally discoverable in them. I have endeavoured below, in speaking of the matter and style of our Epistle, to meet some of Professor Jowett's assertions and inferences of this kind.

Clem. Alex. Pædag. i. 5 [19], p. 109 P.: τοῦτό τοι σαφέστατα ὁ μακάριος Παῦλος ὑπεσημήνατο, εἰπών· δυνάμενοι ἐν βάρει εἶναι κ.τ.λ. to ἑαυτῆς τέκνα (1 Thess. ii. 6).

Tertullian de resurr. carnis, § 24, vol. ii. p. 828: "Et ideo majestas Spiritus sancti perspicax ejusmodi sensuum et in ipsa ad Thessalonicenses epistola suggerit: De temporibus autem . . . . . quasi fur nocte, ita adveniet." (1 Thess. v. 1 f.)

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS AND WITH WHAT OBJECT IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. THESSALONICA was a city of Macedonia, and in Roman times, capital of the second district of the province of Macedonia (Liv. xlv. 29 f.), and the seat of a Roman prætor (Cic. Planc. 41). It lay on the Sinus Thermaicus, and is represented to have been built on the site of the ancient Therme (Θέρμη ἡ ἐν τῷ Θερμαίῳ κόλπῳ οἰκημένη, ἀπ' ἧς καὶ ὁ κόλπος οὗτος τὴν ἐπωνυμίην ἔχει, Herod. vii. 121), or peopled from this city (Pliny seems to distinguish the two: 'medioque flexu littoris Thessalonica, liberæ conditionis. Ad hanc, a Dyrrhachio cxv mil. pas., Therme.' iv. 10) by Cassander, son of Antipater, and named after his wife Thessalonice, sister of Alexander the Great (so called from a victory obtained by his father Philip on the day when he heard of her birth)[1]. Under the Romans it became rich and populous (ἡ νῦν μάλιστα τῶν ἄλλων εὐανδρεῖ, Strab. vii. 7: see also Lucian, Asin. c. 46, and Appian, Bell. Civ. iv. 118), was an 'urbs libera' (see Pliny, above), and in later writers bore the name of "metropolis." "Before the founding of Constantinople it was virtually the capital of Greece and Illyricum, as well as of Macedonia: and shared the trade of the Ægean with Ephesus and Corinth" (C. and H. edn. 2, vol. i. p. 380). Its importance continued through the middle ages, and it is now the second city in European Turkey, with 70,000 inhabitants, under the slightly corrupted name of Saloniki. For further notices of its history and condition at various times, see C. and H. i. pp. 378—83: Winer, RWB. sub voce (from which mainly the above notice is taken): Dr. Holland's Travels: Lewin, vol. i. p. 252.

2. The church at Thessalonica was founded by St. Paul, in company with Silas and Timotheus[2], as we learn in Acts xvii. 1—9. Very little

[1] So Strabo, vii. excerpt. 10: μετὰ τὸν Ἄξιον ποταμόν, ἡ Θεσσαλονίκη ἐστὶν πόλις, ἡ πρότερον Θέρμη ἐκαλεῖτο· κτίσμα δ' ἐστὶν Κασσάνδρου· ὃς ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τῆς ἑαυτοῦ γυναικός, παιδὸς δὲ Φιλίππου τοῦ Ἀμύντου, ὠνόμασεν· μετῴκισεν δὲ τὰ πέριξ πολίχνια εἰς αὐτήν· οἷον Χαλάστραν, Αἰνείαν (see Dion. Hal., Antiq. i. 49), Κίσσον, καί τινα καὶ ἄλλα.

[2] That this latter was with Paul and Silas, though not expressly mentioned in the is there said which can throw light on the origin or composition of the Thessalonian church. The main burden of that narrative is the rejection of the Gospel by the Jews there. It is however stated (ver. 4) that some of the Jews believed, and consorted with Paul and Silas; and of the devout Greeks a great multitude, and of the chief women not a few.

3. But some account of the Apostle's employment and teaching at Thessalonica may be gathered from this narrative, connected with hints dropped in the two Epistles. He came to them, yet suffering from his persecution at Philippi (1 Thess. ii. 2). But they received the word joyfully, amidst trials and persecutions (ib. i. 6; ii. 13), and notwithstanding the enmity of their own countrymen and of the Jews (ii. 14 ff.). He maintained himself by his labour (ib. ii. 9), although his stay was so short[4], in the same spirit of independence which characterized all his apostolic course. He declared to them boldly and clearly the Gospel of God (ii. 2). The great burden of his message to them was the approaching coming and kingdom of the Lord Jesus (i. 10; ii. 12, 19; iii. 13; iv. 13—18; v. 1—11, 23, 24. Acts xvii. 7: see also § iv. below), and his chief exhortation, that they would walk worthily of this their calling to that kingdom and glory (ii. 12; iv. 1; v. 23).

4. He left them, as we know from Acts xvii. 5—10, on account of a tumult raised by the unbelieving Jews; and was sent away by night by the brethren to Berœa, together with Silas and Timotheus (Acts xvii. 10). From that place he wished to have revisited Thessalonica: but was prevented (1 Thess. ii. 18), by the arrival, with hostile purposes, of his enemies the Thessalonian Jews (Acts xvii. 13), in consequence of which the brethren sent him away by sea to Athens.

5. Their state after his departure is closely allied with the enquiry as to the object of the Epistle. The Apostle appears to have felt much anxiety about them: and in consequence of his being unable to visit them in person, seems to have determined, during the hasty consultation previous to his departure from Berœa, to be left at Athens, which was the destination fixed for him by the brethren, alone, and to send Timotheus back to Thessalonica to ascertain the state of their faith[5].

Acts, is inferred by comparing Acts xvi. 3, xvii. 14, with 1 Thess. i. 1, 2 Thess. i. 1, 1 Thess. iii. 1—6.

[4] We are hardly justified in assuming, with Jowett, that it was only three weeks. For "three Sabbaths," even if they mark the whole stay, may designate four weeks: and we are not compelled to infer that a Sabbath may not have passed at the beginning, or the end, or both, on which he did not preach in the synagogue. Indeed the latter hypothesis is very probable, if he was following the same course as afterwards at Corinth and Ephesus, and on the Jews proving rebellious and unbelieving, separated himself from them: at which, or something approaching to it, the προσεκληρώθησαν τῷ Παύλῳ κ. τῷ Σίλᾳ of Acts xvii. 4 may perhaps be taken as pointing.

6. The nature of the message brought to the Apostle at Corinth (Acts xviii. 5) by Timotheus on his arrival there with Silas, must be inferred from what we find in the Epistle itself. It was, in the main, favourable and consolatory (1 Thess. iii. 6—10). They were firm in faith and love, as indeed they were reputed to be by others who had brought to him news of them (i. 7—10), full of affectionate remembrance of the Apostle, and longing to see him (iii. 6). Still, however, he earnestly desired to come to them, not only from the yearnings of love, but because he wanted to fill up τὰ ὑστερήματα τῆς πίστεως αὐτῶν (iii. 10). Their attention had been so much drawn to one subject—his preaching had been so full of one great matter, and from the necessity of the case, so scanty on many others which he desired to lay forth to them, that he already feared lest their Christian faith should be a distorted and unhealthy faith. And in some measure, Timotheus had found it so. They were beginning to be restless in expectation of the day of the Lord (iv. 11 ff.),—neglectful of that pure, and sober, and temperate walk, which is alone the fit preparation for that day (iv. 3 ff.; v. 1—9), —distressed about the state of the dead in Christ, who they supposed had lost the precious opportunity of standing before Him at His coming (iv. 13 ff.).

7. This being so, he writes to them to build up their faith and love, and to correct these defects and misapprehensions. I reserve further consideration of the contents of the Epistle for § iv., 'On its matter and style.'

SECTION III.

PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.

1. From what has been said above respecting the state of the Thessalonian Church as the occasion for writing the Epistle, it may readily be inferred that no considerable time had elapsed since the intelligence of that state had reached the Apostle. Silas and Timotheus were with him (i. 1): the latter had been the bearer of the tidings from Thessalonica.

2. Now we know (Acts xviii. 5) that they rejoined him at Corinth, apparently not long after his arrival there. That rejoining then forms lies open to the charge of "diving beneath the surface to pick up what is really on the surface," and thus of "introducing into Scripture a hypercritical and unreal method of interpretation, which may be any where made the instrument of perverting the meaning of the text." (Jowett, i. p. 120.) Supposing that at Berœa it was fixed that Timotheus should not accompany St. Paul to Athens, but go to Thessalonica, and that the Apostle should be deposited at Athens and left there alone, the brethren returning, what words could have more naturally expressed this than διὸ μηκέτι στέγοντες εὐδοκήσαμεν καταλειφθῆναι ἐν Ἀθήναις μόνοι?

our terminus a quo. And it would be in the highest degree unnatural to suppose that the whole time of his stay at Corinth (a year and six months, Acts xviii. 11) elapsed before he wrote the Epistle,—founded as it is on the intelligence which he had heard, and written with a view to meet present circumstances. CORINTH therefore may safely be assumed as the place of writing.

3. His stay at Corinth ended with his setting sail for the Pentecost at Jerusalem in the spring of 54 (see chron. table in Prolegg. to Acts, Vol. II.). It would begin then with the autumn of 52. And in the winter of that year, I should be disposed to place the writing of our Epistle.

4. It will be hardly necessary to remind the student, that this date places the Epistle first, in chronological order, of all the writings of St. Paul that remain to us.

SECTION IV.

MATTER AND STYLE.

1. It will be interesting to observe, wherein the first-written Epistle of St. Paul differs from his later writings. Some difference we should certainly expect to find, considering that we have to deal with a temperament so fervid, a spirit so rapidly catching the impress of circumstances, so penetrated by and resigned up to the promptings of that indwelling Spirit of God, who was ever more notably and thoroughly fitting His instrument for the expansion and advance of His work of leavening the world with the truth of Christ.

2. Nor will such observation and enquiry be spent in vain, especially if we couple it with corresponding observation of the sayings of our Lord, and the thoughts and words of his Apostles, on the various great departments of Christian belief and hope.

3. The faith, in all its main features, was delivered once for all. The facts of Redemption,—the Incarnation, and the Atonement, and the glorification of Christ,—were patent and undeniable from the first. Our Lord's own words had asserted them: the earliest discourses of the Apostles after the day of Pentecost bore witness to them. It is true that, in God's Providence, the whole glorious system of salvation by grace was the gradual imparting of the Spirit to the Church: by occasion here and there, various points of it were insisted on and made prominent. Even here, the freest and fullest statement did not come first. "Repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ" was ever the order which the apostolic proclamation took. The earliest of the Epistles are ever moral and practical, the advanced ones more doctrinal and spiritual. It was not till it appeared, in the unfolding of God's Providence, that the bulwark of salvation by grace must be strengthened, that the building on the one foundation must be raised thus impregnable to the righteousness of works and the law, that the Epistles to the Galatians and Romans were given through the great Apostle, reaching to the full breadth and height of the great argument. Then followed the Epistles of the imprisonment, building up higher and higher the edifice thus consolidated: and the Pastoral Epistles, suited to a more developed ecclesiastical condition, and aimed at the correction of abuses, which sprung up later, or were the ripened fruit of former doctrinal errors.

4. In all these however, we trace the same great elementary truths of the faith. Witness to them is never wanting: nor can it be said that any change of ground respecting them ever took place. The work of the Spirit as regarded them, was one of expanding and deepening, of freeing from narrow views, and setting in clearer and fuller light: of ranging and grouping collateral and local circumstances, so that the great doctrines of grace became ever more and more prominent and paramount.

5. But while this was so with these 'first principles,' the very view which we have taken will shew, that as regarded other things which lay at a greater distance from central truths, it was otherwise. In such matters, the Apostle was taught by experience; Christ's work brought its lessons with it: and it would be not only unnatural, but would remove from his writings the living freshness of personal reality, if we found him the same in all points of this kind, at the beginning, and at the end of his epistolary labours: if there were no characteristic differences of mode of thought and expression in 1 Thessalonians and in 2 Timotheus: if advance of years had brought with it no corresponding advance of standing-point, change of circumstances no change of counsel, trial of God's ways no further insight into God's designs.

6. Nor are we left to conjecture as to those subjects on which especially such change, and ripening of view and conviction, might be expected to take place. There was one most important point on which our Lord Himself spoke with marked and solemn uncertainty. The TIME OF HIS OWN COMING was hidden from all created beings,—nay, in the mystery of his mediatorial office, from the Son Himself (Mark xiii. 32). Even after his Resurrection, when questioned by the Apostles as to the time of his restoring the Kingdom to Israel, his reply is still, that "it is not for them to know the times and the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power" (Acts i. 7).

7. Here then is a plain indication, which has not, I think, been sufficiently made use of in judging of the Epistles. The Spirit was to testify of Christ: to take of the things of Christ, and shew them unto them. So that however much that Spirit, in His infinite wisdom, might be pleased to impart to them of the details and accompanying circumstances of the Lord's appearing, we may be sure, that the truth spoken by our Lord, "Of that day and hour knoweth no man," would hold good with regard to them, and be traced in their writings. If they were true men, and their words and Epistles the genuine production of inspiration of them by that Spirit of Truth, we may expect to find in such speeches and writings tokens of this appointed uncertainty of the day and hour: expectations, true in expression and fully justified by appearances, yet corrected, as God's purposes were manifested, by advancing experience, and larger effusions of the Spirit of prophecy.

8. If then I find in the course of St. Paul's Epistles, that expressions which occur in the earlier ones, and seem to indicate expectation of His almost immediate coming, are gradually modified,—disappear altogether from the Epistles of the imprisonment,—and instead of them are found others speaking in a very different strain, of dissolving, and being with Christ, and passing through death and the resurrection, in the latest Epistles,—I regard it, not as a strange thing, not as a circumstance which I must explain away for fear of weakening the authority of his Epistles, but as exactly that which I should expect to find; as the very strongest testimony that these Epistles were written by one who was left in this uncertainty,—not by one who wished to make it appear that Inspiration had rendered him omniscient.

9. And in this, the earliest of those Epistles, I do find exactly that which I might expect on this head. While every word and every detail respecting the Lord's coming is a perpetual inheritance for the Church,—while we continue to comfort one another with the glorious and heart-stirring sentences which he utters to us in the word of the Lord,—no candid eye can help seeing in the Epistle, how the uncertainty of "the day and hour" has tinged all these passages with a hue of near anticipation: how natural it was, that the Thessalonians receiving this Epistle, should have allowed that anticipation to be brought even yet closer, and have imagined the day to be actually already present.

10. It will be seen by the above remarks, how very far I am from conceding their point to those who hold that the belief, of which this Epistle is the strongest expression, was an idle fancy, or does not befit the present age as well as it did that one. It is God's purpose respecting us, that we should ever be left in this uncertainty, looking for and hasting unto the day of the Lord, which may be upon us at any time before we are aware of it. Every expression of the ages before us, betokening close anticipation, coupled with the fact that the day has not yet arrived, teaches us much, but unteaches us nothing: does not deprive that glorious hope of its applicability to our times, nor the

11. In style, this Epistle is thoroughly Pauline,—abounding with phrases, and lines of thought, which may be parallelled with similar ones in his other Epistles[7]: not wanting also in insulated words and sentiments, such as we find in all the writings of one who was so fresh in thought and full in feeling; such also as are in no way inconsistent with St. Paul's known character, but in every case finding analogical justification in Epistles of which no one has ever thought of disputing the genuineness.

12. As compared with other Epistles, this is written in a quiet and unimpassioned style, not being occasioned by any grievous errors of doctrine or defects in practice, but written to encourage and gently to admonish those who were, on the whole, proceeding favourably in the Christian life. To this may be attributed also the fact, that it does not deal expressly with any of the great verities of the faith, rather taking them for granted, and building on them the fabric of a holy and pure life. That this should have been done until they were disputed, was but natural: and in consequence not with these Epistles, but with that to the Galatians, among whom the whole Christian life was imperilled by Judaistic teaching, begins that great series of unfoldings of the mystery of salvation by grace, of which St. Paul was so eminently the minister.

[6] It is strange that such words as the following could be written by Mr. Jowett, without bringing, as he wrote them, the condemnation of his theory and its expression home to his mind: "In the words which are attributed in the Epistle of St. Peter to the unbelievers of that day (? surely it is to the unbelievers of days to come,—a fact which the writer, by altering the reference of the words, seems to be endeavouring to dissimulate), we might truly say that, since the fathers fell asleep, all things remain the same from the beginning. Not only do 'all things remain the same,' but the very belief itself (in the sense in which it was held by the first Christians) has been ready to vanish away." Vol. i. p. 97.

[7] Baur has most perversely adduced both these as evidences of spuriousness: among the former he cites ch. i. 5, as compared with 1 Cor. ii. 4: i. 6, with 1 Cor. xi. 1: i. 8, with Rom. i. 8: ii. 4—10, with 1 Cor. ii. 4, iv. 3, 4, ix. 15, 2 Cor. ii. 17, v. 11, xi. 9: for his discussion of the latter, see his "Paulus Apostel, u.s.w.," pp. 489, 490.

CHAPTER VI.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO THE THESSALONIANS.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. THE recognition of this Epistle has been as general,—and the exceptions to it for the most part the same,—as in the case of the last.

2. The principal testimonies of early Christian writers are the following:

(α) Irenæus, adv. Hær. iii. 7. 2, p. 182:

"Quoniam autem hyperbatis frequenter utitur Apostolus (Paulus, from what precedes) propter velocitatem sermonum suorum, et propter impetum qui in ipso est Spiritus, ex multis quidem aliis est invenire. . . . . Et iterum in secunda ad Thessalonicenses de Antichristo dicens, ait: Et tunc revelabitur," &c. ch. ii. 8, 9.

(β) Clement of Alexandria, Strom. v. 3 [17], p. 655 P.:

οὐκ ἐν πᾶσι, φησὶν ὁ ἀπόστολος, ἡ γνῶσις, προσεύχεσθε δὲ ἵνα ῥυσθῶμεν ἀπὸ τῶν ἀτόπων καὶ πονηρῶν ἀνθρώπων· οὐ γὰρ πάντων ἡ πίστις (2 Thess. iii. 1, 2).

(γ) Tertullian, de resurr. carnis c. 24, vol. ii. p. 828: following on the citation from the first Epistle given above, ch. v. § i. 3, ... "et in secunda, pleniore sollicitudine ad eosdem: obsecro autem vos, fratres, per adventum Domini nostri Jesu Christi," &c. (ch. ii. 1, 2.)

3. The objections brought by Schmidt (Einl. ii. p. 256 ff.), Kern (Tübing. Zeitschrift für 1839, 2 heft.), and Baur (Paulus u.s.w. p. 488 ff.) against the genuineness of the Epistle, in as far as they rest on the old story of similarities and differences as compared with St. Paul's acknowledged Epistles, have been already more than once dealt with. I shall now only notice those which regard points peculiar to our Epistle itself.

4. It is said that this second Epistle is not consistent with the first: that directed their attention to the Lord's coming as almost immediate: this interposes delay,—the apostasy,—the man of sin, &c. It really seems as if no propriety nor exact fitting of circumstances would ever satisfy such critics. It might be imagined that this very discrepancy, even if allowed, would tell most strongly in favour of the genuineness.

5. It is alleged by Kern, that the whole prophetic passage, ch. ii. 1 ff., does not correspond with the date claimed for the Epistle. It is assumed, that the man of sin is Nero, who was again to return, Rev. xvii. 10,—ὁ κατέχων, Vespasian,—the ἀποστασία, the falling away of Jews and Christians alike. This view, it is urged, fits a writer in A.D. 68—70, between Nero's death and the destruction of Jerusalem. But than this nothing can be more inconclusive. Why have we not as good a right to say, that this interpretation is wrong, because it does not correspond to the received date of the Epistle, as vice versâ? To us (see below, § v.) the interpretation is full of absurdity, and therefore the argument carries no conviction.

6. It is maintained again, that ch. iii. 17 is strongly against the genuineness of our Epistle: for that there was no reason for guarding against forgeries; and as for πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ, the Apostle had written but one. For an answer to this, see note in loc., where both the reason for inserting this is adduced, and it is shewn, that almost all of his Epistles either are expressly, or may be understood as having been, thus authenticated.

7. See the objections of Schmidt, Schrader, Kern, and Baur, treated at length in Lünemann's Einleitung to his Commentary, pp. 161—167: and in Davidson, Introd. vol. ii. pp. 484, end.

SECTION II.

FOR WHAT READERS, AND WITH WHAT OBJECT IT WAS WRITTEN.

1. The former particular has been already sufficiently explained in the corresponding section of the Prolegomena to the first Epistle. But inasmuch as the condition of the Thessalonian Church in the mean time bears closely upon the object of the Epistle, I resume here the consideration of their circumstances and state of mind.

2. We have seen that there were those among them, who were too ready to take up and exaggerate the prevalence of the subject of Christ's coming among the topics of the Apostle's teaching. These persons, whether encouraged by the tone of the first Epistle or not, we cannot tell (for we cannot see any reference to the first Epistle in ch. ii. 2, see note there), were evidently teaching, as an expansion of St. Paul's doctrine, or as under his authority, or even as enjoined in a letter from him (ib. note), the actual presence of the day of the Lord. In consequence of this, their minds had become unsettled: they wanted directing into the love of God and the imitation of Christ's patience (ch. iii. 5). Some appear to have left off their daily employments, and to have been taking advantage of the supposed reign of Christ to be walking disorderly.

3. It was this state of things, which furnished the occasion for our Epistle being written. Its object is to make it clear to them that the day of Christ, though a legitimate matter of expectation for every Christian, and a constant stimulus for watchfulness, was not yet come: that a course and development of events must first happen, which he lays forth to them in the spirit of prophecy: shewing them that this development has already begun, and that not until it has ripened will the coming of the Lord take place.

4. This being the occasion of writing the Epistle, there are grouped round the central subject two other general topics of solace and confirmation: comfort under their present troubles (ch. i.): exhortation to honesty and diligence, and avoidance of the idle and disorderly (ch. iii.).

SECTION III.

PLACE AND TIME OF WRITING.

1. In the address of the Epistle, we find the same three, Paul, Silvanus, and Timotheus, associated together, as in the first Epistle. This circumstance would at once direct us to Corinth, where Silas and Timotheus rejoined St. Paul (Acts xviii. 5), and whence we do not read that they accompanied him on his departure for Asia (ib. xviii. 18). And as we believe the first Epistle to have been written from that city, it will be most natural, considering the close sequence of this upon that first, to place the writing of it at Corinth, somewhat later in this same visit of a year and a half (Acts xviii. 11).

2. How long after the writing of the first Epistle in the winter of A.D. 52 (see above, ch. v. § iii. 3) we are to fix the date of our present one, must be settled merely by calculations of probability, and by the indications furnished in the Epistle itself.

3. The former of these do not afford us much help. For we can hardly assume with safety that the Apostle had received intelligence of the effects of his first Epistle, seeing that we have found cause to interpret ch. ii. 2 not of that Epistle, but of false ones, circulated under the Apostle's name. All that we can assume is, that more intelligence had arrived from Thessalonica: how soon after his writing to them, we cannot say. Their present state, as we have seen above, was but a carrying forward and exaggerating of that already begun when the former letter was sent: so that a very short time would suffice to have advanced them from the one grade of undue excitement to the other.

4. Nor do any hints furnished by our Epistle give us much more assistance. They are principally these. (a) In ch. i. 4, the Apostle speaks of his ἐγκαυχᾶσθαι ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τοῦ θεοῦ concerning the endurance and faith of the Thessalonians under persecutions. It would seem from this, that the Achæan Churches (see 1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Cor. i. 1; Rom. xvi. 1) had by this time acquired number and consistence. This however would furnish but a vague indication: it might point to any date after the first six months of his stay at Corinth. (b) In ch. iii. 2, he desires their prayers ἵνα ῥυσθῶμεν ἀπὸ τῶν ἀτόπων καὶ πονηρῶν ἀνθρώπων. It has been inferred from this, that the tumult which occasioned his departure from Corinth was not far off: that the designs of the unbelieving Jews were drawing to a head: and that consequently our date must be fixed just before his departure. But this inference is not a safe one: for we find that his open breach with the Jews took place close upon the arrival of Silas and Timotheus (Acts xviii. 5—7), and that his situation immediately after this was one of peril: for in the vision which he had, the Lord said to him, οὐδεὶς ἐπιθήσεταί σοι τοῦ κακῶσαί σε.

5. So that we really have very little help in determining our date, from either of these sources. All we can say is, that it must be fixed, in all likelihood, between the winter of 52 and the spring of 54: and taking the medium, we may venture to place it somewhere about the middle of the year 53.

STYLE.

1. The style of our Epistle, like that of the first, is eminently Pauline. Certain dissimilarities have been pointed out by Baur, &c. (see above, § i. 3): but they are no more than might be found in any one undoubted writing of our Apostle. In a fresh and vigorous style, there will ever be, so to speak, librations over any rigid limits of habitude which can be assigned: and such are to be judged of, not by their mere occurrence and number, but by their subjective character being or not being in accordance with the writer's well-known characteristics. Professor Jowett has treated one by one the supposed inconsistencies with Pauline usage (vol. i. p. 139 f.), and shewn that there is no real difficulty in supposing any of the expressions to have been used by St. Paul. He has also collected a very much larger number of resemblances in manner and phraseology to the Apostle's other writings. The student who makes use of the references in this edition will be able to mark out these for himself, and to convince himself that the style of our Epistle is so closely related to that of the rest, as to shew that the same mind was employed in the choice of the words and the construction of the sentences.

2. One portion of this Epistle, viz. the prophetic section, ch. ii. 1—12, as it is distinguished from the rest in subject, so differs in style, being, as is usual with the more solemn and declaratory paragraphs of St. Paul, loftier in diction and more abrupt and elliptical in construction. The passage in question will be found on comparison to bear, in style and flow of sentences, a close resemblance to the denunciatory and prophetic portions of the other Epistles: compare for instance ver. 3 with Col. ii. 8, 16; vv. 8, 9 with 1 Cor. xv. 24—28; ver. 10 with Rom. i. 18, 1 Cor. i. 18, 2 Cor. ii. 15; ver. 11 with Rom. i. 24, 26; ver. 12 with Rom. ii. 5, 9, and Rom. i. 32.

SECTION V.

ON THE PROPHETIC IMPORT OF CH. II. 1—12.

1. It may be well, before entering on this, to give the passage, as it stands in our rendering in the notes[1].

"(1) But we entreat you, brethren, in regard of the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together to Him,—(2) in order that ye should not be lightly shaken from your mind nor troubled, neither by spirit, nor by word, nor by epistle as from us, to the effect that the day of the Lord is present. (3) Let no man deceive you in any manner: for [that day shall not come] unless there have come the apostasy first, and there have been revealed the man of sin, the son of perdition, (4) he that withstands and exalts himself above every one that is called God or an object of adoration, so that he sits in the temple of God, shewing himself that he is God. (5) . . . . (6) And now ye know that which hinders, in order that he may be revealed in his own time. (7) For the MYSTERY ALREADY is working of lawlessness, only until he that now hinders be removed: (8) and then shall be REVEALED the LAWLESS ONE, whom the Lord Jesus will destroy by the breath of His mouth, and annihilate by the appearance of His coming: (9) whose coming is according to the working of Satan in all power and signs and wonders of falsehood, (10) and in all deceit of unrighteousness for those who are perishing, because they did not receive the love of the truth in order to their being saved. (11) And on this account God is sending to them the working of error, in order that they should believe the falsehood, (12) that all might be judged who did not believe the truth, but found pleasure in iniquity."

[1] I must caution the reader, that the rendering given in my notes is not in any case intended for a polished and elaborated version, nor is it my object to put the meaning into the best idiomatic English: but I wish to represent, as nearly as possible, the construction and intent of the original. The difference between a literal rendering, and a version for vernacular use, is very considerable, and has not been enough borne in mind in judging of our authorized English version.

2. It will be my object to give a brief résumé of the history of the interpretation of this passage, and afterwards to state what I conceive to have been its meaning as addressed to the Thessalonians, and what as belonging to subsequent ages of the Church of Christ. The history of its interpretation I have drawn from several sources: principally from Lünemann's Schlussbemerkungen to chap. ii. of his Commentary, pp. 204—217.

3. The first particulars in the history must be gleaned from the early Fathers. And their interpretation is for the most part well marked and consistent. They all regard it as a prophecy of the future, as yet unfulfilled when they wrote. They all regard the παρουσία as the personal return of our Lord to judgment and to bring in His Kingdom. They all regard the adversary here described as an individual person, the incarnation and concentration of sin [2].

IRENÆUS, adv. hær. v. 25. 1, p. 322: "Ille enim (Antichristus) omnem suscipiens diaboli virtutem, veniet non quasi rex justus nec quasi in subjectione Dei legitimus: sed impius et injustus et sine lege, quasi apostata, et iniquus et homicida, quasi latro, diabolicam apostasiam in se recapitulans: et idola quidem seponens, ad suadendum quod ipse sit Deus: se autem extollens unum idolum, habens in semetipso reliquorum idolorum varium errorem: ut hi qui per multas abominationes adorant diabolum, hi per hoc unum idolum serviant ipsi, de quo apostolus in Epistola quæ est ad Thessalonicenses secunda, sic ait" (vv. 3, 4).

Again, ib. 3, p. 323: "'Usque ad tempus temporum et dimidium temporis' (Dan. vii. 25), hoc est, per triennium et sex menses, in quibus veniens regnabit super terram. De quo iterum et apostolus Paulus in secunda ad Thess., simul et causam adventus ejus annuntians, sic ait" (vv. 8 ff.).

Again, ib. 30. 4, p. 330: "Cum autem devastaverit Antichristus hic omnia in hoc mundo, regnabit annis tribus et mensibus sex, et sedebit in templo Hierosolymis: tum veniet Dominus de cœlis in nubibus, in gloria Patris, illum quidem et obedientes ei in stagnum ignis mittens: adducens autem justis regni tempora, hoc est requietionem, septimam diem sanctificatam; et restituens Abrahæ promissionem hæreditatis: in quo regno ait Dominus, multos ab Oriente et Occidente venientes, recumbere cum Abraham, Isaac et Jacob."

TERTULLIAN, de Resurr. c. 24, vol. ii. p. 829, quoting the passage, inserts after ὁ κατέχων, "quis, nisi Romanus status? cujus abscessio in decem reges dispersa Antichristum superducet, et tum revelabitur iniquus." See also his Apol. c. 32, vol. i. p. 447.

JUSTIN MARTYR, dial. cum Tryph. c. 110, p. 203: δύο παρουσίαι αὐτοῦ κατηγγελμέναι εἰσί, μία μὲν ἐν ᾗ παθητὸς καὶ ἄδοξος καὶ ἄτιμος καὶ σταυρούμενος κεκήρυκται, ἡ δὲ δευτέρα ἐν ᾗ μετὰ δόξης ἀπὸ τῶν οὐρανῶν πάρεσται, ὅταν καὶ ὁ τῆς ἀποστασίας ἄνθρωπος, ὁ καὶ εἰς τὸν ὕψιστον ἔξαλλα λαλῶν, ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς ἄνομα τολμήσῃ εἰς ἡμᾶς τοὺς Χριστιανούς.

ORIGEN, contra Cels. vi. 45 f. vol. i. p. 667 f.: ἔχρην δὲ τὸν μὲν ἕτερον τῶν ἄκρων, καὶ βέλτιστον, υἱὸν ἀναγορεύεσθαι τοῦ θεοῦ, διὰ τὴν ὑπεροχήν· τὸν δὲ τούτῳ κατὰ διάμετρον ἐναντίον, υἱὸν τοῦ πονηροῦ δαίμονος, καὶ Σατανᾶ, καὶ διαβόλου . . . λέγει δὲ ὁ Παῦλος, περὶ τούτου τοῦ καλουμένου ἀντιχρίστου διδάσκων, καὶ παριστὰς μετά τινος ἐπικρύψεως τίνα τρόπον ἐπιδημήσει, καὶ πότε τῷ γένει τῶν ἀνθρώπων, καὶ διὰ τί. He then quotes this whole passage.

4. Respecting, however, the minor particulars of the prophecy, they are not so entirely at agreement. Augustine says (de civ. Dei, xx. 19. 2, p. 685: cf. also Jerome in the note),—'in quo templo Dei sit sessurus, incertum est: utrum in illa ruina templi quod a Salomone rege constructum est, an vero in Ecclesia. Non enim templum alicujus idoli aut dæmonis templum Dei Apostolus diceret[3].' And from this doubt about his 'session,' a doubt about his person also had begun to spring up; for he continues, 'unde nonnulli non ipsum principem sed universum quodammodo corpus ejus, id est, ad eum pertinentem hominum multitudinem simul cum ipso suo principe hoc loco intelligi Antichristum volunt.'

5. The meaning of τὸ κατέχον, though, as will be seen from the note, generally agreed to be the Roman empire, was not by any means universally acquiesced in. Theodoret says, τινὲς τὸ κατέχον τὴν Ῥωμαϊκὴν ἐνόησαν βασιλείαν, τινὲς δὲ τὴν χάριν τοῦ πνεύματος. κατεχούσης γάρ, φησί, τῆς τοῦ πνεύματος χάριτος ἐκεῖνος οὐ παραγίνεται, ἀλλ' οὐχ οἷόν τε παύσασθαι παντελῶς τὴν χάριν τοῦ πνεύματος . . . . ἀλλ' οὐδὲ τὴν Ῥωμαϊκὴν βασιλείαν ἑτέρα διαδέξεται βασιλεία· διὰ γὰρ τοῦ τετάρτου θηρίου καὶ ὁ θειότατος Δανιὴλ

CHRYSOSTOM in loc.: τίς δὲ οὗτός ἐστιν; ἆρα ὁ Σατανᾶς; οὐδαμῶς· ἀλλ' ἄνθρωπός τις πᾶσαν αὐτοῦ δεχόμενος τὴν ἐνέργειαν. καὶ ἀποκαλυφθῇ ὁ ἄνθρωπός, φησιν, ὁ ὑπεραιρόμενος ἐπὶ πάντα λεγόμενον θεὸν ἢ σέβασμα. οὐ γὰρ εἰδωλολατρείαν ἄξει ἐκεῖνος, ἀλλ' ἀντίθεός τις ἔσται, καὶ πάντας καταλύσει τοὺς θεούς, καὶ κελεύσει προσκυνεῖν αὐτὸν ἀντὶ τοῦ θεοῦ, καὶ καθεσθήσεται εἰς τὸν ναὸν τοῦ θεοῦ, οὐ τὸν ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ εἰς τὰς πανταχοῦ ἐκκλησίας.

And below: καὶ τί μετὰ ταῦτα; ἐγγὺς ἡ παραμυθία. ἐπάγει γάρ· ὃν ὁ κύριος Ἰησοῦς κ.τ.λ. καθάπερ γὰρ κ.τ.λ. See the rest cited in the note on ver. 8.

CYRIL OF JERUS., Catech. xv. 12, p. 229: ἔρχεται δὲ ὁ προειρημένος ἀντίχριστος οὗτος, ὅταν πληρωθῶσιν οἱ καιροὶ τῆς Ῥωμαίων βασιλείας, καὶ πλησιάζει λοιπὸν τὰ τῆς τοῦ κόσμου συντελείας. δέκα μὲν ὁμοῦ Ῥωμαίων ἐγείρονται βασιλεῖς, ἐν διαφόροις μὲν ἴσως τόποις, κατὰ δὲ τὸν αὐτὸν βασιλεύοντες καιρόν. μετὰ δὲ τούτους ἐνδέκατος ὁ Ἀντίχριστος ἐκ τῆς μαγικῆς κακοτεχνίας τὴν Ῥωμαϊκὴν ἐξουσίαν ἁρπάσας.

Theodoret's interpretation agrees with the above as to the personality of Antichrist and as to our Lord's coming. I shall quote some portion of it below, on ὁ κατέχων, and τὸ μυστήριον.

AUGUSTINE, de civ. Dei, xx. 19. 4, vol. vii. p. 687: "Non veniet ad vivos et mortuos judicandos Christus, nisi prius venerit ad seducendos in anima mortuos adversarius ejus Antichristus."

JEROME, Epist. cxxi., ad Algasiam, qu. 11, vol. i. p. 887 f.: "Nisi, inquit, venerit discessio primum . . . . ut omnes gentes quæ Romano imperio subjacent, recedant ab his, et revelatus fuerit, id est, ostensus, quem omnia prophetarum verba prænunciant, homo peccati, in quo fons omnium peccatorum est, et filius perditionis, id est diaboli: ipse est enim universorum perditio, qui adversatur Christo, et ideo vocatur Antichristus; et extollitur supra omne quod dicitur Deus, ut cunctarum gentium deos, sive probatam omnem et veram religionem suo calcet pede: et in templo Dei, vel Hierosolymis (ut quidam putant), vel in ecclesia, ut verius arbitramur, sederit, ostendens se, tanquam ipse sit Christus et filius Dei: nisi, inquit, fuerit Romanum imperium ante desolatum, et Antichristus præcesserit, Christus non veniet: qui ideo ita venturus est, ut Antichristum destruat."

τὴν Ῥωμαϊκὴν ἠνίξατο βασιλείαν. ἐν δὲ τούτῳ τὸ μικρὸν κέρας ἐβλάστησε τὸ ποιοῦν πόλεμον μετὰ τῶν ἁγίων. αὐτὸς δὲ οὗτός ἐστι περὶ οὗ τὰ προῤῥηθέντα εἶπεν ὁ θεῖος ἀπόστολος. οὐδέτερον τούτων οἶμαι φάναι τὸν θεῖον ἀπόστολον, ἀλλὰ τὸ παρ' ἑτέρων εἰρημένον εἶναι ἀληθὲς ὑπολαμβάνω. ἐδοκίμασε γὰρ ὁ τῶν ὅλων θεὸς παρὰ τὸν τῆς συντελείας αὐτὸν ὀφθῆναι καιρόν. ὁ τοῦ θεοῦ τοίνυν ὄρος νῦν ἐπέχει φανῆναι. And so also Theodor.-Mops.[4] Another meaning yet is mentioned by Chrysostom, or rather another form of that repudiated above by Theodoret, viz., that the continuance of ἡ τοῦ πνεύματος χάρις, τουτέστι χαρίσματα, hindered his appearing. And remarkably enough, he rejects this from a reason the very opposite of that which weighed with Theodoret,—viz., from the fact that spiritual gifts had ceased: ἄλλως δὲ ἔδει ἤδη παραγίνεσθαι, εἴ γε ἔμελλε τῶν χαρισμάτων ἐκλειπόντων παραγίνεσθαι· καὶ γὰρ πάλαι ἐκλέλοιπεν[5]. Augustine's remarks (ubi supra) are curious: "Quod autem ait, et nunc quid detineat scitis, ... quoniam scire illos dixit, aperte hoc dicere noluit. Et ideo nos, qui nescimus quod illi sciebant, pervenire cum labore ad id quod sensit Apostolus, cupimus, nec valemus: præsertim quia et illa quæ addidit, hunc sensum faciunt obscuriorem. Nam quid est, 'Jam enim,' &c. (ver. 7)? Ego prorsus quid dixerit, fateor me ignorare." Then he mentions the various opinions on τὸ κατέχον, giving this as the view of some, that it was said "de malis et fictis qui sunt in ecclesia, donec perveniant ad tantum numerum qui Antichristo magnum populum faciat: et hoc esse mysterium iniquitatis quia videtur occultum . ." then again quoting ver. 7, adds, "hoc est, donec exeat de medio ecclesiæ mysterium iniquitatis, quod nunc occultum est."

6. This μυστήριον τῆς ἀνομίας was also variously understood. Chrysostom says, Νέρωνα ἐνταῦθα φησίν, ὡσανεὶ τύπον ὄντα τοῦ Ἀντιχρίστου· καὶ γὰρ οὗτος ἐβούλετο νομίζεσθαι θεός. καὶ καλῶς εἶπε τὸ μυστήριον· οὐ γὰρ φανερῶς ὡς ἐκεῖνος, οὐδ' ἀπηρυθριασμένως. εἰ γὰρ πρὸ χρόνου ἐκείνου ἀνευρέθη, φησίν, ὃς οὐ πολὺ τοῦ Ἀντιχρίστου ἐλείπετο κατὰ τὴν κακίαν, τί θαυμαστὸν εἰ ἤδη ἔσται; οὕτω δὴ συνεσκιασμένως εἶπε, καὶ φανερὸν αὐτὸν οὐκ ἠθέλησε ποιῆσαι, οὐ διὰ δειλίαν, ἀλλὰ παιδεύων ἡμᾶς μὴ περιττὰς ἔχθρας ἀναδέχεσθαι ὅταν μηδὲν ᾖ τὸ κατεπεῖγον. This opinion is also mentioned by Augustine, al., but involves of course an anachronism. Theodoret, also mentioning it, adds: ἐγὼ δὲ οἶμαι τὰς ἀναφυείσας αἱρέσεις δηλοῦν τὸν ἀπόστολον· δι' ἐκείνων γὰρ ὁ διάβολος πολλοὺς ἀποστήσας τῆς ἀληθείας, προκατασκευάζει τῆς ἀπάτης τὸν ὅλεθρον. μυστήριον δὲ αὐτοὺς· ἀνομίας ἐκάλεσεν, ὡς κεκρυμμένην ἔχοντας τῆς ἀνομίας τὴν πάγην . . . . ὃ κρύβδην ἀεὶ κατεσκεύαζε, τότε προφανῶς καὶ διαῤῥήδην κηρύξει.

[4] It is decisive against this latter view, as Lünemann has observed, that if τὸ κατέχον be God's decree, ὁ κατέχων must be God Himself, and then the ἕως ἐκ μέσου γένηται could not be said.

7.[6] The view of the fathers remained for ages the prevalent one in the Church. Modifications were introduced into it, as her relation to the state gradually altered; and the Church at last, instead of being exposed to further hostilities from the secular power, rose to the head of that power; and, penetrating larger and larger portions of the world, became a representation of the kingdom of God on earth, with an imposing hierarchy at her head. Then followed, in the Church in general, and among the hierarchy in particular, a neglect of the subject of Christ's coming. But meanwhile, those who from time to time stood in opposition to the hierarchy, understood the Apostle's description here, as they did also the figures in the Apocalypse, of that hierarchy itself. And thus arose,—the παρουσία being regarded much as before, only as an event far off instead of near,—first in the eleventh century the idea, that the Antichrist foretold by St. Paul is the establishment and growing power of the Popedom.

8. This view first appears in the conflict between the Emperors and the Popes, as held by the partisans of the imperial power: but soon becomes that of all those who were opponents of the hierarchy, as wishing for a freer spirit in Christendom than the ecclesiastical power allowed. It was held by the Waldenses, the Albigenses, the followers of Wickliffe and Huss. The κατέχον, which retarded the destruction of the papacy, was held by them to be the Imperial power, which they regarded as simply a revival of the old Roman Empire.

9. Thus towards the time of the Reformation, this reference of Antichrist to the papal hierarchy became very prevalent: and after that event it assumed almost the position of a dogma in the Protestant Churches. It is found in Bugenhagen, Zwingle, Calvin, &c., Osiander, Baldwin, Aretius, Erasm.-Schmid, Beza, Calixtus, Calovius, Newton, Wolf, Joachim-Lange, Turretin, Benson, Bengel, Macknight, Zachariæ, Michaelis, &c.: in the symbolical books of the Lutheran Church, and in Luther's own writings: and runs through the works of our English Reformers[7].

10. The upholders of this view generally conceive that the Papacy will go on bringing out more and more its antichristian character, till at last the παρουσία will overtake and destroy it. The ἀποστασία is the fall from pure evangelical doctrine to the traditions of men. The singular, ὁ ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἁμαρτίας, is taken collectively, to signify a 'series et successio hominum,' inasmuch as it is a monarchical empire which is in question, which remains one and the same, though its individual head may change. The godlessness of Antichrist, described in ver. 4, is justified historically by the Pope setting himself above all authority divine and human, the words πάντα λεγόμενον θεόν, &c. being, in accordance with Scriptural usage, taken to mean the princes and governments of the world, and an allusion being found in σέβασμα to σεβαστός, the title of the Roman Emperors. The ναὸς τοῦ θεοῦ is held to be the Christian Church, and the καθίσαι to point to the tyrannical power which the Pope usurps over it. By τὸ κατέχον is understood the Roman Empire, and by ὁ κατέχων the Roman Emperor,—and history is appealed to, to shew that out of the ruins of that empire the papacy has grown up. The declaration, τὸ μυστήριον ἤδη ἐνεργεῖται τῆς ἀνομίας, is justified by the fact, that the "semina erroris et ambitionis," which prepared the way for the papacy, were already present in the Apostle's time. For a catalogue of the τέρατα ψεύδους, ver. 9, rich material was found in relics, transubstantiation, purgatory, &c. The annihilation of Antichrist by the πνεῦμα τοῦ στόματος of the Lord, has been understood of the breaking down of his power in the spirits of men by the opening and dispersion of the word of God in its purity by means of the Reformation; and the καταργήσει τῇ ἐπιφανείᾳ τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ, of the final and material annihilation of Antichrist by the coming of the Lord Himself.

[6] What follows, as far as paragraph 24, is taken principally from Lünemann's Schlussbemerkungen, as above: with the exception of the citations made in full, and personal opinions expressed.

11. In the presence of such a polemical interpretation directed against them, it could hardly be expected that the Roman Catholics on their side would abstain from retaliation on their opponents. Accordingly we find that such writers as Estius, al., interpret the ἀποστασία of the defection from the Romish Church and the Pope, and understand by Antichrist the heretics, especially Luther and the Protestant Church.

12. Even before the reference to the papacy, the interpreters of the Greek Church took Mohammed to be the Antichrist intended by St. Paul, and the ἀποστασία to represent the falling off of many Oriental and Greek Churches to Islamism. And this view so far influenced the Protestant Church, that some of its writers have held a double Antichrist,—an Eastern one, viz. Mohammed and the Turkish power,—and a Western, viz. the Pope and his power. So Melancthon, Bucer, Bullinger, Piscator, &c.

13. Akin to this method of interpretation is that which in our own century has found the apostasy in the enormities of the French Revolution, Antichrist in Napoleon, and τὸ κατέχον in the continuance of the German Empire: an idea, remarks Lünemann, convicted of error by the termination of that empire in 1806.

14. One opinion of modern days has been, that it is objectionable to endeavour to assign closely a meaning to the single details of the imagery used by St. Paul. This has led to giving the whole description a general, ideal, or symbolic sense. So Koppe, who thinks that the Apostle is only following the general import of the Jewish expectations, resting on the prophecy of Daniel, that there should be a season of godlessness before the time of the end, the full eruption of which he expects after his own death: he himself being ὁ κατέχων. Similarly Storr,—who sees in ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἁμαρτίας 'potestas aliqua, Deo omnique religioni adversaria, quæ penitus incognita et futuro demum tempore se proditura sit,' and in τὸ κατέχον, the 'copia hominum, verissimo amore inflammatorum in Christianam religionem.' Nitzsch again believes the 'man of sin to be the power of godlessness' come to have open authority, or the general contempt of all religion. Pelt, comm. in Thess. p. 204, sums up his view thus: "Mihi igitur cum Koppio adversarius ille principium esse videtur, sive vis spiritualis evangelio contraria, quæ huc usque tamen in Pontificiorum Romanorum operibus ac serie luculentissime sese prodiit, ita tamen, ut omnia etiam mala, quæ in ecclesiam compareant, ad eandem Antichristi ἐνέργειαν sint referenda. Ejus vero παρουσία, i. e. summum fastigium, quod Christi reditum, qui nihil aliud est nisi regni divini victoria[8], antecedet, futurum adhuc esse videtur, quum illud tempus procul etiam nunc abesse putemus, ubi omnes terræ incolæ in eo erunt ut ad Christi sacra transeant. κατέχον vero cum Theodoreto putarim esse Dei voluntatem illud Satanæ regnum cohibentem, ne erumpat, et si mediæ spectantur causæ, apostolorum tempore maxime imperii Romani vis, et quovis ævo illa resistentia, quam malis artibus, quæ religionem subvertere student, privati commodi et honoris augendorum cupiditas opponere solet." And Pelt thinks that the symptoms of the future corruption of the Christian Church were already discernible in the apostolic times, in the danger of falling back from Christian freedom into Jewish legality, in the mingling of heathenism with Christianity, in false γνῶσις and ἄσκησις, in angelolatry, in the "fastus a religione Christiana omnino alienus."

15. Olshausen's view is, that inasmuch as the personal coming of Christ is immediately to follow this revelation of Antichrist, such revelation cannot have yet taken place: and consequently, though we need not stigmatize any of the various interpretations as false, none of them has exhausted the import of the prophecy. The various untoward events and ungodly persons which have been mentioned, including the unbelief and godlessness of the present time, are all prefigurations of Antichrist, but contain only some of his characteristics, not all: it is the union of all in some one personal appearance, that shall make the full Antichrist, as the union in one Person, Jesus of Nazareth, of all the types and prophecies, constituted the full Christ. And the κατέχον is the moral and conservative influence of political states, restraining this great final outbreak. See more on this below.

16. On the other hand, some have regarded the prophecy as one already fulfilled. So Grotius, Wetstein, Le Clerc, Whitby, Schöttgen, Nösselt, Krause, and Harduin. All these concur in referring the παρουσία τοῦ κυρίου to the coming of Christ in the destruction of Jerusalem.

17. Grotius holds Antichrist to be the godless Caligula, who (Suet. Calig. 22, 33) ordered universal supplication to himself as the High God, and (Jos. Antt. xviii. 8. 2. Philo, Leg. ad Cai. § 31, vol. ii. p. 576) would have set up a colossal image of himself in the temple at Jerusalem: and in ὁ κατέχων he sees L. Vitellius, the proconsul of Syria and Judæa, whose term of office delayed the putting up of the statue,—and in ὁ ἄνομος, Simon Magus. This theory is liable to the two very serious objections, 1) that it makes ὁ ἄνθρ. τῆς ἁμαρτ. and ὁ ἄνομος into two separate persons: 2) that it involves an anachronism, our Epistle having been written after Caligula's time.

18. According to Wetstein, the ἄνθρ. τῆς ἁμαρτίας is Titus, whose army (Jos. B. J. vi. 6. 1), καιομένου αὐτοῦ τοῦ ναοῦ, καὶ τῶν πέριξ ἁπάντων, κομίσαντες τὰς σημαίας εἰς τὸ ἱερόν, καὶ θέμεναι τῇ ἀνατολικῇ πύλῃ ἄντικρυς, ἔθυσάν τε αὐταῖς αὐτόθι, καὶ τὸν Τίτον μετὰ μεγίστων εὐφημιῶν ἀπέφηναν αὐτοκράτορα. His κατέχων is Nero, whose death was necessary for the reign of Titus,—and his ἀποστασία, the rebellion and slaughter of three princes, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, which brought in the Flavian family. But this is the very height of absurdity, and surely needs no serious refutation.

19. Hammond[9] makes the man of sin to be Simon Magus, and the Gnostics, whose head he was. The ἐπισυναγωγὴ ἐπ' αὐτόν, ver. 1, he interprets as the "major libertas coëundi in ecclesiasticos cœtus ad colendum Christum:" the ἀποστασία, the falling off of Christians to Gnosticism (1 Tim. iv. 1): ἀποκαλυφθῆναι, the Gnostics "putting off their disguise, and revealing themselves in their colours, i. e. cruel, professed enemies to Christ and Christians:" ver. 4 refers to Simon "making himself the supreme Father of all, who had created the God of the Jews" (Iren. i. 24, 1, 2, p. 100 f.). By τὸ κατέχον, he understands the union yet subsisting more or less between the Christians and the Jews in the Apostle's estimation, which was removed when the Apostles entirely separated from the Jews: and ὁ κατέχων he maintains to be virtually the same with τὸ κατέχον, but if any masculine subject must be supplied, would make it ὁ νόμος. The μυστήριον τῆς ἀνομίας he refers to the wicked lives of these Gnostics, but mostly to their persecution of the Christians. Ver. 8 he explains of the conflict at Rome between Simon and the Apostles Peter and Paul, which ended in the death of the former. Lünemann adds, "The exegetical and historical monstrosity of this interpretation is at present universally acknowledged."

[9] On the New Test. in loc.

20. Le Clerc holds the ἀποστασία to be the rebellion of the Jewish people against the yoke of Rome: the man of sin, the rebel Jews, and especially their leader Simon, son of Giora, whose atrocities are related in Josephus:—πᾶς λεγόμ. θεὸς κ.τ.λ., denotes the government:—τὸ κατέχον is whatever hindered the open breaking out of the rebellion,—partly the influence of those Jews in office who dissuaded the war,—partly fear of the Roman armies: and ὁ κατέχων, on one side, the "præses Romanus,"—on the other, the "gentis proceres, rex Agrippa et pontifices plurimi." The μυστήριον τῆς ἀνομίας is the rebellious ambition, which under the cloke of Jewish independence and zeal for the law of Moses, was even then at work, and at length broke openly forth.

21. Whitby takes the Jewish people for Antichrist, and finds in the apostasy the falling away of the Jewish converts to their old Judaism, alluded to in the Epistle to the Hebrews (iii. 12—14; iv. 11; vi. 4—6; x. 26, 27 al. fr.). His κατέχων is "the Emperor Claudius, who will let till he be taken away, i. e. he will hinder the Jews from breaking out into an open rebellion in his time, they being so signally and particularly obliged by him, that they cannot for shame think of revolting from his government."

22. Schöttgen (vol. i. p. 861 ff.) takes Antichrist to be the Pharisees, Rabbis, and doctors of the law, who set up themselves above God, and had impious stories tending to bring Him into contempt: the ἀποστασία, the rebellion against Rome: the κατέχον, "Christiani, qui precibus suis rem aliquando distulerunt, donec oraculo divino admoniti Hierosolymis abierunt, et Pellam secesserunt:" the μυστήριον τῆς ἀνομίας, "ipsa doctrina perversa," referring to 1 Tim. iii. 16.

23. Nösselt and Krause understand by Antichrist the Jewish zealots, and by the κατέχον, Claudius, as Whitby. Lastly, Harduin makes the ἀποστασία the falling off of the Jews to paganism,—the man of sin, the High Priest Ananias (Acts xxiii. 2),—the κατέχων, his predecessor, whose term of office must come to an end before he could be elected. From the beginning of his term, the ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἁμαρτίας was working as a prophet of lies, and was destroyed at the taking of Jerusalem by Titus.

24. All these præterist interpretations have against them one fatal objection:—that it is impossible to conceive of the destruction of Jerusalem as in any sense corresponding to the παρουσία in St. Paul's sense of the term: see especially, as bearing immediately on this passage, 1 Thess. ii. 19; iii. 13; iv. 15; v. 23.

25. A third class of interpretations is that adopted by many of the modern German expositors, and their followers in England. It is best described perhaps in the words of De Wette (Einl. Handb. ii. 132): "He goes altogether wrong, who finds here any more than the Apostle's subjective anticipation from his own historical position, of the future of the Christian Church;" and expanded by Mr. Jowett (vol. ii. p. 178), "Such passages (Eph. vi. 12) are a much safer guide to the interpretation of the one we are considering, than the meaning of similar passages in the Old Testament. For they indicate to us the habitual thought of the Apostle's mind: 'a falling away first,' suggested probably by the wavering which he saw around him among his own converts, the grievous wolves that were entering into the Church of Ephesus (Acts xx. 29): the turning away of all them of Asia (2 Tim. i. 15). When we consider that his own converts, and his Jewish opponents, were all the world to him,—that through them, as it were in a glass, he appeared to himself to see the workings of human nature generally, we understand how this double image of good and evil should have presented itself to him, and the kind of necessity which he felt, that Christ and Antichrist should alternate with each other. It was not that he foresaw some great conflict, decisive of the destinies of mankind. What he anticipated far more nearly resembled the spiritual combat in the seventh chapter of the Romans. It was the same struggle, written in large letters, as Plato might have said, not on the tables of the heart, but on the scene around: the world turned inside out, as it might be described: evil as it is in the sight of God, and as it realizes itself to the conscience, putting on an external shape, transforming itself into a person."

26. This hypothesis is so entirely separate from all others, that there seems no reason why we should not deal with it at once and on its own ground, before proceeding further. It will be manifest to any one who exercises a moment's thought, that the question moved by it simply resolves itself into this: Was the Apostle, or was he not, writing in the power of a spirit higher than his own? In other words, we are here at the very central question of Inspiration or no Inspiration: not disputing about any of its details, which have ever been matters of doubt among Christians: but just asking, for the Church and for the world, Have we, in any sense, God speaking in the Bible, or have we not? If we have,—then of all passages, it is in these which treat so confidently of futurity, that we must recognize His voice: if we have it not in these passages, then where are we to listen for it at all? Does not this hypothesis, do not they who embrace it, at once reduce the Scriptures to books written by men,—their declarations to the assertions of dogmatizing teachers,—their warnings to the apprehensions of excited minds,—their promises to the visions of enthusiasts,—their prophecies, to anticipations which may be accounted for by the circumstances of the writers, but have in them no objective permanent truth whatever?

27. On such terms, I fairly confess I am not prepared to deal with a question like that before us. I believe that our Lord uttered the words ascribed to Him by St. John (ch. xvi. 12, 13); I believe the apostolic Epistles to be the written proof of the fulfilment of that promise, as the apostolic preaching and labours were the spoken and acted proof: and in writing such passages as this, and 1 Thess. iv. 13—17, and 1 Cor. xv., I believe St. Paul to have been giving utterance, not to his own subjective human opinions, but to truths which the Spirit of God had revealed to him: which he put forth indeed in writing and in speaking, as God had placed him, in a Church which does not know of the time of her Lord's coming,—as God had constituted his own mind, the vessel and organ of these truths, and gifted him with power of words,—but still, as being the truth for the Church to be guided by, not his own forebodings, for her to be misled by. What he may have meant by his expressions, is a question open to the widest and freest discussion: but that what he did mean, always under the above necessary conditions, is truth for us to receive, not opinion for us to canvass, is a position, the holding or rejecting of which might be very simply and strictly shewn to constitute the difference between one who receives, and one who repudiates, Christian revelation itself.

28. I now proceed to enquire, which, or whether any of all the above hypotheses, with the exception of the last, seems worthy of our acceptance. For the reason given above (24), I pass over those which regard the prophecy as fulfilled. The destruction of Jerusalem is inadequate as an interpretation of the coming of the Lord here: He has not yet come in any sense adequate to such interpretation: therefore the prophecy has yet to be fulfilled.

29. The interpretations of the ancient Fathers deserve all respect, short of absolute adoption because they were their interpretations. We must always in such cases strike a balance. In living near to the time when the speaking voice yet lingered in the Church, they had an advantage over us: in living far down in the unfolding of God's purposes, we have an advantage over them. They may possibly have heard things which we have never heard: we certainly have seen things which they never saw. In each case, we are bound to enquire, which of these two is likely to preponderate?

30. Their consensus in expecting a personal Antichrist, is, I own, a weighty point. There was nothing in their peculiar circumstances or temperament, which prevented them from interpreting all that is here said as a personification, or from allegorizing it, as others have done since. This fact gives that interpretation a historical weight, the inference from which it is difficult to escape. The subject of the coming of Antichrist must have been no uncommon one in preaching and in converse, during the latter part of the first, and the second century. That no echoes of the apostolic sayings on the matter should have reached thus far, no savour of the first outpouring of interpretation by the Spirit penetrated through the next generation, can hardly be conceived. So far, I feel, the patristic view carries with it some claim to our acceptance.

31. The next important point, the interpretation of τὸ κατέχον and ὁ κατέχων, rests, I would submit, on different grounds. Let us for a moment grant, that by the former of these words was imported the temporal political power, and by the latter, he who wielded it. Such being the case, the concrete interpretation most likely to be adopted by the Fathers would be, the Roman Empire, which existed before their eyes as that political power. But we have seen that particular power pass away, and be broken up: and that very passing away has furnished us with a key to the prophecy, which they did not possess.

32. On the μυστήριον τῆς ἀνομίας, as has been seen, they are divided: but even were it otherwise, their concrete interpretations are just those things in which we are not inferior to them, but rather superior. The prophecy has since their time expanded its action over a wide and continually increasing historic field: it is for us to observe what they could not, and to say what it is which could be thus described,—then at work, ever since at work, and now at work; and likely to issue in that concentration and revelation of evil which shall finally take place.

33. On looking onward to the next great class of interpretations, that which makes the man of sin to be the Papal power, it cannot be doubted, that there are many and striking points of correspondence with the language of the prophecy in the acts and professions of those who have successively held that power. But on the other hand it cannot be disguised that, in several important particulars, the prophetic requirements are very far from being fulfilled. I will only mention two, one subjective, the other objective. In the characteristic of ver. 4, the Pope does not and never did fulfil the prophecy. Allowing all the striking coincidences with the latter part of the verse which have been so abundantly adduced, it never can be shewn that he fulfils the former part, nay so far is he from it, that the abject adoration of and submission to λεγόμενοι θεοί and σεβάσματα has ever been one of his most notable peculiarities[1]. The second objection, of an external and historical character, is even more decisive. If the Papacy be Antichrist, then has the manifestation been made, and endured now for nearly 1500 years, and yet that day of the Lord is not come, which by the terms of our prophecy such manifestation is immediately to precede[2].

[1] It must be plain to every unbiassed mind, that the mere logical inference, that the Pope sets himself up above all objects of worship, because he creates objects of worship, and the maker must be greater than the thing made, is quite beside the purpose. It entirely fails in shewing hostility to, and lifting himself above, every one that is called God or an object of worship. The Pope is the devoted servant of the false gods whom he creates, not their antagonist and treader-down. I should not have noticed so irrelevant an argument, had it not been made much of as against my view.

34. The same remarks will apply even more forcibly to all those minor interpretations which I have enumerated above. None of them exhausts the sense of the prophecy: and the taking any one of them to be that which is here designated, would shew the failure of the prophecy, not its fulfilment: for they have been and have passed away, and the Lord is not yet come.

35. We are thus directed to a point of view with regard to the prophecy, of the following kind. The ἄνομος, in the full prophetic sense, is not yet come. Though 1800 years later, we stand, with regard to him, where the Apostle stood: the day of the Lord not present, and not to arrive until this man of sin be manifested: the μυστήριον τῆς ἀνομίας still working, and much advanced in its working: the κατέχον still hindering. And let us ask ourselves, what does this represent to us? Is it not indicative of a state in which the ἀνομία is working on, so to speak, underground, under the surface of things,—gaining, throughout these many ages, more expansive force, more accumulated power, but still hidden and unconcentrated? And might we not look, in the progress of such a state of things, for repeated minor embodiments of this ἀνομία,—ἄνομοι, and ἀντίχριστοι πολλοί (1 John ii. 18) springing up here and there in different ages and countries,—the ἀποστασία going onward and growing,—just as there were of Christ Himself frequent types and minor embodiments before He came in the flesh? Thus in the Papacy, where so many of the prophetic features are combined, we see as it were a standing embodiment and type of the final Antichrist—in the remarkable words of Gregory the Great, the 'præcursor Antichristi:' and in Nero, and every persecutor as he arose, and Mohammed, and Napoleon, and many other forms and agencies of evil, other more transient types and examples of him. We may, following out the parallelism, contrast the Papacy, as a type of Antichrist, having its false priesthood, its pretended sacrifices, its 'Lord God' the Pope, with that standing Jewish hierarchy of God's own appointing, and its High Priesthood by which our Lord was prefigured: and the other and personal types, with those typical persons, who appeared under the old covenant, and set forth so plainly the character and sufferings and triumphs of the Christ of God.

36. According then to this view, we still look for the man of sin, in the fulness of the prophetic sense, to appear, and that immediately before the coming of the Lord. We look for him as the final and central embodiment of that ἀνομία, that resistance to God and God's law, which has been for these many centuries fermenting under the crust of human society, and of which we have already witnessed so many partial and tentative eruptions. Whether he is to be expected personally, as one individual embodiment of evil, we would not dogmatically pronounce: still we would not forget, that both ancient interpretation, and the world's history, point this way. Almost all great movements for good or for ill have been gathered to a head by one central personal agency. Nor is there any reason to suppose that this will be otherwise in the coming ages. In proportion as the general standard of mental cultivation is raised, and man made equal with man, the ordinary power of genius is diminished, but its extraordinary power is increased; its reach deepened, its hold rendered more firm. As men become familiar with the achievements and the exercise of talent, they learn to despise and disregard its daily examples, and to be more independent of mere men of ability; but they only become more completely in the power of gigantic intellect, and the slaves of pre-eminent and unapproachable talent. So that there seems nothing improbable, judging from these considerations, and from the analogy of the partial manifestations which we have already seen, that the centralization of the antichristian power, in the sense of this prophecy, may ultimately take place in the person of some one of the sons of men.

37. The great ἀποστασία again will receive a similar interpretation. Many signal apostasies the world and the Church have seen. Continually, those are going out from us, who were not of us. Unquestionably the greatest of these has been the Papacy, that counterfeit of Christianity, with its whole system of falsehood and idolatry. But both it, and Mohammedanism, and Mormonism, and the rest, are but tentamina and foreshadowings of that great final apostasy (ἡ ἀποστασία), which shall deceive, if it were possible, even the very elect.

38. The particulars of ver. 4 we regard variously, according as the ἄνομος is a person or a set of persons, with however every inclination to take them literally of a person, giving out these things respecting himself, and sitting as described in the temple of God, whether that temple is to be taken in the strictly literal signification of the Jerusalem-temple (to which we do not incline), or as signifying a Christian place of assembly, the gathering-point of those who have sought the fulfilment of the divine promise of God's presence,—and so called the temple of God.

39. The κατέχον and κατέχων, the one the general hindrance, the other the person in whom that hindrance is summed up, are, in this view, very plain. As the Fathers took them of the Roman Empire and Emperor, standing and ruling in their time, repressing the outbreak of sin and enormity,—so have we been taught by history to widen this view, and understand them of the fabric of human polity, and those who rule that polity, by which the great up-bursting of godlessness is kept down and hindered. I say, we have been taught this by history: seeing that as often as these outbursts have taken place, their course and devastations have been checked by the knitting up again of this fabric of temporal power: seeing that this power, wherever the seeds of evil are most plentiful, is strictly a coercive power, and that there only is its restraining hand able to be relaxed, where the light and liberty of the Gospel are shed abroad: seeing that especially has this temporal power ever been in conflict with the Papacy, restraining its pretensions, modifying its course of action, witnessing more or less against its tyranny and its lies.

40. The explanation of the μυστήριον τῆς ἀνομίας has been already anticipated. It, the ἀνομία, in the hearts and lives, in the speeches and writings of men, is and ever has been working in hidden places, and only awaits the removal of the hindering power to issue in that concentrated manifestation of ὁ ἄνομος, which shall usher in the times of the end.

41. When this shall be, is as much hidden from us, as it was from the Apostles themselves. This may be set, on the one hand, as a motive to caution and sobriety; while on the other let us not forget, that every century, every year, brings us nearer to the fulfilment,—and let this serve to keep us awake and watchful, as servants that wait for the coming of their Lord. We are not to tremble at every alarm; to imagine that every embodiment of sin is the final one, or every falling away the great apostasy: but to weigh, and to discern, in the power of Him, by whom the prince of this world is judged: that whenever the Lord comes He may find us ready,—ready to stand on His side against any, even the final concentration of His adversaries; ready, in daily intercourse with and obedience to Him, to hail His appearance with joy.

42. If it be said, that this is somewhat a dark view to take of the prospects of mankind, we may answer, first, that we are not speculating on the phænomena of the world, but we are interpreting God's word: secondly, that we believe in One in whose hands all evil is working for good,—with whom there are no accidents nor failures,—who is bringing out of all this struggle, which shall mould and measure the history of the world, the ultimate good of man and the glorification of His boundless love in Christ: and thirdly, that no prospect is dark for those who believe in Him. For them all things are working together for good; and in the midst of the struggle itself, they know that every event is their gain; every apparent defeat, real success; and even the last dread conflict, the herald of that victory, in which all who have striven on God's part shall have a glorious and everlasting share.

CHAPTER VII.

ON THE PASTORAL EPISTLES.

THEIR AUTHORSHIP.

1. THERE never was the slightest doubt in the ancient Church, that the Epistles to Timothy and Titus were canonical, and written by St. Paul.

(α) They are contained in the Peschito Syriac version, which was made in the second century.

(β) In the fragment on the Canon of Scripture first edited by Muratori and thence known by his name, generally ascribed to the end of the second century or the beginning of the third (see Routh, Reliq. Sacr. i. pp. 397 ff.), we read, among the Epistles of St. Paul "verum ad Philemonem una, et ad Timotheum duas (duæ?) pro affectu et dilectione, in honore tamen Ecclesiæ catholicæ, in ordinatione ecclesiasticæ disciplinæ, sanctificatæ sunt."

(γ) Irenæus begins his preface, p. 1, with a citation of 1 Tim. i. 4, adding καθὼς ὁ ἀπόστολός φησιν: in iv. 16. 3, p. 246, cites 1 Tim. i. 9: in ii. 14. 7, p. 135, 1 Tim. vi. 20: in iii. 14. 1, p. 201, quotes 2 Tim. iv. 9—11:

> "Lucas . . . . quoniam non solum prosecutor, sed et co-operarius fuerit apostolorum, maxime autem Pauli, et ipse autem Paulus manifestavit in epistolis, dicens: Demas me dereliquit et abiit Thessalonicam, Crescens in Galatiam, Titus in Dalmatiam: Lucas est mecum solus:"

In i. 16. 3, p. 83, quotes Titus iii. 10:

> οὗς ὁ Παῦλος ἐγκελεύεται ἡμῖν μετὰ μίαν καὶ δευτέραν νουθεσίαν παραιτεῖσθαι.

And again, with ὡς καὶ Παῦλος ἔφησεν, iii. 3. 4, p. 177. In iii. 2. 8, p. 176, he says, τούτου τοῦ Λίνου Παῦλος ἐν ταῖς πρὸς Τιμόθεον ἐπιστολαῖς μέμνηται.

(δ) Clement of Alexandria, Strom. ii. 11 [52], p. 457 P.:

Ib. [53], p. 536 P.:

Strom. i. 14 [59], p. 350 P.:

τὸν δὲ ἕβδομον οἱ μὲν . . . οἱ δὲ Ἐπιμενίδην τὸν Κρῆτα . . . οὗ μέμνηται ὁ ἀπόστολος Παῦλος ἐν τῇ πρὸς Τίτον ἐπιστολῇ λέγων οὕτως· Κρῆτες ἀεὶ κ.τ.λ. (Tit. i. 12.)

These are only a few of the direct quotations in Clement.

(ε) TERTULLIAN:

De præscript. hæret. c. 25, vol. ii. p. 37: "Et hoc verbo usus est Paulus ad Timotheum: O Timothee, depositum custodi (1 Tim. vi. 20). Et rursum: Bonum depositum serva" (2 Tim. i. 14). And he further proceeds to quote 1 Tim. i. 18, vi. 13 ff.; 2 Tim. ii. 2 (twice).

Ib. c. 6, p. 18: "Nec diutius de isto, si idem est Paulus, qui et alibi hæreses inter carnalia crimina enumerat scribens ad Galatas, et qui Tito[3] suggerit, hominem hæreticum post primam correptionem recusandum, quod perversus sit ejusmodi et delinquat, ut a semetipso damnatus." (Tit. iii. 10, 11.)

Adv. Marcion. v. 21, p. 524, speaking of the Epistle to Philemon: "Soli huic epistolæ brevitas sua profuit, ut falsarias manus Marcionis evaderet. Miror tamen, cum ad unum hominem literas factas receperit, quod ad Timotheum duas et unam ad Titum de ecclesiastico statu compositas recusaverit."

(ζ) Eusebius includes all three Epistles among the universally confessed canonical writings (ὁμολογούμενα), H. E. iii. 25.

It is useless to cite further testimonies, for they are found everywhere, and in abundance.

2. But we must notice various allusions, more or less clear, to these Epistles, which occur in the earlier Fathers.

(η) CLEMENT OF ROME (end of Cent. I.): Ep. 1 ad Cor. ch. 29, p. 269: προσέλθωμεν οὖν αὐτῷ ἐν ὁσιότητι ψυχῆς, ἁγνὰς καὶ ἀμιάντους χεῖρας αἴροντες πρὸς αὐτόν. See 1 Tim. ii. 8[4].

(θ) IGNATIUS (beginning of Cent. II.): Ep. to Polycarp, § 6, p. 724: ἀρέσκετε ᾧ στρατεύεσθε. See 2 Tim. ii. 4.

(ι) POLYCARP (beginning of Cent. II.): Ep. ad Philipp. ch. 4, p. 1006: ἀρχὴ δὲ πάντων χαλεπῶν φιλαργυρία· εἰδότες οὖν ὅτι οὐδὲν εἰσηνέγκαμεν εἰς τὸν κόσμον, ἀλλ' οὐδὲ ἐξενεγκεῖν τι ἔχομεν, ὁπλισώμεθα τοῖς ὅπλοις τῆς δικαιοσύνης: 1 Tim. vi. 7, 10.

[3] Dr. Davidson, Introd. iii. 109, omits the word 'Tito,' as it would appear, from inadvertency.

[4] Two other supposed references may be seen in Lardner, ii. p. 39, and Davidson, iii. p. 101; but they are too slight to authorize their introduction here.

Ib. ch. 9, p. 1013: οὐ γὰρ τὸν νῦν ἠγάπησαν αἰῶνα. See 2 Tim. iv. 10[5].

(κ) HEGESIPPUS (end of Cent. II.), as cited by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 32), says that, while the ἱερὸς τῶν ἀποστόλων χορός remained, the Church παρθένος καθαρὰ καὶ ἀδιάφθορος ἔμεινεν: but that, after their withdrawal, and that of those who had been ear-witnesses of inspired wisdom, ἡ σύστασις τῆς ἀθέου πλάνης began, διὰ τῆς τῶν ἑτεροδιδασκάλων ἀπάτης: who, as no apostle was left, γυμνῇ λοιπὸν ἤδη τῇ κεφαλῇ τῷ τῆς ἀληθείας κηρύγματι τὴν ψευδώνυμον γνῶσιν ἀντικηρύττειν ἐπεχείρουν. See 1 Tim. vi. 3, 20[6].

(λ) ATHENAGORAS (end of Cent. II.): Legat. pro Christianis 16, p. 291: πάντα γὰρ ὁ θεός ἐστιν αὐτὸς αὑτῷ, φῶς ἀπρόσιτον: 1 Tim. vi. 16.

(μ) THEOPHILUS OF ANTIOCH (end of Cent. II.): ad Autolyc. iii. 14, p. 389: ἔτι μὴν καὶ περὶ τοῦ ὑποτάσσεσθαι ἀρχαῖς καὶ ἐξουσίαις, καὶ εὔχεσθαι περὶ αὐτῶν, κελεύει ἡμᾶς θεῖος λόγος ὅπως ἥρεμον καὶ ἡσύχιον βίον διάγωμεν. 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2. Tit. iii. 1[7].
ii. p. 95 (Lardner): διὰ ὕδατος καὶ λουτροῦ παλιγγενεσίας πάντας τοὺς προσιόντας τῇ ἀληθείᾳ.

(ν) To these may be added Justin Martyr (middle of Cent. II.), Dial. c. Tryph. c. 47, p. 143: ἡ χρηστότης καὶ ἡ φιλανθρωπία τοῦ θεοῦ. Tit. iii. 4.

3. Thus the Pastoral Epistles seem to have been from the earliest times known, and continuously quoted, in the Church. It is hardly possible to suppose that the above coincidences are all fortuitous. The only other hypothesis on which they can be accounted for, will be treated further on.

4. Among the Gnostic heretics, however, they did not meet with such universal acceptance. Clement of Alexandria, Strom. ii. 11 (p. 457 P.), after having quoted 1 Tim. vi. 20 ff., adds: ὑπὸ ταύτης ἐλεγχόμενοι τῆς φωνῆς, οἱ ἀπὸ τῶν αἱρέσεων τὰς πρὸς Τιμόθεον ἀθετοῦσιν ἐπιστολάς. Tertullian (see above, under ε) states that Marcion rejected from his canon (recusaverit) the Epistles to Timothy and Titus. And Jerome, Prol. ad Titum, vol. vii. p. 685, says: "Licet non sint digni fide qui fidem primam irritam fecerunt, Marcionem loquor et Basilidem et omnes hæreticos qui vetus laniant testamentum: tamen eos aliqua ex parte ferremus, si saltem in novo continerent manus suas, et non auderent Christi (ut ipsi jactitant) boni Dei Filii, vel Evangelistas violare, vel Apostolos . . . . . ut enim de cæteris Epistolis taceam, de quibus quicquid contrarium suo dogmati viderant, eraserunt, nonnullas integras repudiandas crediderunt, ad Timotheum videlicet utramque, ad Hebræos, et ad Titum, quam nunc conamur exponere . . . . . Sed Tatianus, Encratitarum patriarches, qui et ipse nonnullas Pauli Epistolas repudiavit, hanc vel maxime, id est, ad Titum, Apostoli pronunciandam credidit, parvipendens Marcionis et aliorum, qui cum eo in hac parte consentiunt, assertionem." This last fact, Tatian's acceptance of the Epistle to Titus, Huther thinks may be accounted for by the false teachers in that Epistle being more expressly designated as Jews, ch. i. 10, 14; iii. 9.

[5] See other slighter parallels in Lardner and Davidson, ubi supra. The μέγα τῆς θεοσεβείας μυστήριον, commonly adduced from Justin (in Eus. H. E. iii. 27), is not his, but forms part of the text of Eusebius. See Huther, Einl. p. 35.

[6] See on Baur's attempt to meet this, below, par. 14 note.

[7] Lardner gives ὃς διδάσκει ἡμᾶς δικαιοπραγεῖν, καὶ εὐσεβεῖν καὶ καλοποιεῖν, as an allusion to Tit. ii. 11, 12: but it is far too slight.

5. From their time to the beginning of the present century, the authenticity of the Pastoral Epistles remained unquestioned. At that time, Schmidt (J. E. C.) first, and afterwards Schleiermacher (in his Letters to Gass, 1807) attacked the genuineness of the first Epistle to Timothy: which on the other hand, was defended by Planck, Wegscheider, and Beckhaus. It soon began however to be seen, that from the close relation of the three Epistles, the arguments which Schleiermacher had used against one, would apply to all: and accordingly first Eichhorn, and then not so decidedly De Wette, denied the genuineness of all three.

6. The latter Commentator, in his Introduction (1826), combined the view of Schleiermacher, that 1 Tim. was a compilation from the other two, with that of Eichhorn, that all three were not the genuine productions of St. Paul: but at the same time allowed to the consent of the Church in all ages so much weight, that his view influenced only the historical origin of the Epistles, not their credit and authority.

7. This mere negative ground was felt to be unsatisfactory: and Eichhorn soon put forth a positive hypothesis, that the Epistles were written by some disciple of St. Paul, with a view of collecting together his oral injunctions respecting the constitution of the Church. This was adopted by Schott, with the further conjecture that St. Luke was the author.

8. The defenders of the Epistles[8] found it not difficult to attack such a position as this, which was raised on mere conjecture after all: and Baur, on the other hand, remarked[9], "We have no sufficient resting-place for our critical judgment, as long as we only lay down that the Epistles are not Pauline: we must have established some positive data which transfer them from the Apostle's time into another age." Accordingly, he himself has laboured to prove them to have been written in the time of the Marcionite heresy; and their author to have been one who, not having the ability himself to attack the Gnostic positions, thought to uphold the Pauline party by putting his denunciations of it into the mouth of the Apostle.

9. This view of Baur's has been, however, very far from meeting with general adoption, even among the impugners of the genuineness of our Epistles. The new school of Tübingen have alone accepted it with favour. De Wette himself, in the later editions of his Handbuch (I quote from that of 1847), though he is stronger than ever against the three Epistles, does not feel satisfied with the supposed settling of the question by Baur. He remarks, "According to Baur, the Epistles were written after the middle of the second century, subsequently to the appearance of Marcion and other Gnostics. But, inasmuch as the allusions to Marcion, on which he builds this hypothesis, are by no means certain, and the testimonies of the existence of the Pastoral Epistles stand in the way (for it is hardly probable that the passage in Polycarp, c. 4 [see above, par. 2], can have been the original of 1 Tim. vi. 7, 10): it seems that we must assume an earlier date for the Epistles,—somewhere about the end of the first century[1]."

10. With this last dictum of De Wette's, adverse criticism has resumed its former uncertain footing, and is reduced to the mere negative complexion which distinguished it before the appearance of Baur's first work. We have then merely to consider it as a negation of the Pauline origin of the Epistles, and to examine the grounds on which that negation rests. These may be generally stated under the three following heads:

I. The historical difficulty of finding a place for the writing of the three Epistles during the lifetime of St. Paul:

II. The apparent contact with various matters and persons who belong to a later age than that of the Apostles: and

III. The peculiarity of expressions and modes of thought, both of which diverge from those in St. Paul's recognized Epistles.

11. Of the first of these I shall treat below, in the section "On the times and places of writing." It may suffice here to anticipate merely the general conclusion to which I have there come, viz. that they belong to the latest period of our Apostle's life, after his liberation from the imprisonment of Acts xxviii. Thus much was necessary in order to our discussion of the two remaining grounds of objection.

12. As regards objection II., three subordinate points require notice:

(a) The heretics, whose views and conduct are opposed in all three Epistles.

It is urged that these belonged to later times, and their tenets to systems undeveloped in the apostolic age. In treating of the various places where they are mentioned, I have endeavoured to shew that the tenets and practices predicated of them will best find their explanation by regarding them as the marks of a state of transition between Judaism, through its ascetic form, and Gnosticism proper, as we afterwards find it developed[1].

13. The traces of Judaism in the heretics of the Pastoral Epistles are numerous and unmistakeable. They professed to be νομοδιδάσκαλοι (1 Tim. i. 7): commanded ἀπέχεσθαι βρωμάτων (ib. iv. 3): are expressly stated to consist of μάλιστα οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς (Tit. i. 10): caused men προσέχειν Ἰουδαϊκοῖς μύθοις (ib. 14): brought in μάχας νομικάς (ib. iii. 9).

14. At the same time, the traces of incipient Gnosticism are equally apparent. It has been thought best, in the notes on 1 Tim. i. 4, to take that acceptation of γενεαλογίαι, which makes it point to those lists of Gnostic emanations, so familiar to us in their riper forms in after history: in ch. iv. 3 ff., we find the seeds of Gnostic dualism; and though that passage is prophetic, we may fairly conceive that it points to the future development of symptoms already present. In ib. vi. 20, we read of ψευδώνυμος γνῶσις, an expression which has furnished Baur with one of his strongest objections, as betraying a post-apostolic origin[2]. But, granted the reference to gnosis, Gnostically so called, neither Baur nor any one else has presumed to say, when the term began to be so used. For our present purpose, the reference is clear. Again in 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, we read of some of them explaining away the resurrection of the body, saying that it has passed already,—a well-known error of the Gnostics (see note in loc.).

15. It remains that we should shew two important facts, which may influence the reader's mind concerning both the nature of these heretics, and date of our Epistles. First, they are not the Judaizers of the Apostle's earlier Epistles. These his former opponents were strong upholders of the law and its requirements: identify themselves plainly with the 'certain men from Judæa' of Acts xv. 1, in spirit and tenets: uphold circumcision, and would join it with the faith in Christ. Then as we proceed, we find them retaining indeed some of their former features, but having passed into a new phase, in the Epistle to the Colossians. There, they have added to their Judaizing tenets, various excrescences of will-worship and superstition: are described no longer as persons who would be under the law and Christ together, but as vain,

[1] See 1 Tim. i. 3, 4, 6, 7, 19; iv. 1—7; vi. 3 ff.; 2 Tim. ii. 16—23; iii. 6—9, 13; iv. 4; Titus i. 10, 11, 14, 16; iii. 9, 10,—and notes.

[2] Baur makes much of the passage of Hegesippus quoted above, par. 2, κ, in which he says that this ψευδών. γνῶσις first became prevalent after the Apostles were removed from the Church. On this he founds an argument that our Epistle could not have appeared till that time. But the passage as compared with the Epistle proves the very reverse. The ψευδών. γν. was secretly working in the Apostles' time, and for that reason this caution was given: but after their time it began to be openly professed, and came forth, as Hegesippus says, with uncovered head.

puffed up in their carnal mind, not holding the Head (see Prolegg. to Col., § ii. 10 ff.).

16. The same character, or even a further step in their course, seems pointed out in the Epistle to the Philippians. There, they are not only Judaizers, not only that which we have already seen them, but κύνες, κακοὶ ἐργάται, ἡ κατατομή: and those who serve God in the power of His Spirit are contrasted with them. And here (Phil. iii. 13), we seem to find the first traces becoming perceptible of the heresy respecting the resurrection in 2 Tim. ii. 18, just as the preliminary symptoms of unsoundness on this vital point were evident in 1 Cor. xv.

17. If now we pass on to our Epistles, we shall find the same progress from legality to superstition, from superstition to godlessness, in a further and riper stage. Here we have more decided prominence given to the abandonment of the foundations of life and manners displayed by these false teachers. They had lost all true understanding of the law itself (1 Tim. i. 7): had repudiated a good conscience (ib. 19): are hypocrites and liars (ib. iv. 2), branded with the foul marks of moral crime (ib.): are of corrupt minds, using religion as a means of bettering themselves in this world (ib. vi. 5. Tit. i. 11): insidious and deadly in their advances, and overturning the faith (2 Tim. ii. 17): proselytizing and victimizing foolish persons to their ruin (ib. iii. 6 ff.): polluted and unbelieving, with their very mind and conscience defiled (Tit. i. 15): confessing God with their mouths, but denying Him in their works, abominable and disobedient, and for every good work worthless (ib. i. 16).

18. I may point out to the reader, how well such advanced description of these persons suits the character which we find drawn of those who are so held up to abhorrence in the later of the Catholic Epistles, and in the Epistle to the Hebrews: how we become convinced, as we pass down the apostolic age, that all its heresies and false teachings must be thought of as gradually converging to one point,—and that point, godlessness of life and morals. Into this, Judaism, once so rigid, legality, once so apparently conscientious, broke and crumbled down. I may state my own conviction, from this phænomenon in our Pastoral Epistles, corroborated indeed by all their other phænomena, that we are, in reading them, necessarily placed at a point of later and further development than in reading any other of the works of St. Paul.

19. The second important point as regards these heretics is this: as they are not the Judaizers of former days, so neither are they the Gnostics of later days. Many minor points of difference might be insisted on, which will be easily traced out by any student of church history: I will only lay stress on one, which is in my mind fundamental and decisive.

20. The Gnosticism of later days was eminently anti-judaistic. The Jewish Creator, the Jewish law and system, were studiously held in contempt and abhorrence. The whole system had migrated, so to speak, from its Jewish standing-point, and stood now entirely over against it. And there can be little doubt, whatever other causes may have co-operated to bring about this change, that the great cause of it was the break-up of the Jewish hierarchy and national system with the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. The heretical speculations had, so to speak, no longer any mooring-place in the permanence of the old law, and thus, rapidly drifting away from it, soon lost sight of it altogether, and learned to despise it as a thing gone by. Then the oriental and Grecian elements, which had before been in a state of forced and unnatural fusion with Judaism, cast it out altogether, retaining only those traces of it which involved no recognition of its peculiar tenets.

21. The false teachers then of our Epistles seem to hold a position intermediate to the Apostle's former Judaizing adversaries and the subsequent Gnostic heretics, distinct from both, and just at that point in the progress from the one form of error to the other, which would suit the period subsequent to the Epistle to the Philippians, and prior to the destruction of Jerusalem. There is therefore nothing in them and their characteristics, which can cast a doubt upon the genuineness of the Epistles.

22. (b) [See above, par. 12], the ecclesiastical order subsisting when they were written. Baur and De Wette charge the author of these Epistles with hierarchical tendencies. They hold that the strengthening and developing of the hierarchy, as we find it aimed at in the directions here given, could not have been an object with St. Paul. De Wette confines himself to this general remark: Baur goes further into detail. In his earlier work, on the Pastoral Epistles, he asserts, that in the genuine Pauline Epistles there is found no trace of any official leaders of the Churches (it must be remembered that with Baur, the genuine Epistles are only those to the Galatians, Corinthians, and Romans): whereas here those Churches are found in such a state of organization, that ἐπίσκοποι, πρεσβύτεροι, and διάκονοι are significantly put forward: πρεσβύτεροι according to him being the name for the collective body of church-rulers, and ἐπίσκοπος for that one of them who was singly entrusted with the government. In his later work ('Paulus u.s.w.'), he maintains that the Gnostics, as the first heretics proper, gave the first occasion for the foundation of the episcopal government of the Churches. But even granting this, the very assumption would prove the earlier origin of our Epistles: for in them there is not the slightest trace of episcopal government, in the later sense. Baur's own explanation of ἐπίσκοπος differs entirely from that later sense.

23. The fact is, that the form of Church government disclosed in our Epistles is of the simplest kind possible. The diaconate was certainly, in some shape or other, coæval with the very infancy of the Church:

and the presbyterate was almost a necessity for every congregation. No Church could subsist without a government of some kind: and it would be natural that such an one as that implied in the presbyterate should arise out of the circumstances in every case.

24. The directions also which are here given, are altogether of an ethical, not of an hierarchical kind. They refer to the selection of men, whose previous lives and relations in society afford good promise that they will discharge faithfully the trust committed to them, and work faithfully and successfully in their office. The fact that no such directions are found in the other Epistles, is easily accounted for: partly from the nature of the case, seeing that he is here addressing persons who were entrusted with this selection, whereas in those others no such matter is in question: partly also from the late date of these letters, the Apostle being now at the end of his own course,—seeing dangerous heresies growing up around the Church, and therefore anxious to give those who were to succeed him in its management, direction how to consolidate and secure it.

25. Besides which, it is a pure assumption that St. Paul could not, from his known character, have been anxious in this matter. In the Acts, we find him ever most careful respecting the consolidation and security of the churches which he had founded: witness his journeys to inspect and confirm his converts (Acts xv. 36; xviii. 23), and that speech uttered from the very depth of his personal feeling and desire, to the presbytery of the Ephesian Church (ib. xx. 18—38).

26. We must infer then, that there is nothing in the hints respecting Church-government which these Epistles contain, to make it improbable that they were written by St. Paul towards the close of his life.

27 (c) [See above, par. 12.] The institution of widows, referred to 1 Tim. v. 9 ff., is supposed to be an indication of a later date. I have discussed, in the note there, the description and standing of these widows: holding them to be not, as Schleiermacher and Baur, deaconesses, among whom in later times were virgins also, known by the name of χῆραι (τὰς παρθένους τὰς λεγομένας χήρας, Ign. ad Smyrn. c. 13, p. 717), but as De W., al., an especial band of real widows, set apart, but not yet formally and finally, for the service of God and the Church. In conceiving such a class to have existed thus early, there is no difficulty: indeed nothing could be more natural: we already find traces of such a class in Acts ix. 41; and it would grow up and require regulating in every portion of the Church. On the ἑνὸς ἀνδρὸς γυνή, which is supposed to make another difficulty, see note, 1 Tim. iii. 2.

28. Other details belonging to this objection II. are noticed and replied to in treating of the passages to which they refer. They are founded for the most part in unwarranted assumptions regarding the apostolic age and that which followed it: in forgetting that there must have been a blending of the one age into the other during that later section of the former and earlier section of the latter, of both of which we know so little from primitive history: that the forms of error which we find prevalent in the second century, must have had their origin and their infancy in an age previous: and that here as elsewhere, 'the child is father of the man:' the same characteristics, which we meet full-grown both in the heretics and in the Church of the second century, must be expected to occur in their initiative and less consolidated form in the latter days of the Apostles and their Church[4].

29. We come now to treat of objection III.,—the peculiarity of expressions and modes of thought, both of which diverge from those in St. Paul's recognized Epistles. There is no denying that the Pastoral Epistles do contain very many peculiar words and phrases, and that the process of thought is not that which the earlier Epistles present. Still, our experience of men in general, and of St. Paul himself, should make us cautious how we pronounce hastily on a phænomenon of this kind. Men's method of expression changes with the circumstances among which they are writing, and the persons whom they are addressing. Assuming the late date for our Epistles which we have already mentioned, the circumstances both of believers and false teachers had materially changed since most of those other Epistles were written. And if it be said that on any hypothesis it cannot have been many years since the Epistles of the imprisonment, we may allege on the other hand the very great difference in subject, the fact that these three are addressed to his companions in the ministry, and contain directions for Church management, whereas none of the others contain any passages so addressed or of such character.

30. Another circumstance here comes to our notice, which may have modified the diction and style at least of these Epistles. Most of those others were written by the hand of an amanuensis; and not only so, but probably with the co-operation, as to form of expression and putting out of the material, of either that amanuensis or some other of his fellow-helpers. The peculiar character of these Pastoral Epistles forbids us from imagining that they were so written. Addressed to dear friends and valued colleagues in the ministry, it was not probable that he should have written them by the agency of others. Have we then, assuming that he wrote them with his own hand, any points of comparison in the other Epistles? Can we trace any resemblance to their peculiar diction in portions of those other Epistles which were undoubtedly or probably also autographic?

31. The first unquestionably autographic Epistle which occurs to us is that to Philemon: which has also this advantage for comparison, that it is written to an individual, and in the later portion of St. Paul's life. And it must be confessed, that we do not find here the resemblance of which we are in search. The single word εὔχρηστος is the only point of contact between the unusual expressions of the two. It is true that the occasion and subject of the Epistle to Philemon were totally distinct from those of any of the Pastoral Epistles: almost all their ἅπαξ λεγόμενα are from the very nature of things excluded from it. Still I must admit that the dissimilarity is striking and not easily accounted for. I would not disguise the difficulty which besets this portion of our subject: I would only endeavour to point out in what direction it ought to guide our inference from the phænomena.

32. We have found reason to believe (see note on Gal. vi. 11) that the Epistle to the Galatians was of this same autographic character. Allowing for the difference of date and circumstances, we may expect to find here some points of peculiarity in common. In both, false teachers are impugned: in both, the Apostle is eager and fervent, abrupt in expression, and giving vent to his own individual feelings. And here we do not seek in vain [5]. We find several unusual words and phrases common only to the two or principally occurring in them. Here again, however, the total difference of subject throughout a great portion of the Epistle to the Galatians prevents any very great community of expression.

33. We have a very remarkable addition to the Epistle to the Romans in the doxology, ch. xvi. 25, 26; appended to it, as we have there in-

[5] I set down a list of the principal similarities which I have observed between the diction of the Gal. and the Pastoral Epp.:

1. τοῦ δόντος ἑαυτὸν περὶ κ.τ.λ., Gal. i. 4: compare ὁ δοὺς ἑαυτὸν ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ κ.τ.λ., 1 Tim. ii. 6; ὃς ἔδωκεν ἑαυτὸν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν, Tit. ii. 14. These are the only places where this expression is used of our Lord.
2. εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, Gal. i. 5: compare the same expression in 1 Tim. i. 17, 2 Tim. iv. 18. The only other places where it occurs is in the last Epistle of the imprisonment, Phil. iv. 20.
3. προϊκοπτον, Gal. i. 14, found in 2 Tim. ii. 16, iii. 9, 13, and Rom. xiii. 12 only in St. Paul.
4. ἰδοὺ ἐνώπιον τοῦ θεοῦ, Gal. i. 20: the expression ἐν τ. θ. occurs elsewhere frequently in St. Paul, but in this asseverative sense is found only in the Past. Epp.: 1 Tim. v. 21, vi. 13, 2 Tim. ii. 14 (κυρίου), iv. 1.
5. στύλος, Gal. ii. 9: in St. Paul, 1 Tim. iii. 15 only.
6. ἀνόητοι, Gal. iii. 1: in St. Paul (Rom. i. 14), 1 Tim. vi. 9, Tit. iii. 3 only.
7. μεσίτης, Gal. iii. 20: in St. Paul (three times in Hebrews), 1 Tim. ii. 5 only.
8. ἐλπίς, objective, Gal. v. 5: compare Tit. ii. 13.
9. πνεύματι ἄγεσθε, Gal. v. 18: construction, with ἄγομαι (Rom. viii. 14), 2 Tim. iii. 6 only.
10. καιρῷ ἰδίῳ, Gal. vi. 9: found 1 Tim. ii. 6, vi. 15, Tit. i. 3 only.

ferred, in later times by the Apostle himself, as a thankful effusion of his fervent mind. That addition is in singular accordance with the general style of these Epistles. We may almost conceive him to have taken his pen off from writing one of them, and to have written it under the same impulse[6].

34. There remain, however, many expressions and ideas not elsewhere found. Such are πιστὸς ὁ λόγος, 1 Tim. i. 15; iii. 1; iv. 9: 2 Tim. ii. 11: Tit. iii. 8,—a phrase dwelling much at this time on the mind of the writer, but finding its parallel at other times in his favourite πιστὸς ὁ θεός, and the like: cf. 1 Cor. i. 9; x. 13: 2 Cor. i. 18: 1 Thess. v. 24: 2 Thess. iii. 3:—εὐσέβεια, εὐσεβῶς, 1 Tim. ii. 2; iii. 16; iv. 7; vi. 11: 2 Tim. iii. 5, 12: Tit. i. 1; ii. 12,—of which we can only say that occurring as it does in this peculiar sense only here and in 2 Peter, we should be disposed to ascribe its use to the fact of the word having at the time become prevalent in the Church as a compendious term for the religion of Christians:—σώφρων and its derivatives, 1 Tim. ii. 9, 15; iii. 2: 2 Tim. i. 7: Tit. i. 8; ii. 2, 4 ff., 12,—a term by no means strange to the Apostle's other writings, cf. Rom. xii. 3: 2 Cor. v. 13, but probably coming into more frequent use as the necessity for the quality itself became more and more apparent in the settlement of the Church (cf. also 1 Pet. iv. 7):—ὑγιής, ὑγιαίνειν, of right doctrine, 1 Tim. i. 10; vi. 3: 2 Tim. i. 13; iv. 3: Tit. i. 9, 13; ii. 1 f., 8,—one of the most curious peculiarities of our Epistles, and only to be ascribed to the prevalence of the image in the writer's mind at the time, arising probably from the now apparent tendency of the growing heresies to corrupt the springs of moral action:—μῦθοι, 1 Tim. i. 4; iv. 7: 2 Tim. iv. 4: Tit. i. 14,—to be accounted for by the fact of the heretical legends having now assumed such definite shape as to deserve this name, cf. also 2 Pet. i.

ver. 25. εὐαγγέλιόν μου: (Rom. ii. 16) 2 Tim. ii. 8 only.
κήρυγμα (1 Cor. i. 21, ii. 4, xv. 14): 2 Tim. iv. 17, Tit. i. 3 only.
χρόνοις αἰωνίοις: 2 Tim. i. 9, Tit. i. 2 only.
ver. 26. φανερωθέντος in this sense, St. Paul elsewhere, but also 1 Tim. iii. 16, 2 Tim. i. 10, Tit. i. 3.
κατ' ἐπιταγήν . . . θεοῦ, (1 Cor. vii. 6, 2 Cor. viii. 8,) 1 Tim. i. 1, Tit. i. 3 only.
μόνῳ σοφῷ θεῷ: 1 Tim. i. 17, var. readd.

I may add to these instances, those of accordance between the Pastoral Epistles and the speech of St. Paul in Acts xx.: viz.

δρόμος, found only Acts xiii. 25, xx. 24, 2 Tim. iv. 7.
περιποιεῖσθαι, Paul, only Acts xx. 28, 1 Tim. iii. 13.
ἁγιασμός, Paul, only Acts xx. 33, 1 Tim. ii. 9.
ἐπιθυμέω, with a gen., only Acts xx. 33, 1 Tim. iii. 1.
λόγοι τοῦ κυρίου, Acts xx. 35, 1 Tim. vi. 3.

16:—ζητήσεις, 1 Tim. i. 4; vi. 4: 2 Tim. ii. 23: Tit. iii. 9,—which expression, if not exactly applied to erroneous speculations, is yet used elsewhere of disputes about theological questions; cf. Acts xv. 2; xxv. 20 (John iii. 25); the difference of usage is easily accounted for by the circumstances:—ἐπιφάνεια, ifistead of παρουσία, 1 Tim. vi. 14: 2 Tim. iv. 1, 8: Tit. ii. 13,—which has a link uniting it to 2 Thess. ii. 8, and may have been, as indeed many others in this list, a word in familiar use among the Apostle and his companions, and so used in writing to them: —δεσπότης, for κύριος, in the secular sense of master, 1 Tim. vi. 1, 2: 2 Tim. ii. 21: Tit. ii. 9,—which is certainly remarkable, St. Paul's word being κύριος, Eph. vi. 5, 9: Col. iii. 22; iv. 1,—and of which I know no explanation but this possible one, that the Eph. and Col. being written simultaneously, and these three also near together, there would be no reason why he might not use one expression at one time and the other at another, seeing that the idea never occurs again in his writings:—ἀρνεῖσθαι, 1 Tim. v. 8: 2 Tim. ii. 12 f.; iii. 5: Tit. i. 16; ii. 12,—common to our Epistles with 2 Pet., 1 John, and Jude, but never found in the other Pauline writings; and of which the only account that can be given is, that it must have been a word which came into use late as expressing apostasy, when the fact itself became usual, being taken from our Lord's own declarations, Matt. x. 33, &c.:— παραιτεῖσθαι, 1 Tim. iv. 7; v. 11: 2 Tim. ii. 23: Tit. iii. 10,—a word the links of whose usage are curious. It is confined to St. Luke and St. Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews. We have it thrice in the parable of the great supper, Luke xiv. 18, 19: then in the answer of Paul to Festus, in all probability made by himself in Greek, Acts xxv. 11: and Heb. xii. 19, 25 bis. We may well say of it, that the thing introduced the word: had the Apostle had occasion for it in other Epistles, he would have used it: but he has not (the same may be said of γενεαλογίαι, 1 Tim. i. 4: Tit. iii. 9;—ματαιόλογος, -γία, 1 Tim. i. 6: Tit. i. 10;—κενοφωνίαι, 1 Tim. vi. 20: 2 Tim. ii. 16;—λογομαχίαι, -εῖν, 1 Tim. vi. 4: 2 Tim. ii. 14;—παραθήκη, 1 Tim. vi. 20: 2 Tim. i. 12, 14):—σώτηρ, spoken of God,—1 Tim. i. 1; ii. 3; iv. 10: Tit. i. 3; ii. 10, common also to Luke (i. 47) and Jude (25): the account of which seems to be, that it was a purely Jewish devotional expression, as we have it in the Magnificat,—and not thus absolutely used by the Apostles, in their special proclamation of the Son of God in this character;—we may observe that St. Jude introduces it with the limitation διὰ Ἰησοῦ χρ. τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν;—but in familiar writing one to another, when there was no danger of the mediatorship of Jesus being forgotten, this true and noble expression seems still to have been usual:—βέβηλος, 1 Tim. i. 9; iv. 7; vi. 20: 2 Tim. ii. 16,—common only to Heb. (xii. 16),—an epithet interesting, as bringing with it the fact of the progress of heresy from doctrine to practice, as also does ἀνόσιος, 1 Tim. i. 9;

2 Tim. iii. 2:—διαβεβαιοῦσθαι, 1 Tim. i. 7: Tit. iii. 8, a word but slightly differing in meaning, and in its composition with διά (a natural addition in later times), from βεβαιοῦν, which is a common expression with our Apostle, Rom. xv. 8: 1 Cor. i. 6, 8: 2 Cor. i. 21: Col. ii. 7 (Heb. ii. 3; xiii. 9):—προσέχειν, with a dat., 1 Tim. i. 4; iii. 8; iv. 1, 13: Tit. i. 14,—found also frequently in St. Luke, Luke xii. 1; xvii. 3; xxi. 34: Acts v. 35; viii. 6, 10, 11; xvi. 14: xx. 28 (Paul), and Heb. ii. 1; vii. 13: 2 Pet. i. 19:—a word testifying perhaps to the influence on the Apostle's style of the expressions of one who was so constantly and faithfully his companion:—ὑπομιμνήσκειν, 2 Tim. ii. 14: Tit. iii. 1 (2 Pet. i. 12: 3 John 10: Jude 5):—a word naturally coming into use rather as time drew on, than "in the beginning of the Gospel:" —ἀποτρέπεσθαι, ἅπτ., 2 Tim. iii. 5: 1 Tim. i. 6; v. 15; vi. 20: 2 Tim. iv. 4 (Heb. xii. 13),—words owing their use to the progress of heresy; which may be said also of ἀστοχεῖν, 1 Tim. i. 6; vi. 21: 2 Tim. ii. 18,—and of τυφοῦσθαι, 1 Tim. iii. 6; vi. 4: 2 Tim. iii. 4:—&c. &c.

35. There seems no reason why any of the above peculiarities of diction should be considered as imperilling the authenticity of our Epistles. The preceding paragraph will have shewn, that of many of them, some account at least may be given: and when we reflect how very little we know of the circumstances under which they were used, it appears far more the part of sound criticism to let such difficulties stand unsolved, under a sense that we have not the clue to them, than at once and rashly to pronounce on them, as indicative of a spurious origin.

36. Another objection brought by De Wette against our Epistles seems to me to make so strikingly and decisively for them, that I cannot forbear giving it in his own words before commenting upon it: "In the composition of all three Epistles we have this common peculiarity,—that from that which belongs to the object of the Epistle, and is besides for the most part of general import, the writer is ever given to digress to general truths, or so-called common-places (1 Tim. i. 15; ii. 4—6; iii. 16; iv. 8—10: 2 Tim. i. 9 f.; ii. 11—13, 19—21; iii. 12, 16: Tit. ii. 11—14; iii. 3—7), and that even that which is said by way of contradiction or enforcing attention, appears in this form (1 Tim. i. 8—10; iv. 4 f.; vi. 6—10: 2 Tim. ii. 4—6: Tit. i. 15). With this is combined another peculiarity common to them, that after such digressions or general instructions, the writer's practice is to recur, or finally to appeal to and fall back on previous exhortations or instructions given to his correspondent (1 Tim. iii. 14 f.; iv. 6, 11; vi. 2, 5 [rec.]: 2 Tim. ii. 7, 14; iii. 5: Tit. ii. 15; iii. 8)." In commenting on this, I would ask, what could be more natural than both these phænomena, under the circumstances, supposing St. Paul their author? Is it not the tendency of an instructor writing to his pupil to make these compendious references to truths well known and established between them? Would not this especially be the case, as age drew on, and affectionate remembrance took the place of present and watchful instruction? We have hardly a stronger evidence for the authenticity of our Epistles, than our finding them so exactly corresponding with what we might expect from Paul the aged towards his own sons in the faith. His restless energies are still at work: we see that the ἐνδυνάμωσις will keep him toiling to the end in his οἰκονομία: but those energies have changed their complexion: they have passed from the dialectic character of his former Epistles, from the wonderful capacity of intricate combined ratiocination of his subsequent Epistles, to the urging, and repeating, and dilating upon truths which have been the food of his life: there is a resting on former conclusions, a stating of great truths in concentrated and almost rhythmical antithesis, a constant citation of the 'temporis acti,' which lets us into a most interesting phase of the character of the great Apostle. We see here rather the succession of brilliant sparks, than the steady flame: burning words indeed and deep pathos, but not the flower of his firmness, as in his discipline of the Galatians, not the noon of his bright warm eloquence, as in the inimitable Psalm of Love (1 Cor. xiii.).

37. We may also notice, as I have pointed out in the notes on 1 Tim. i. 11 ff., a habit of going off, not only at a word, or into some collateral subject, as we find him doing in all his writings, but on the mention of any thing which reminds him of God's mercies to himself, or of his own sufferings on behalf of the Gospel, into a digression on his own history, or feelings, or hopes. See 1 Tim. i. 11 ff.; ii. 7: 2 Tim. i. 11 ff., 15 ff.; ii. 9, 10; iii. 10 f.; iv. 6 ff. These digressions do not occur in the Epistle to Titus, perhaps on account of the less intimate relation which subsisted between him and the Apostle. I cannot help considering them also as deeply interesting, betokening, as I have there expressed it in the note, advancing age; and that faster hold of individual habits of thought, and mannerisms, which characterizes the decline of life.

38. De Wette brings another objection against our Epistles, which seems to me just as easily to bear urging on the other side as the last. It is, the constant moral reference of all that is here said respecting the faith: the idea that error is ever combined with evil conscience, the true faith with good conscience. From what has been already said, it will be seen how naturally such a treatment of the subject sprung out of the progress of heresy into ethical corruption which we have traced through the later part of the apostolic age: how true all this was, and how necessary it was thus to mark broadly the line between that faith, which was the only guarantee for purity of life, and those perversions of it, which led downwards to destruction of the moral sense and of practical virtue.

39. When however in his same paragraph (Allgem. Bemerkungen üb. die Pastoralbriefe, p. 117 c) he assumes that the writer gives a validity to moral desert, which stands almost in contradiction to the Pauline doctrines of grace, and cites 1 Tim. ii. 15; iii. 13; iv. 8; vi. 18 ff.: 2 Tim. iv. 8, to confirm this,—I own I am quite unable to see any inconsistency in these passages with the doctrine of grace as laid down, or assumed, in the other Epistles. See Rom. ii. 6—10: 1 Cor. iii. 14; ix. 17, 25; xv. 58: Phil. i. 19, and many other places, in which the foundation being already laid of union with Christ by faith, and salvation by His grace, the carrying on and building up of the man of God in good works, and reward according to the measure of the fruits of the Spirit, are quite as plainly insisted on as any where in these Epistles.

40. De Wette also finds what he calls, 'an apology for the law, and an admission of its possessing an ethical use,' in 1 Tim. i. 8. In my notes on that passage, I have seen reason to give it altogether a different bearing: but even admitting the fact, I do not see how it should be any more inconsistent with St. Paul's measure of the law, than that which he says of it in Rom. vii. And when he objects that the universalism of these Epistles (1 Tim. ii. 4; iv. 10; Tit. ii. 11), although in itself Pauline, does not appear in the same polemical contrast, as e. g. in Rom. iii. 29,—this seems very trifling in fault-finding: nothing on the contrary can be more finely and delicately in accordance with his former maintenance against all impugners of God's universal purpose of salvation to all mankind, than that he should, even while writing to one who did not doubt of that great truth, be constant to his own habit of asserting it.

41. There are many considerations pressed by the opponents of the Pauline authorship, which we can only mention and pass by. Some of them will be found incidentally dealt with in the notes: with others the student, who has hitherto followed the course of these remarks, will know how himself to deal. As usual, the similarities to, as well as discrepancies from, the other Epistles, are adduced as signs of spuriousness[1]. The three Epistles, and especially the first to Timothy, are charged with poverty of sentiment, with want of connexion, with unworthiness of the Apostle as author. On this point no champion of the Epistles could so effectually defeat the opponents, as they have defeated themselves. Schleiermacher, holding 1 Tim. to be compiled out of the other two, finds it in all these respects objectionable and below the mark: Baur will not concede this latter estimate, and De Wette charges Schleier-

[1] Huther gives a list of parallels against which this objection has been brought, and I transcribe it, that the reader may judge and refute for himself: 1 Tim. i. 12—14, as compared with 1 Cor. xv. 9, 10: 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12, with 1 Cor. xiv. 34, 35: 2 Tim. i. 3—5, with Rom. i. 8 ff.: ii. 5, with 1 Cor. ix. 24: ii. 6, with 1 Cor. ix. 7 ff.: ii. 8, with Rom. i. 3: ii. 11, with Rom. vi. 8: ii. 20, with Rom. ix. 21: iii. 2 ff., with Rom. i. 29 ff.: iv. 6, with Phil. ii. 17: Tit. i. 1—4, with Rom. i. 1 ff.

macher with having failed to penetrate the sense of the writer, and found faults, where a more thorough exposition must pronounce a more favourable judgment. These differences may well serve to strike out the argument, and indeed all such purely subjective estimates, from the realms of biblical criticism.

42. A word should be said on the smaller, but not less striking indications of genuineness, which we here find. Such small, and even trifling individual notices, as we here meet with, can hardly have proceeded from a forger. Of course a careful falsarius may have taken care to insert such, as would fall in with the known or supposed state of the Apostle himself and his companions at the time: a shrewd and skilful one would invent such, as might further any views of his own, or of the Churches with which he was connected: but I must say I do not covet the judgment of that critic, who can ascribe such a notice as that of 2 Tim. iv. 13, τὸν φελόνην ὃν ἀπέλιπον ἐν Τρωάδι παρὰ Κάρπῳ ἐρχόμενος φέρε, καὶ τὰ βιβλία, μάλιστα τὰς μεμβράνας, to either the caution or the skill of a forger. What possible motive there could be for inserting such minute particulars, unexampled in the Apostle's other letters, founded on no incident in history, tending to no result,—might well baffle the acutest observer of the phænomena of falsification to declare.

43. A concession by Baur himself should not be altogether passed over. St. Paul in his farewell discourse, Acts xx. 29, 30, speaks thus: ἐγὼ οἶδα ὅτι εἰσελεύσονται μετὰ τὴν ἄφιξίν μου λύκοι βαρεῖς εἰς ὑμᾶς μὴ φειδόμενοι τοῦ ποιμνίου, καὶ ἐξ ὑμῶν αὐτῶν ἀναστήσονται ἄνδρες λαλοῦντες διεστραμμένα τοῦ ἀποσπᾶν τοὺς μαθητὰς ὀπίσω ἑαυτῶν. Baur confesses that here the defenders of the Epistles have firm ground to stand on. "Here we see," he continues, "the Apostle anticipating just what we find more in detail in the Pastoral Epistles." But then he proceeds to set aside the validity of the inference, by quietly disposing of the farewell discourse, as written "post eventum." For those who look on that discourse very differently, his concession has considerable value.

44. I would state then the general result to which I have come from all these considerations:

1. External testimony in favour of the genuineness of our Epistles is so satisfactory, as to suggest no doubt on the point of their universal reception in the earliest times.
2. The objections brought against the genuineness by its opponents, on internal grounds, are not adequate to set it aside, or even to raise a doubt on the subject in a fair-judging mind.

45. I therefore rest in the profession of the Epistles themselves, and the universal belief of Christians, that they were VERITABLY WRITTEN BY ST. PAUL[s].

[s] I have preferred in this section giving those considerations which influence most

TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING.

1. A difficult problem yet remains: to assign, during the life of the Apostle, a time for the writing, which will suit the phænomena of these Epistles.

2. It will have been abundantly seen by what has preceded, that I cannot consent to place them in any portion of St. Paul's apostolic labours recorded in the Acts. All the data with which they themselves furnish us, are against such a supposition. And most of all is the state of heresy and false teaching, as indicated by their common evidence. No amount of ingenuity will suffice to persuade us, that there could have been during the long sojourn of the Apostle at Ephesus in Acts xix., such false teachers as those whose characters have been examined in the last section. No amount of ingenuity again will enable us to conceive a state of the Church like that which these Epistles disclose to us, at any time of that period, extending from the year 54 to 63, during which the other Epistles were written. Those who have attempted to place the Pastoral Epistles, or any of them, in that period, have been obliged to overlook all internal evidence, and satisfy themselves with fulfilling the requirements of external circumstances.

3. It will also be seen, that I cannot consent to separate these Epistles widely from one another, so as to set one in the earlier, and the others in the later years of the Apostle's ministry. On every account, they must stand together. Their style and diction, the motives which they furnish, the state of the Church and of heresy which they describe, are the same in all three: and to one and the same period must we assign them.

4. This being so, they necessarily belong to the latest period of the Apostle's life. The concluding notices of the Second Epistle to Timotheus forbid us from giving an earlier date to that, and consequently to the rest. And no writer, as far as I know, has attempted to place that Epistle, supposing it St. Paul's, at any date except the end of his life[9].

my own mind, to entering at full length on all the bearings of the subject. The reader will find a very good and terse compendium of the objections and their answers in Conybeare and Howson, vol. ii. pp. 657—660, edn. 2: and a full and elaborate discussion of both in Dr. Davidson's Introduction to the N. T. vol. iii. pp. 100—153. That portion of Dr. Davidson's work is very well and thoroughly done, in which he shews the insuperable difficulties which beset the hypothesis of a scholar of St. Paul having forged the Epistles at the end of the first century, as De Wette supposes. Huther's and Wiesinger's Einleitungen also contain full and able discussions of the whole question; especially the latter.

[9] De Wette has fallen into a curious blunder in carrying out his own hypothesis. He argues that 1 Tim. must have been written after 2 Tim., because we find Hyme-

5. The question then for us is, What was that latest period of his life? Is it to be placed at the end of the first Roman imprisonment, or are we to conceive of him as liberated from that, and resuming his apostolic labours?

6. Let us first try the former of these hypotheses. It has been adopted by chronologers of considerable note: lately, by Wieseler and Dr. Davidson. We approach it, laden as it is with the weight of (to us) the insuperable objection on internal grounds, stated above. We feel that no amount of chronological suitableness will induce us complacently to put these Epistles in the same age of the Church with those to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philippians. But we would judge the hypothesis here on its own merely external grounds.

7. In order for it to stand, we must find some occasion, previous to the imprisonment, when St. Paul may have left Timotheus at Ephesus, himself proceeding to Macedonia. And this time must of course be subsequent to St. Paul's first visit to Ephesus, Acts xviii. 20, 21, when the Church there was founded, if indeed it can be said to have been then founded. On his departure then, he did not go into Macedonia, but to Jerusalem; which alone, independently of all other considerations, excludes that occasion [1].

8. His second visit to Ephesus was that long one related in Acts xix., the τριετία of Acts xx, 31, the ἔτη δύο of xix. 10, which latter, however, need not include the whole time. When he left Ephesus at the end of this time, after the tumult, ἐξῆλθε πορευθῆναι εἰς τὴν Μακεδονίαν, which seems at first sight to have a certain relation to πορευόμενος εἰς Μακεδονίαν of 1 Tim. i. 3. But on examination, this relation vanishes: for in Acts xix. 22, we read that, intending to go to Jerusalem by way of Macedonia and Achaia, he sent off from Ephesus, before his own departure, Timotheus and Erastus: so that he could not have left Timotheus behind in Ephesus. Again, in 1 Tim. iii. 14, he hopes to return to Ephesus shortly. But we find no trace of such an intention, and no attempt to put it in force, in the history. And besides, even if Timotheus, as has sometimes been thought from 1 Cor. xvi. 11, did return to Ephesus before the Apostle left it, and in this sense might have been left there on his departure, we must then suppose him to have almost immediately deserted the charge entrusted to him; for he is again, in the autumn of naeus, who is mentioned with reprobation, apparently for the first time, in 2 Tim. ii. 17 f.,—in a further stage of reprobation, judged and condemned, in 1 Tim. i. 20. He forgets that, the two Epistles being according to him forgeries, with no real circumstances whatever as their basis, such reasoning is good for nothing. He is in fact arguing from their genuineness to their spuriousness.

[1] This was however supposed by Calvin to have been the time of writing 1 Tim.: on ch. iii. 14,—"omnino enim sperabat se venturum: ut venisse probabile est, si hanc epistolam scripsit quo tempore Phrygiam peragrabat: sicuti refert Lucas Act. xviii. 23."

57, with St. Paul in Macedonia in 2 Cor. i. 1, and in Corinth in the winter (Rom. xvi. 21), and returned to Asia thence with him, Acts xx. 4: and thus, as Wieseler remarks, the whole scope of our Epistle, the ruling and ordering of the Ephesian Church during the Apostle's absence, would be defeated. Grotius suggested, and Bertholdt adopted, a theory that the Epistle might have been sent on St. Paul's return from Achaia to Asia, Acts xx. 4, and that Timotheus may, instead of remaining in Troas on that occasion, as related Acts xx. 5, have gone direct to Ephesus, and there received the Epistle. But, apart from all other difficulties[2], how exceedingly improbable, that such an Epistle should have preceded only by a few weeks the farewell discourse of Acts xx. 18—35, and that he should have sent for the elders to Miletus, though he himself had expressed, and continually alluded to in the Epistle, an intention of visiting Ephesus shortly!

9. These difficulties have led to a hypothesis that the journey from Ephesus is one unrecorded in the Acts, occurring during the long visit of Acts xix. That during that time a journey to Corinth did take place, we have inferred from the data furnished in the Epistles to the Corinthians: see Prolegg. to Vol. II. ch. iii. § v. During that journey, Timotheus may have been left there. This conjecture is at least worthy of full discussion: for it seems to fulfil most of the external requirements of the first Epistle.

10. Mosheim, who was its originator, held the journey to Greece to have taken place very early in the three years' visit to Ephesus, and to have lasted nine months,—thus accounting for the difference between the two years and three months of Acts xix. 8, 10, and the three years of Acts xx. 31. Wieseler[3], however, has so far regarded the phænomena of the Epistle itself, as to shew that it would be very unlikely that the false teachers had early in that visit assumed such consistency and acquired such influence: and besides, we must assume, from the intimation in 1 Tim. i. 3 ff., that the false teachers had already gained some notoriety, and were busy in mischief, before the Apostle's departure.

11. Schrader[4], the next upholder of the hypothesis, makes the Apostle remain in Ephesus up to Acts xix. 21, and then undertake the journey there hinted at, through Macedonia to Corinth, thence to Crete (where he founded the Cretan Churches and left Titus), to Nicopolis in Cilicia (see below, in the Prolegg. to Titus: sending from thence the first Epistle to Timotheus and that to Titus), Antioch, and so through Galatia back to Ephesus. The great and fatal objection to this hypothesis is, the insertion in Acts xix. 21—23 of so long a journey, lasting, according to

[2] See Wieseler, Chronologie, vol. ii. p. 291 ff.
[3] Ib. p. 296 f.
[4] Der Apostel Paulus, vol. i. pp. 100 ff.

Schrader himself[5], two years (from Easter 54 to Easter 56), not only without any intimation from St. Luke, but certainly against any reasonable view of his text, in which it is implied, that the intention of ver. 21 was not then carried out, but afterwards, as related in ch. xx. 1 ff.

12. Wieseler himself has adopted, and supported with considerable ingenuity, a modified form of Schrader's hypothesis. After two years' teaching at Ephesus, the Apostle, he thinks, went, leaving Timotheus there, on a visitation tour to Macedonia, thence to Corinth, returning by Crete, where he left Titus, to Ephesus. During this journey, either in Macedonia or Achaia, he wrote 1 Tim.,—and after his return to Ephesus, the Epistle to Titus: 2 Tim. falling towards the end of his Roman imprisonment, with which, according to Wieseler, his life terminated. This same hypothesis Dr. Davidson adopts, rejecting however the unrecorded visit to Corinth, which Wieseler inweaves into it: and placing the voyage to Crete during the same Ephesian visit, but separate from this to Macedonia.

13. It may perhaps be thought that some form of this hypothesis would be unobjectionable, if we had only the first Epistle to Timotheus to deal with. But even thus, it will not bear the test of thorough examination. In the first place, as held by Davidson, in its simplest form, it inserts into the Apostle's visit to Ephesus, a journey to Macedonia and back entirely for the sake of this Epistle[6]. Wieseler's form of the hypothesis avoids, it is true, this gratuitous supposition, by connecting the journey with the unrecorded visit to Corinth: but is itself liable to these serious objections (mentioned by Huther, p. 17), that 1) it makes St. Paul write the first Epistle to the Corinthians a very short time after the unrecorded visit to Corinth, which is on all accounts improbable. And this is necessary to his plan, in order to give time for the false teachers to have grown up at Ephesus:—2) that we find the Apostle, in his farewell discourse, prophetically anticipating the arising of evil men and seducers among the Ephesians: whereas by any placing of this Epistle during the three years' visit, such must have already arisen, and drawn away many[7]. 3) The whole character of the first Epistle shews that it belongs, not to a very brief and casual absence of this kind, but to one originally intended to last some time, and not unlikely to be prolonged beyond expectation. The hope of returning very soon (iii. 14)

[6] "Why the Apostle went into Macedonia from Ephesus, cannot be discovered." Davidson, vol. iii. p. 13.

[7] Dr. Davidson (iii. p. 14) refers for a refutation of this objection, to his subsequent remarks (pp. 32 f.) on the state of the Ephesian Church. But no sufficient refutation is there found. Granting the whole account of the Ephesian Church there given, it would be quite impossible to conceive that subsequently the Apostle should have spoken of the λύκοι βαρεῖς as altogether future.

is faint: the provision made, is for a longer absence. Had the Apostle intended to return in a few weeks to Ephesus and resume the government of the Church there, we may safely say that the Epistle would have presented very different features. The hope expressed in ch. iii. 14, quite parenthetically, must not be set against the whole character of the Epistle[6], which any unbiassed reader will see provides for a lengthened superintendence on the part of Timothy as the more probable contingency.

14. Thus we see that, independently of graver objections, independently also of the connexion of the three Epistles, the hypothesis of Wieseler and Davidson does not suit the requirements of this first Epistle to Timotheus. When those other considerations come to be brought again into view,—the necessarily later age of all three Epistles, from the heresies of which they treat, from the Church development implied by them, from the very diction and form of thought apparent in them,—the impossibility, on any probable psychological view of St. Paul's character, of placing writings, so altogether diverse from the Epistles to the Corinthians, in the same period of his life with them,—I am persuaded that very few students of Scripture will be found, whose mature view will approve any form of the above hypothesis.

15. It will not be necessary to enter on the various other subhypotheses which have been made, such as that of Paulus, that the first Epistle was written from Cæsarea; &c. &c. They will be found dealt with in Wieseler and Davidson, and in other introductions.

16. Further details must be sought in the following Prolegomena to each individual Epistle. I will mention however two decisive notices in 2 Tim., which no advocate of the above theory, or of any of its modifications, has been able to reconcile with his view. According to that view, the Epistle was written at the end of the first (and only) Roman imprisonment. In ch. iv. 13, we have directions to Timotheus to bring a cloak and books which the Apostle left at Troas. In ib. ver. 20 we read "Erastus remained in Corinth, but Trophimus left I in Miletus sick." To what these notices point, I shall consider further on: I would now only call the reader's attention to the following facts. Assuming as above, and allowing only the two years for the Roman imprisonment, —the last time he was at Troas and Miletus was six years before (Acts xx. 6, 17); on that occasion Timotheus was with him: and he had repeatedly seen Timotheus since: and, what is insuperable, even supposing these difficulties overcome, Trophimus did not remain there, for he was at Jerusalem with St. Paul at the time of his apprehension, Acts xxi. 29. It will be easily seen by reference to any of the supporters of the one imprisonment, how this point presses them. Dr. Davidson tries to account for it by supposing Trophimus to have sailed with St. Paul from Cæsarea in Acts xxvii., and to have been left at Myra, with the understanding that he should go forward to Miletus, and that under this impression, the Apostle could say Trophimus I left at Miletus (ἀπέλιπον ἐν Μιλήτῳ) sick. Any thing lamer, or more self-refuting, can hardly be conceived: not to mention, that thus also some years had since elapsed, and that the above insuperable objection, that Timotheus had been with him since, and that Trophimus the Ephesian must have been talked of by them, remains in full force.

17. The whole force then of the above considerations, as well of the internal character of the Epistles, as of their external notices and requirements, compels us to look, for the time of their writing, to a period subsequent to the conclusion of the history in the Acts, and consequently, since we find in them the Apostle at liberty, subsequent to his liberation from the imprisonment with which that history concludes. If there were no other reason for believing that he was thus liberated, and undertook further apostolic journeyings, the existence and phænomena of these Epistles would enforce such a conclusion upon us. I had myself, some years since, on a superficial view of the Pauline chronology, adopted and vindicated the one-imprisonment theory[9]: but the further study of these Epistles has altogether broken down my former fabric. We have in them, as I feel satisfied any student who undertakes the comparison will not fail to discover, a link uniting St. Paul's writings with the Second Epistle of Peter and with that of Jude, and the Epistles of St. John: in other words, with the later apostolic age. There are two ways only of solving the problem which they present: one of these is, by believing them to be spurious; the other, by ascribing them to a period of St. Paul's apostolic agency subsequent to his liberation from the Roman imprisonment of Acts xxviii. ultt.

18. The whole discussion and literature of this view, of a liberation and second imprisonment of our Apostle, would exceed both the scope and the limits of these Prolegomena. It may suffice to remind the reader, that it is supported by an ancient tradition by no means to be lightly set aside: and to put before him the principal passages of early ecclesiastical writers in which that tradition is mentioned.

19. Eusebius, H. E. ii. 22, relates thus:

> καὶ Λουκᾶς δὲ ὁ τὰς πράξεις τῶν ἀποστόλων γραφῇ παραδούς, ἐν τούτοις κατέλυσε τὴν ἱστορίαν, διετίαν ὅλην ἐπὶ τῆς Ῥώμης τὸν Παῦλον ἄνετον διατρίψαι, καὶ τὸν τοῦ θεοῦ λόγον ἀκωλύτως κηρύξαι ἐπισημηνάμενος. τότε μὲν οὖν ἀπολογησάμενον, αὖθις ἐπὶ τὴν τοῦ κηρύγματος διακονίαν λόγος ἔχει στείλασθαι τὸν ἀπόστολον, δεύτερον δ' ἐπιβάντα τῇ αὐτῇ πόλει, τῷ κατ' αὐτὸν τελειωθῆναι μαρτυρίῳ. ἐν ᾧ δεσμοῖς ἐχόμενος τὴν πρὸς Τιμόθεον δευτέραν ἐπιστολὴν συντάττει κ.τ.λ.

20. Clement of Rome, Ep. i. ad Corinth. c. 5, p. 17 ff. (the lacunæ in the text are conjecturally filled in as in Hefele's edition):

[9] In pp. 5—7 of the Prælectio referred to above, ch. ii. § i. 11 note.

διὰ ζῆλον [καὶ δ] Παῦλος ὑπομονῆς βραβεῖον ὑ[πέσχ]εν, ἑπτάκις δεσμὰ φορέσας, φ[υγα]δευθείς, λιθασθείς. κῆρυξ γ[ενό]μενος ἔν τε τῇ ἀνατολῇ καὶ ἐν [τῇ] δύσει, τὸ γενναῖον τῆς πίστεως αὐτοῦ κλέος ἔλαβεν, δικαιοσύνην διδάξας ὅλῳ τῷ κόσμῳ, κα[ὶ ἐπὶ] τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως ἐλθών, καὶ μαρτυρήσας ἐπὶ τῶν ἡγουμένων. οὕτως ἀπηλλάγη τοῦ κόσμου, καὶ εἰς τὸν ἅγιον τόπον ἐπορεύθη, ὑπομονῆς γενόμενος μέγιστος ὑπογραμμός[1].

21. The fragment of Muratori on the canon contains the following passage[2]:

"Lucas optime Theophile comprehendit quia sub præsentia ejus singula gerebantur, sicuti et semote passionem Petri evidenter declarat, sed profectionem Pauli ab urbe ad Spaniam proficiscentis . ."

This passage is enigmatical, and far from easy to interpret. But all that we need dwell on is, that the journey of St. Paul into Spain is taken as a fact; and in all probability, the word 'omittit' being supplied, the writer means to say, that St. Luke in the Acts does not relate that journey.

22. This liberation and second imprisonment being assumed, it will naturally follow that the First Epistle to Timotheus and that to Titus were written during the interval between the two imprisonments;—the second to Timotheus during the second imprisonment. We shall now proceed to enquire into the probable assignment and date of each of the three Epistles.

23. The last notice which we possess of the first Roman imprisonment, is the Epistle to the Philippians. There (i. 26) the Apostle evidently intends to come and see them, and (ii. 24) is confident that it will be before long. The same anticipation occurred before in his Epistle to Philemon (ver. 22). We may safely then ascribe to him the intention, in case he should be liberated, of visiting the Asiatic and the Macedonian Churches.

24. We suppose him then, on his hearing and liberation, which cannot have taken place before the spring of A.D. 63 (see chronological table in Prolegg. to Acts), to have journeyed Eastward: visiting perhaps Philippi, which lay on the great Egnatian road to the East, and passing into Asia. There, in accordance with his former desires and intentions, he would give Colossæ, and Laodicea, and Hierapolis, the benefit of his apostolic counsel, and confirm the brethren in the faith. And there perhaps, as before, he would fix his head-quarters at Ephesus. I would not however lay much stress on this, considering that there might well have been a reason for his not spending much time there, considering the cause which had driven him thence before (Acts xix.). But that he did visit Ephesus, must on our present hypothesis be assumed as a certain fact, notwithstanding his confident anticipation expressed in Acts xx. 25 that he should never see it again. It was not the first time that such anticipations had been modified by the event [3].

[1] By some of those who deny a second imprisonment, τὸ τέρμα τῆς δύσεως is interpreted as if the gen. were one of apposition, 'his τέρμα, which was ἡ δύσις;' by others it is rendered the goal or centre of the West: by others, the Eastern boundary of the West: and by all it is taken to mean Rome. By those who hold a second imprisonment, it is taken to mean Spain or even Britain.

25. It would be unprofitable further to assign, except by the most distant indications, his course during this journey, or his employment between this time and that of the writing of our present Epistles. One important consideration, coming in aid of ancient testimony, may serve as our guide in the uncertainty. The contents of our Epistles absolutely require as late a date as possible to be assigned them. The same internal evidence forbids us from separating them by any considerable interval, either from one another, or from the event which furnished their occasion.

26. Now we have traditional evidence well worthy of note, that our Apostle suffered martyrdom in the last year, or the last but one, of Nero. Euseb., Chron. anno 2083 (commencing October A.D. 67) says, "Neronis 13°. Nero ad cætera scelera persecutionem Christianorum primus adjunxit: sub quo Petrus et Paulus apostoli martyrium Romæ consummaverunt."

And Jerome, Catalog. Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum (c. 5, vol. ii. p. 838), under Paulus, "Hic ergo, decimo quarto Neronis anno, eodem die quo Petrus, Romæ pro Christo capite truncatus, sepultusque est in via Ostiensi, anno post passionem Domini tricesimo septimo."

27. I should be disposed then to agree with Conybeare and Howson in postponing both the occasions and the writing of the Pastoral Epistles to very near this date. The interval may possibly have been filled up, agreeably to the promise of Rom. xv. 24, 28, and the tradition of Clement of Rome (quoted above, par. 20), by a journey to Spain, the τέρμα τῆς δύσεως: or it may have been spent in Greece and Asia and the interjacent islands.

As we approach the confines of the known ground again furnished by our Epistles, we find our Apostle again at Ephesus. However the [3] Compare 2 Cor. v. 4, 5, with Phil. i. 23. Dr. Davidson (iii. pp. 16 ff.) lays great stress on the οἶδα of Acts xx. 25, as implying certain apostolic foresight in the power of the Spirit, and argues thence that a subsequent visit to Ephesus cannot have taken place. For argument's sake, let it be so, and let us turn to Phil. i. 25, written, according to Dr. Davidson, at the close of the Roman imprisonment, from which he was not liberated but by death. There we read, οἶδα ὅτι μενῶ καὶ παραμενῶ πᾶσιν ὑμῖν εἰς τὴν ὑμῶν προκοπὴν καὶ χαρὰν τῆς πίστεως, ἵνα τὸ καύχημα ὑμῶν περισσεύῃ ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ ἐν ἐμοὶ διὰ τῆς ἐμῆς παρουσίας πάλιν πρὸς ὑμᾶς. Surely what is good on one side is good on the other: and I do not see how Dr. Davidson can escape the force of his own argument. He must take his choice, and give up one οἶδα or the other. He has surrendered the latter: why may not we the former?

intervening years had been spent, much had happened which had wrought changes on the Church, and on himself, since his last visit. Those heresies which were then in the bud, had borne bitter fruit. He had, in his own weak and shattered frame, borne about, for four or five more years of declining age, the dying of the Lord Jesus. Alienation from himself had been spreading wider among the Churches, and was embittering his life. Supposing this to have been in A.D. 66 or 67, and the 'young man Saul' to have been 34 or 35 at his conversion, he would not now be more than 64 or 65: but a premature old age would be every way consistent with what we know of his physical and mental constitution. Four years before this he had affectionately pleaded his advancing years in urging a request on his friend Philemon (Philem. 9).

28. From Ephesus, leaving Timotheus there, he went into Macedonia (1 Tim. i. 3). It has been generally assumed, that the first Epistle was written from that country. It may have been so; but the words παρεκάλεσά σε προσμεῖναι ἐν Ἐφέσῳ πορευόμενος εἰς Μακεδονίαν, rather convey to my mind the impression that he was not in Macedonia as he was writing. He seems to speak of the whole occurrence as one past by, and succeeded by other circumstances. If this impression be correct, it is quite impossible to assign with any certainty the place of its being written. Wherever it was, he seems to have been in some field of labour where he was likely to be detained beyond his expectations (1 Tim. iii. 14, 15): and this circumstance united with others to induce him to write a letter full of warning and exhortation and direction to his son in the faith, whom he had left to care for the Ephesian Church.

29. Agreeably with the necessity of bringing the three Epistles as near as may be together, we must here place a visit to Crete in company with Titus, whom he left there to complete the organization of the Cretan Churches. From the indications furnished by that Epistle, it is hardly probable that those Churches were now founded for the first time. We find in them the same development of heresy as at Ephesus, though not the same ecclesiastical organization (cf. Tit. i. 10, 11; 15, 16; iii. 9, 11, with i. 5). Nor is the former circumstance at all unaccountable, even as combined with the latter. The heresy, being a noxious excrescence on Judaism, was flourishing independently of Christianity,—or at least required not a Christian Church for its place of sustenance. When such Church began, it was at once infected by the error. So that the Cretan Churches need not have been long in existence. From Tit. i. 5, they seem to have sprung up σποράδην, and to have been on this occasion included by the Apostle in his tour of visitation: who seeing how much needed supplying and arranging, left Titus there for that purpose (see further in Prolegg. to Titus, § ii.).

30. The Epistle to Titus, evidently written very soon after St. Paul left Crete, will most naturally be dated from Asia Minor. Its own notices agree with this, for we find that he was on his way to winter at Nicopolis (ch. iii. 12), by which it is most natural to understand the well-known city of that name in Epirus[4]. And the notices of 2 Tim. equally well agree with such an hypothesis: for there we find that the Apostle had, since he last communicated with Timotheus, been at Miletus and at Troas, probably also at Corinth (2 Tim. iv. 13, 20). That he again visited Ephesus, is on every account likely: indeed, the natural inference from 2 Tim. i. 18 is, that he had spent some time (possibly of weakness or sickness—from the expression ὅσα διηκόνησεν: but this inference is not necessary, see note there) at that city in the companionship of Timotheus, to whom he appeals to confirm what he there says of Onesiphorus.

31. We may venture then to trace out this his last journey as having been from Crete by Miletus, Ephesus, Troas, to Corinth (?): and thence (or perhaps direct by Philippi without passing up through Greece: or he may have gone to Corinth from Crete, and thence to Asia) to Nicopolis, where he had determined to winter (Tit. iii. 12). Nicopolis was a Roman colony (Plin. iv. 1 or 2: Tacit. Ann. v. 10), where he would be more sure against tumultuary violence, but at the same time more open to direct hostile action from parties plotting against him in the metropolis. The supposition of Mr. Conybeare (C. and H. ii. 573, edn. 2), that being known in Rome as the leader of the Christians, he would be likely, at any time after the fire in 64, to be arrested as implicated in causing it, is not at all improbable. In this case, as the crime was alleged to have been committed at Rome, he would be sent thither for trial (C. and H. ib. note) by the duumviri of Nicopolis.

32. Arrived at the metropolis, he is thrown into prison, and treated no longer as a person charged with matters of the Jewish law, but as a common criminal: κακοπαθῶ μέχρι δεσμῶν ὡς κακοῦργος, 2 Tim. ii. 9. All his Asiatic friends avoided him, except Onesiphorus, who sought him out, and was not ashamed of his chain (2 Tim. i. 16). Demas, [4] See a complete account of Nicopolis in Wordsworth's Pictorial Greece, pp. 310—312; Conybeare and Howson, vol. ii. p. 572, edn. 2; Smith's Dict. of Geography, sub voce.

It is very improbable that any of the comparatively insignificant places elsewhere called by this name is here intended. An enumeration of them will be found in Smith's Dict. of Geogr. as above. The only two which require mention are, 1) Nicopolis in Thrace, on the Nessus (Νικόπολις ἡ πρὸς Νέσσον, Ptol. iii. 11, 13), supposed by Chrysostom and Theodoret (ἡ δὲ N. τῆς Θρᾴκης ἐστί, Chrys.: τῆς Θρᾴκης ἐστὶν ἡ N., τῇ δὲ Μακεδονίᾳ πελάζει, Thdrt.) to be here intended. This certainly may have been, for this Nicopolis is not, as some have objected, the one founded by Trajan, see Schrader, vol. i. p. 117: but it is hardly likely to have been indicated by the word thus absolutely put: 2) Nicopolis in Cilicia, which Schrader holds to be the place, to suit his theory of the Apostle having been (at a totally different time, see above, par. 11) on his way to Jerusalem.

I may mention that both Winer (RWB.) and Dr. Smith (Dict. of Geogr. as above: not in Bibl. Dict.) fall into the mistake of saying that St. Paul dates the Epistle from Nicopolis. No such inference can fairly be drawn from ch. iii. 12.

Crescens, and Titus had, for various reasons, left him. Tychicus he had sent to Ephesus. Of his usual companions, only the faithful Luke remained with him. Under these circumstances he writes to Timotheus a second Epistle, most likely to Ephesus (ii. 17; iv. 13), and perhaps by Tychicus, earnestly begging him to come to him before winter (iv. 21). If this be the winter of the same year as that current in Tit. iii. 12, he must have been arrested immediately on, or perhaps even before, his arrival at Nicopolis. And he writes from this his prison, expecting his execution (ἐγὼ γὰρ ἤδη σπένδομαι, καὶ ὁ καιρὸς τῆς ἐμῆς ἀναλύσεως ἐφέστηκεν, 2 Tim. iv. 6).

33. We hear, 2 Tim. iv. 16, 17, of his being brought up before the authorities, and making his defence. If in the last year of Nero, the Emperor was absent in Greece, and did not try him in person. To this may perhaps point the μαρτυρήσας ἐπὶ τῶν ἡγουμένων of Clement of Rome (see above, par. 20): but it would be manifestly unwise to press an expression in so rhetorical a passage. At this his hearing, none of his friends was bold enough to appear with or for him: but his Christian boldness was sustained by Him in whom he trusted.

34. The second Epistle to Timotheus dates after this his first apology. How long after, we cannot say: probably some little time, for the expression does not seem to allude to a very recent occurrence.

35. After this, all is obscurity. That he underwent execution by the sword, is the constant tradition of antiquity, and would agree with the fact of his Roman citizenship, which would exempt him from death by torture. We have seen reason (above, par. 26) to place his death in the last year of Nero, i. e. late in A.D. 67, or A.D. 68. And we may well place the Second Epistle to Timotheus a few months at most before his death[s].

[s] One objection which is brought against the view taken above of the date of the Pastoral Epistles, is drawn from 1 Tim. iv. 12, μηδείς σου τῆς νεότητος καταφρονείτω. It is argued (recently by Dr. Davidson, vol. iii. p. 30 f.) that supposing Timotheus to have been twenty when the Apostle first took him for his companion,—at the date which we have assigned to the first Epistle, he would not be less than thirty-four or thirty-five when the Epistle was written; "an age," adds Dr. Davidson, "at which it was not likely he should be despised for his youth." But surely such an age would be a very early one at which to be set over such a Church as that of Ephesus: and at such an age, an ecclesiastical officer whose duty was to rebuke elders, unless he comported himself with irreproachable modesty and gravity, would be exceedingly liable to be slighted and set aside for his youth. The caution seems to me quite to stand in its place, and to furnish no valid objection whatever to our view.

CHAPTER VIII.

ON THE FIRST EPISTLE TO TIMOTHEUS.

THE AUTHORSHIP, and TIME AND PLACE OF WRITING, have been already discussed: and much has been said on the style and diction of this in common with the other Pastoral Epistles. It only remains to consider, 1. The person to whom the Epistle was written: 2. Its especial occasion and object.

SECTION I.

TO WHOM WRITTEN.

1. TIMOTHEUS is first mentioned Acts xvi. 1 ff. as dwelling either in Derbe or Lystra (ἐκεῖ, after both places have been mentioned), but probably in the latter (see on Acts xx. 4, where Δέρβαῖος cannot be applied to Timotheus): at St. Paul's second visit to those parts (Acts ib. cf. xiv. 6 ff.). He was of a Jewish mother (Euniké, 2 Tim. i. 5) and a Gentile father (Acts xvi. 1, 3): and had probably been converted by the Apostle on his former visit, for he calls him his γνησίον τέκνον ἐν πίστει (1 Tim. i. 2). His mother, and his grandmother (Lois, 2 Tim. i. 5), were both Christians,—probably also converts, from having been pious Jewesses (2 Tim. iii. 14, 15), during that former visit.

2. Though as yet young, Timotheus was well reported of by the brethren in Lystra and Iconium (Acts xvi. 2), and hence, forming as he did by his birth a link between Jews and Greeks, and thus especially fitted for the exigencies of the time (Acts ib. ver. 4), St. Paul took him with him as a helper in the missionary work. He first circumcised him (ib. 3), to remove the obstacle to his access to the Jews.

3. The next time we hear of him is in Acts xvii. 14 ff., where he with Silas remained behind in Berœa on occasion of the Apostle being sent away to Athens by sea. From this we infer that he had accompanied him in the progress through Macedonia. His youth would furnish quite a sufficient reason why he should not be mentioned throughout the occurrences at Philippi and Thessalonica. That he had been at this latter place, is almost certain: for he was sent back by St. Paul (from Berœa, see Prolegg. to 1 Thess. § ii. 5 f.) to ascertain the state of the Thessalonian Church (1 Thess. iii. 2), and we find him rejoining the Apostle, with Silas, at Corinth, having brought intelligence from Thessalonica (1 Thess. iii. 6).

4. He remained with the Apostle at Corinth, and his name, together with that of Silas (Silvanus), appears in the addresses of both the Epistles to the Thessalonians, written (see Prolegg. to 1 Thess. § iii.) at Corinth. We have no express mention of him from this time till we find him "ministering" to St. Paul during the long stay at Ephesus (Acts xix. 22): but we may fairly presume that he travelled with him from Corinth to Ephesus (Acts xviii. 18, 19), either remaining there with Priscilla and Aquila, or (which is hardly so probable) going with the Apostle to Jerusalem, and by Antioch through Galatia and Phrygia. From Ephesus (Acts xix. 22) we find him sent forward with Erastus to Macedonia and Corinth (1 Cor. iv. 17; xvi. 10: see on this whole visit, Vol. II. Prolegg. to 2 Cor. § ii. 4). He was again with St. Paul in Macedonia when he wrote the Second Epistle to the Corinthians (2 Cor. i. 1: Vol. II. Prolegg. ibid.). Again, in the winter following we find him in his company in Corinth, where he wrote the Epistle to the Romans (Rom. xvi. 21): and among the number of those who, on his return to Asia through Macedonia (Acts xx. 3, 4), went forward and waited for the Apostle and St. Luke at Troas.

5. The next notice of him occurs in three of the Epistles of the first Roman imprisonment. He was with St. Paul when he wrote to the Colossians (Col. i. 1), to Philemon (Philem. 1), and to the Philippians (Phil. i. 1). How he came to Rome, whether with the Apostle or after him, we cannot say. If the former, we can only account for no mention of him being made in the narrative of the voyage (Acts xxvii., xxviii.) by remembering similar omissions elsewhere when we know him to have been in company, and supposing that his companionship was almost a matter of course.

6. From this time we know no more, till we come to the Pastoral Epistles[1]. There we find him left by the Apostle at Ephesus to take care of the Church during his absence: and the last notice which we have in 2 Tim. makes it probable that he would set out (in the autumn of A.D. 67 ?), shortly after receiving the Epistle, to visit St. Paul at Rome.

7. Henceforward, we are dependent on tradition for further notices. In Eus. H. E. iii. 42, we read Τιμόθεός γε μὴν τῆς ἐν Ἐφέσῳ παροικίας ἱστορεῖται πρῶτος τὴν ἐπισκοπὴν εἰληχέναι: an idea which may well have originated with the Pastoral Epistles, and seems inconsistent with the very general tradition, hardly to be set aside (see Prolegg. Vol. I. ch. v. § i. 9 ff.), of the residence and death of St. John in that city. Nicephorus (H. E. iii. 11) and the ancient martyrologies make him die by martyrdom under Domitian. See Winer, sub voce: Butler's Lives of the Saints, Jan. 24.

8. We learn that he was set apart for the ministry in a solemn manner by St. Paul, with laying on of his own hands and those of the presbytery (1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6), in accordance with prophetic utterances of the Spirit (1 Tim. ib. and i. 18): but at what time this took place, we are not informed: whether early in his course, or in Ephesus itself, as a consecration for his particular office there. This latter seems to me far the more probable view.

9. The character of Timotheus appears to have been earnest and self-denying. We may infer this from his leaving his home to accompany the Apostle, and submitting to the rite of circumcision at his hands (Acts xvi. 1 ff.),—and from the notice in 1 Tim. v. 23, that he usually drank only water. At the same time it is impossible not to perceive in the notices of him, signs of backwardness and timidity in dealing with the difficulties of his ministerial work. In 1 Cor. xvi. 10 f., the Corinthians are charged, ἐὰν δὲ ἔλθῃ Τιμόθεος, βλέπετε ἵνα ἀφόβως γένηται πρὸς ὑμᾶς· τὸ γὰρ ἔργον κυρίου ἐργάζεται ὡς κἀγώ· μήτις οὖν αὐτὸν ἐξουθενήσῃ, προπέμψατε δὲ αὐτὸν ἐν εἰρήνῃ. And in the notes to the two Epistles the student will find several cases, in which the same traits seem to be referred to[2]. They appear to have increased, in the second Epistle[3], where the Apostle speaks earnestly, and even severely, on the necessity of Christian boldness in dealing with the difficulties and the errors of the day.

10. I subjoin a chronological table of the above notices in the course of Timotheus, arranging them according to that already given in the Prolegg. to Acts, and to the positions taken in the preceding chapter:

A.D. 45.	Converted by St. Paul, during the first missionary journey, at Lystra.
51. Autumn.	Taken to be St. Paul's companion and circumcised (Acts xvi. 1 ff.).
	Sent from Berœa to Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 14; 1 Thess. iii. 2).
52.	With Silas, joins St. Paul at Corinth (Acts xviii. 5; 1 Thess. iii. 6).
Winter, see above, ch. v. § iii.	With St. Paul (1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1).
57. Spring.	With St. Paul at Ephesus (Acts xix. 22): sent thence into Macedonia and to Corinth (Acts ib.; 1 Cor. iv. 17, xvi. 10).
Winter.	With St. Paul (2 Cor. i. 1).
58, beginning.	With St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 21).
Spring.	Journeying with St. Paul from Corinth to Asia (Acts xx. 4).
62 or 63.	With St. Paul in Rome (Col. i. 1; Philem. 1; Phil. i. 1).
63—66.	Uncertain.
66 or 67.	Left by St. Paul in charge of the Church at Ephesus. (First Epistle.)
67 or 68.	(Second Epistle.) Sets out to join St. Paul at Rome.
Afterwards.	Uncertain.

[2] See notes on 1 Tim. v. 23; 2 Tim. i. 5, 7; iii. 10; and cf. besides 1 Tim. iv. 12.

[3] It is possible that there may have been a connexion between these indications and the tone of the message in Rev. ii. 1—6: see note there.

OCCASION AND OBJECT.

1. The Epistle declares its own occasion. The Apostle had left the Ephesian Church in charge to Timotheus: and though he hoped soon to return, was apprehensive that he might be detained longer than he expected (1 Tim. iii. 14, 15). He therefore despatched to him these written instructions.

2. The main object must be described as personal: to encourage and inform Timotheus in his superintendence at Ephesus. But this information and precept regarded two very different branches of his ecclesiastical duty.

3. The first was, the making head against and keeping down the growing heresies of the day. These are continually referred to: again and again the Apostle recurs to their mention: they evidently dwelt much on his mind, and caused him, in reference to Timotheus, the most lively anxiety. On their nature and characteristics I have treated in the preceding chapter.

4. The other object was, the giving directions respecting the government of the Church itself: as regarded the appointing to sacred offices, the selection of widows to receive the charity of the Church, and do service for it,—and the punishment of offenders.

5. For a compendium of the Epistle, and other details connected with it, see Davidson, vol. iii.

CHAPTER IX.

THE SECOND EPISTLE TO TIMOTHEUS.

TO WHAT PLACE WRITTEN.

1. It has been very generally supposed, that this Epistle was written to Timotheus while the latter was still at Ephesus.

2. The notices contained in it seem partially to uphold the idea. In ch. i. 16—18, Onesiphorus is mentioned as having sought out the Apostle at Rome, and also having ministered to him at Ephesus: and in ch. iv. 19, the household of Onesiphorus is saluted. Such a notice, it is true, decides nothing: but comes in aid of the supposition that St. Paul was writing to Ephesus. Our impression certainly is, from ch. i. 18, that Onesiphorus resided, when living, at Ephesus.

3. Again, in ch. ii. 17, we find Hymenæus stigmatized as a teacher of error, who can hardly be other than the Hymenæus of 1 Tim. i. 20 (see notes there). Joined with this latter in 1 Tim. appears an Alexander: and we again have an Alexander ὁ χαλκεύς mentioned as having done the Apostle much mischief in our ch. iv. 14: and there may be a further coincidence in the fact that an Alexander is mentioned as being put forward by the Jews during the tumult at Ephesus, Acts xix. 33[1].

4. Besides, the whole circumstances, and especially the character of the false teachers, exactly agree. It would be very difficult to point out any features of difference, such as change of place would be almost sure to bring out, between the heretical persons spoken of here, and those in the first Epistle.

5. The local notices come in aid, but not with much force. Timotheus is instructed to bring with him matters which the Apostle had left at Troas (ch. iv. 13), which he would pass in his journey from Ephesus to Rome. Two other passages (ch. iv. 12, 20) present a difficulty: and Michaelis, who opposes this view, urges them strongly. St. Paul writes, Τυχικὸν δὲ ἀπέστειλα εἰς Ἔφεσον. This could hardly have been so written, as a simple announcement of a fact, if the person to whom he was writing was himself in that city. This was also felt by Theodoret,—δῆλον ἐντεῦθεν ὡς οὐκ ἐν Ἐφέσῳ διῆγεν ἀλλ' ἑτέρωθί που κατὰ τουτονὶ τὸν καιρὸν ὁ μακάριος Τιμόθεος. The only answer that I can give, may be derived from the form and arrangement of the sentence. Several had been mentioned, who had left him of their own accord: then, with δέ, introducing a contrast, he states that he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus. If any stress is meant to be laid on this circumstance, the notice might still consist with Timotheus himself being there: "but do not wonder at Tychicus being at Ephesus, for I sent him thither." This however is not satisfactory: nor again is it, to suppose with Dr. Davidson (iii. 63) that for some reason Tychicus would not arrive in Ephesus so soon as the Epistle. He also writes, Τρόφιμον δὲ ἀπέλιπον ἐν Μιλήτῳ ἀσθενοῦντα. This would be a strange thing to write from Rome to Timotheus in Ephesus, within a few miles of Miletus itself, and respecting Trophimus, who was an Ephesian (Acts xxi. 29). It certainly may be said that there might be reasons why the notice should be sent. It might be intended to clear Trophimus from the charge which appears to be laid against Erastus, that he had remained behind of his own accord in his native land. With the Apostle's delicate feeling for all who were connected with him, he might well state this (again with a δέ) respecting Trophimus, though the fact of his remaining at Miletus might be well known to Timotheus, and his own profession of sickness as the reason.

6. There is a very slight hint indeed given in ch. iv. 11, which may point the same way. Timotheus was to take up Mark and bring him to Rome. The last notice we have had of Mark, was a recommendation of him to the Colossian Church (Col. iv. 10), and that in a strain, which may import that he was to be a resident labourer in the Gospel among them. If Mark was at Colossæ, he might be easily sent for from Ephesus to accompany Timotheus.

OCCASION AND OBJECT.

1. It only remains to enquire respecting this Epistle, what special circumstances occasioned it, and what objects are discernible in it.

2. The immediately moving occasion seems to have been one personal to the Apostle himself. He was anxious that Timotheus should come to him at Rome, bringing with him Mark, as soon as possible (ch. i. 4; iv. 9, 11, 21).

3. But he was uncertain how it might be with himself: whether he should live to see his son in the faith, or be 'offered up' before his arrival. He sends to him therefore, not merely a message to come, but a letter full of fatherly exhortations and instructions, applicable to his present circumstances. And these seem not to have been unneeded. Many of his former friends had forsaken him (ch. i. 15; iv. 10), and the courage and perseverance of Timotheus himself appeared to be giving way (see above, Prolegg. to 1 Tim. § i. 9). The letter therefore is calculated in some measure to supply what his own mouth would, if he were permitted to speak to him face to face, still more fervently urge on him. And thus we possess an Epistle calculated for all ages of the Church: in which while the maxims cited and encouragements given apply to all Christians, and especially ministers of Christ, in their duties and difficulties,—the affecting circumstances, in which the writer himself is placed, carry home to every heart his earnest and impassioned eloquence.

4. For further notices, I again refer to Dr. Davidson, vol. iii. pp. 48—75.

EXCURSUS ON PUDENS AND CLAUDIA.

1. In 2 Tim. iv. 21, we read as follows:

ἀσπάζεταί σε Εὔβουλος καὶ Πούδης καὶ Λῖνος καὶ Κλαυδία καὶ οἱ ἀδελφοὶ πάντες.

2. Martial, lib. iv. Epigr. 13, is inscribed 'ad Rufum, de nuptiis Pudentis et Claudiæ peregrinæ:' and the first lines run thus:

"Claudia, Rufe, meo nubit peregrina Pudenti:
Macte esto tædis, o Hymenæe, tuis."

3. An inscription was found at Chichester in the early part of the last century, and is now in a summer-house in the gardens at Goodwood, running thus, the lacunæ being conjecturally filled in:—

[N]eptuni et Minervæ templum
[pr]o salute d[omu]s divinæ
[ex] auctoritat[e Tib.] Claud.
[Co]gidubni r. leg. aug. in Brit.
[colle]gium fabror. et qui in eo
[a sacris] sunt d. s. d. donante aream

4. Now in Tacitus, Agricol. 14, we read, "quædam civitates (in Britain) Cogidubno regi donatæ (is ad nostram usque memoriam fidissimus mansit) vetere ac jampridem recepta populi R. consuetudine, ut haberet instrumenta servitutis et reges." From this inscription these 'civitates' appear to have constituted the kingdom of Sussex. We also gather from the inscription that Cogidubnus had taken the name of his imperial patron, [Tiberius] Claudius: and we find him in close connexion with a Pudens.

5. It was quite natural that this discovery should open afresh a point which the conjectures of British antiquarians appeared before to have provisionally closed. It had been imagined that Claudia, who was identified with the Claudia Rufina of Martial, xi. 53 ('Claudia cæruleis quum sit Rufina Britannis Edita, quam Latiæ pectora plebis habet!'), was a native of Colchester, and a daughter of Caractacus, whom they supposed to have been admitted into the Claudian gens.

6. A new fabric of conjecture has been now raised, more ingenious and more probable[1]. The Pudens of Martial is (i. 32) a centurion, aspiring to the "meriti præmia pili," i. e. to be made a primipilus: which ambition we find accomplished in lib. v. 48: and his return to Rome from the North to receive the honour of equestrian rank is anticipated in lib. vi. 58. He may at some time have been stationed in Britain—possibly attached in capacity of adjutant to King Cogidubnus. His presentation of an area for a temple to Neptune and Minerva may have been occasioned by escape from shipwreck, the college of carpenters (shipbuilders) being commissioned to build it to their patrons, Neptune and Minerva; or, as Archdn. Williams (p. 24) seems to think, by a desire to introduce Roman arts among the subjects of the client king. If the British maiden Claudia was a daughter of King Tiberius Claudius Cogidubnus, there would be no great wonder in her thus being found mentioned with Pudens.

7. But conjecture is led on a step further by the other notices referred to above. Claudia is called Rufina. Now Pomponia, the wife of the late commander in Britain,

[1] In Archdeacon Williams's pamphlet on Pudens and Claudia. I have also consulted an article in the Quarterly Review for July, 1855, entitled "the Romans at Colchester," in which Archdeacon Williams's view is noticed.

Aulus Plautius, belonged to a house of which the Rufi were one of the chief branches. If she were a Rufa, and Claudia were her protégée at Rome (as would be very natural seeing that her father was received into alliance under Aulus Plautius), the latter would naturally add to her very undistinguishing appellation of Claudia the cognomen of Rufina. Nor is the hypothesis of such a connexion purely arbitrary. A very powerful link appears to unite the two ladies—viz. that of Christianity. Pomponia, we learn from Tacitus (Ann. xii. 32), was (in the year 57) 'superstitionis externæ rea,' and being 'mariti judicio permissa,' was by him tried, 'prisco instituto, propinquis coram,' and pronounced innocent. Tacitus adds, that after many family sorrows, 'per XL annos non cultu nisi lugubri, non animo nisi mæsto, egit. Idque illi imperitante Claudio, impune, mox ad gloriam vertit.' Now it is not at all an improbable explanation of this, that Pomponia may have been a Christian: and the remarkable notice with which our citation from Tacitus concludes may point to the retirement of a Christian life, for which the garb of sorrow would furnish an excuse and protection [3].

8. If then such a connexion as this subsisted, it would account for the conversion of the British maiden to Christianity: and the coincidences are too striking to allow us to pass over the junction of Pudens with her in this salutation. They apparently were not married at this time, or the Apostle would hardly have inserted a third name, that of Linus, between theirs. And this is what we might expect: for the last year of Nero, which is the date we have assigned to the Epistle, is the earliest that can be assigned to any of Martial's pieces, being the year in which he came to Rome.

9. Two of the Epigrams of Martial, i. 32 and v. 48, mention facts which involve Pudens in the revolting moral licence of his day. But there is no reason for supposing them to refer to dates subsequent to his conversion and marriage. Martial's Epigrams are by no means in chronological order, and we cannot gather any indications of this fact with certainty from them.

10. Again, a difficulty has been found in the heathen invocation in the marriage epigram. But, as remarked in the article referred to in the note, we have no allusion to Christian marriage rites during the first three or four centuries, and it is not at all improbable that the heathen rites of the confarreatio may, at this early period at least, have been sought by Christians to legalize their unions. When we do find a Christian ceremonial, it is full of the symbolism of the confarreatio. And it seems to be shewn that this was so in the case before us, by the epithet of sancto, (in the line 'Di bene, quod sancto peperit fecunda marito,' Mart. xi. 53,) implying that all rites had been duly observed [4].

11. If the above conjectural but not purely arbitrary fabric of hypothesis is allowed to stand, we have the satisfaction of knowing that Claudia was a woman not only of high character, but of mental acquirement ('Romanam credere matres Italides possint, Atthides esse suam,' Mart. ib.), and the mother of a family of three sons, and possibly daughters as well (Mart. ib.).

[3] Archdeacon Williams (p. 38) fancies he sees in this cultus lugubris and animus mæstus signs that she gave way in the trial, and thus saved herself, and that the same circumstance may account for so noble a lady not being mentioned by St. Paul.

[4] This 'sancto' Archdeacon Williams thinks represents ἁγίῳ, and implies the Christianity of Pudens. Surely this is very improbable.

CHAPTER X.

TO WHOM WRITTEN.

1. THE time and place of writing this Epistle have been before discussed (see above, ch. vii. § ii. 29 f.). It appears to have been sent from Ephesus, or perhaps from Macedonia, during the last year of the Apostle's life (A.D. 67), to Titus, who was left in charge with the Churches in the island of Crete. We shall now gather up the notices which remain to us respecting Titus himself.

2. It is by no means easy to construct an account of Titus. At first sight, a strange phænomenon presents itself. The narrative in the Acts never once mentions him. And this is the more remarkable, because of all the companions of St. Paul he seems to have been the most valued and trusted. No adequate reason has ever been given for this omission. There must be some, it is thought, which we cannot penetrate. Was he identical with some one or other of St. Paul's companions, known to us in the Acts under another name? None seems to satisfy the conditions. Or are we to regard the notice in 2 Tim. iv. 10 as indicative of his ultimate desertion of the Apostle, and thus to seek for a solution of the problem? But even with such a supposition, we shall not touch the narrative of the Acts, which we believe to have been published some years previous to the writing of that Epistle. So that we must be content to leave the problem unsolved, and to put together the few notices which we possess, as given of a person distinct from any mentioned in the Acts.

3. The first notice of Titus, in respect of time, occurs in Gal. ii. 1, 3. We there learn that he was of Gentile origin; and that he was taken by Paul and Barnabas to the council of the Apostles and elders which was convened at Jerusalem to consider of the question of the obligation of the Mosaic law. The narrative in the Acts speaks merely of τινὲς ἄλλοι being sent with the two Apostles. But we see clearly the reason why Titus should be marked out in Gal. ii. for separate mention. He was an uncircumcised Gentile, and the independence of action of St. Paul is shewn by his refusing to listen for a moment to the proposal, which appears to have been urged, for his circumcision. In the Acts, no such reason for special mention of him existed. And this consideration will shew, that we are perhaps not justified in assuming from this incident that Titus held any position of high confidence or trust at this time. We find him in close companionship with the Apostles, but that is all we can say. He was certainly converted by means of St. Paul himself, from the γνησίῳ τέκνῳ of Tit. i. 4.

4. Our next notice of him is found in 2 Cor., where it appears (ch. xii. 18) that he, with two other brethren, whose names are not mentioned, was sent forward by St. Paul from Ephesus, during his long visit there, to Corinth, to set on foot a collection (ch. viii. 6) for the poor saints at Jerusalem, and also to ascertain the effect of the first Epistle on the Corinthians. St. Paul, on his departure from Ephesus, waited at Troas, where great opportunities of usefulness were opening before him (ch. ii. 12): but so anxious was he for the return of Titus (Τίτον τὸν ἀδελφόν μου), that he "left them and passed into Macedonia" (ib. 13). There he met with Titus, who brought him a satisfactory account of the effect of the first Epistle (ch. vii. 6—15): and from that which St. Paul there says of him, his effective zeal and earnestness in the work of the Gospel is sufficiently shewn. Further proof of these is given in his undertaking of his own accord the delicate task of completing the collection (ch. viii. 6, 16, 17 ff.): and proof also of the Apostle's confidence in him, in the terms in which he commends him to the Corinthians. He calls him his own κοινωνός (ch. viii. 23): appeals to his integrity, and entire unity of action with himself (ch. xii. 18).

5. From this time (A.D. 57: see Vol. II. Prolegg. to 2 Cor. § ii. 3), to the notices furnished by our Epistle (A.D. 67), we know nothing of Titus. At this latter date we find him left in Crete by St. Paul, obviously for a temporary purpose: viz. to "carry forward the correction of those things which are defective" (ch. i. 5), and among these principally, to establish presbyteries for the government of the various Churches, consisting of ἐπίσκοποι (ib. ver. 7). His stay there was to be very short (ch. iii. 12), and he was, on the arrival of Tychicus or Artemas, to join the Apostle at Nicopolis. Not the slightest trace is found in the Epistle, of any intention on the part of St. Paul to place Titus permanently over the Cretan Churches: indeed, such a view is inconsistent with the date furnished us in it.

6. Titus appears to have accordingly rejoined the Apostle, and afterwards to have left him for Dalmatia (2 Tim. iv. 10). Whether from this notice we are to infer that he had been with him in Rome, is quite uncertain. It would seem more probable that he had gone from Nicopolis, or at all events from some point on the journey. We can hardly, on mature consideration of the expressions in 2 Tim. iv. 10, entirely get rid of the impression, that Titus had left the Apostle of his own accord. There is, as has been above observed, an apparent contrast intended between those who are classed with Demas,—they being even included under his ἐπορεύθη, without another verb expressed—and Tychicus, who had been sent on a mission by the Apostle. Still, it would be unfair to lay any stress on this, in a matter so well admitting of charitable doubt: and we may be well permitted, with Mr. Conybeare, to "hope that his journey to the neighbouring Dalmatia was undertaken by desire of St. Paul."

7. The traditionary notices of the after life of Titus are too evidently grounded on a misunderstanding of our Epistle, to be worth much. Eus. H. E. iii. 4, says, Τιμόθεός γε μὴν τῆς ἐν Ἐφέσῳ παροικίας ἱστορεῖται πρῶτος τὴν ἐπισκοπὴν εἰληχέναι (see on this above, Prolegg. to 1 Tim. § i. 7), ὡς καὶ Τίτος τῶν ἐπὶ Κρήτης ἐκκλησιῶν. And so Theodoret assumes, on 1 Tim. iii. 1.

8. Butler informs us (Lives of the Saints, Jan. 4) that Titus is honoured in Dalmatia as its principal Apostle: that he again returned from Dalmatia to Crete, and finished a laborious and holy life by a happy death in Crete, in a very advanced old age, some say in his 94th year: that he is looked on in Crete as the first archbishop of Gortyna, which metropolitical see is now fixed at Candia, the new capital, built by the Saracens after the destruction of Gortyna. But all this fabric too manifestly bears the appearance of having been raised on the above misapprehension, to possess any traditional worth.

SECTION II.

THE CHURCHES OF CRETE.

1. When, and by whom, these Churches were founded, is quite uncertain. Crete abounded with Jews of wealth and influence. We find proof of this in Jos. Antt. xvii. 12. 1, Κρήτῃ προσενεχθεὶς (the Pseudo-Alexander) Ἰουδαίων ὁπόσοις εἰς ὁμιλίαν ἀφίκετο, ἐπήγαγεν εἰς πίστιν, καὶ χρημάτων εὐπορηθεὶς δόσει τῇ ἐκείνων ἐπὶ Μήλου δεῦρεν: and again B. J. ii. 7. 1, τοὺς ἐν Κρήτῃ Ἰουδαίους ἐξαπατήσας καὶ λαμπρῶς ἐφοδισθείς, διέπλευσεν εἰς Μῆλον: Philo, leg. ad Caium, § 36, vol. ii. p. 587,—οὐ μόνον αἱ ἤπειροι μεσταὶ τῶν Ἰουδαϊκῶν ἀποικιῶν εἰσιν, ἀλλὰ καὶ νήσων αἱ δοκιμώταται Εὔβοια, Κύπρος, Κρήτη. In Acts ii. 11 Cretans are named among those who heard the utterance of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. It is probable therefore, that these Churches owed their origin to the return of individuals from contact with the preaching of the Gospel, and had therefore as yet been unvisited by an Apostle, when they first come before us towards the end of St. Paul's ministry.

2. It is plain that no certain evidence can be deduced, as to the existence of these Churches, from no mention being made of them when St. Paul passed by Crete on his voyage to Malta in Acts xxvii. We have no reason to suppose that he was at liberty to go where he pleased while remaining in port, nor can we reason, from the analogy of Julius's permission at Sidon, that similar leave would be given him where perhaps no personal relation subsisted between him and the inhabitants. Besides which, the ship was detained by a contrary wind, and probably expecting, during a good part of the time, to sail every day.

3. The next point requiring our attention is, the state of those Churches at the date of our Epistle. If it appear, on comparison, that the false teachers in them were more exclusively Jewish than those at Ephesus, it must be remembered, that this would be a natural consequence, the origin of the Churches being that which we have supposed. And in that case the Apostle's visit, acting as a critical test, would separate out and bring into hostility this Judaistic element, and thus lead to the state of things which we find in this Epistle.

4. Various objections are brought by De Wette against the Epistle, as not corresponding with the facts, in its assumptions and expressions. The first of them, that "it professes to have been written shortly after the founding of the Churches, but sets forth a ripeness and abundance of heretical teaching quite inconsistent with such recent foundation," falls to the ground on our hypothesis of their origin. They were old in actual date of existence, but quite in their infancy of arrangement and formal constitution.

5. With our hypothesis also falls his second objection: viz. that "the great recent success of the Apostle there makes the severity of his characterization of the inhabitants, and that upon another's testimony (ch. i. 12), quite inexplicable. We should rather have looked for thankful recognition, as in other Epistles." But, supposing Christianity to have grown up there in combination with the national vices, and a thorough work of purification to be wanted, then we need not be surprised at the Apostle reminding Titus of the character of those with whom he had to deal, appealing to the testimony of their own writers to confirm the fact.

6. His third objection, that "the heretical teachers must have grown up under the eyes of Titus since the Apostle's absence, and thus must have been better known to him than to St. Paul, whereas here we have St. Paul informing him about them,"—is grounded on pure assumption, arising from mistake. The false teachers had been there throughout, and, as we have said, had been awaked into activity by the Apostle's presence and teaching. He knew, from long and bitter experience, far more of them than Titus could do: and his notices and warnings are founded on this longer experience and more thorough apostolic insight.

7. His fourth, that "in relation to the moral and ecclesiastical state of the Cretan Christians, as disclosed in the Epistle, a duration of the Gospel among them of some length must be assumed,—from the stress laid on previous purity of character in those to be chosen to church-offices,"—also falls to the ground on our hypothesis of the origin and previous duration of the Churches.

8. The fifth is,—that "it is most unnatural and startling to find not one reference to what the Apostle had taught and preached in Crete, when in 1 Thess., an Epistle written under similar circumstances, we find so many." But we entirely deny the parallelism. The Thessalonian Church had been founded by himself; he was torn away from it in the midst of his teaching: every reason existed for constantly recalling what he had said to them, either to enforce it, or to guard it from misunderstanding. Such was not the case here. He was writing of a Church which he had not himself founded: whose whole situation was different: and writing not to the Church itself, but to one whom he had commissioned to set it in order, and who knew, and needed not reminding of, what he had preached there.

9. It only remains under this head, that we should say something of the character of the Cretans which St. Paul has quoted from Epimenides, ch. i. 12,—Κρῆτες ἀεὶ ψεῦσται, κακὰ θηρία, γαστέρες ἀργαί.

10. Meursius, in his very complete and elaborate treatise on Crete, has accumulated nearly all the testimonies of the ancients respecting them. From his pages I take a few, that the student may be able to illustrate the character by them.

11. On their avarice, we have the testimony of Livy, xliv. 45, "Cretenses spem pecuniæ secuti: et quoniam in dividendo plus offensionum quam gratiæ erat, quinquaginta talenta iis posita sunt in ripa diripienda:"—of Plutarch, Paul. Æmil. c. 23, τῶν δὲ στρατιωτῶν, ἐπηκολούθησαν οἱ Κρῆτες, οὐ δι' εὔνοιαν, ἀλλὰ τοῖς χρήμασιν, ὥσπερ κηρίοις μέλιττα, προσλιπαροῦντες:—of Polybius, vi. 46. 8, ὁ περὶ τὴν αἰσχροκέρδειαν καὶ πλεονεξίαν τρόπος οὕτως ἐπιχωριάζει παρ' αὐτοῖς, ὥστε παρὰ μόνοις Κρηταιεῦσι τῶν ἁπάντων ἀνθρώπων μηδὲν αἰσχρὸν νομίζεσθαι κέρδος.

12. On their ferocity and fraud, Polybius vi. 46. 9, Κρηταιεῖς ἐν πλείσταις ἰδίᾳ τε καὶ κατὰ κοινὸν στάσεσι καὶ φόνοις καὶ πολέμοις ἐμφυλίοις ἀναστρεφομένους: and iv. 8. 11, Κρῆτες δὲ καὶ κατὰ γῆν καὶ κατὰ θάλατταν πρὸς μὲν ἐνέδρας καὶ λῃστείας καὶ κλοπὰς πολεμίων, καὶ νυκτερινὰς ἐπιθέσεις καὶ πάσας τὰς μετὰ δόλου καὶ κατὰ μέρος χρείας ἀνυπόστατοι, πρὸς δὲ τὴν ἐξ ὁμολόγου καὶ κατὰ πρόσωπον φαλαγγηδὸν ἔφοδον, ἀγεννεῖς καὶ πλάγιοι ταῖς ψυχαῖς:—Strabo, x. c. 4, περὶ δὲ τῆς Κρήτης ὁμολογεῖται διότι . . . ὕστερον πρὸς τὸ χεῖρον μετέβαλεν ἐπὶ πλεῖστον. μετὰ γὰρ τοὺς Τυρρηνούς, οἱ μάλιστα ἐδήωσαν τὴν καθ' ἡμᾶς θάλατταν, οὗτοι εἰσὶν οἱ διαδεξάμενοι τὰ λῃστήρια:—an Epigram of Leonides, Anthol. iii. 22,—αἰεὶ λῃσταὶ καὶ ἀλιφθόροι οὔτε δίκαιοι Κρῆτες· τίς Κρητῶν οἶδε δικαιοσύνην;

13. On their mendacity, Polybius vi. 47. 5, καὶ μὴν οὔτε κατ' ἰδίαν ἦθη δολιώτερα Κρηταιέων εὕροι τις ἄν, πλὴν τελείως ὀλίγων, οὔτε καθόλου ἐπιβουλὰς ἀδικώτερας:—again, the proverb, Κρὴς πρὸς Αἰγινήτην, is thus explained by Diogenianus, Cent. v. prov. 92,—ἐπὶ τῶν πανούργοις χρωμένων πρὸς ἀλλήλους λέγεται:—Psellus, de operat. Dæm., πλὴν ἴσθι μηδ' αὐτὸν ἐῤῥαψωδηκέναι με ταῦτα τερατευόμενον, κατὰ τοὺς Κρῆτας καὶ Φοίνικας. And the word κρητίζειν was an expression for 'to lie.' Suidas has κρητίζειν πρὸς Κρῆτας, ἐπειδὴ ψεῦσται καὶ ἀπατεῶνές εἰσι: see also Polyb. viii. 21. 5. And their general depravity was summed up in the proverb, quoted by Constant. Porphyrogen. de them. lib. i., τρία κάππα κάκιστα· Καππαδοκία, Κρήτη, Κιλικία.

CHAPTER XI.

THE EPISTLE TO PHILEMON.

ITS AUTHORSHIP.

1. THE testimonies to the Pauline authorship of this Epistle are abundant.

(α) Tertullian, in enumerating the Epistles of St. Paul with which Marcion had tampered, concludes his list thus (adv. Marc. v. 21, vol. ii. p. 524):

"Soli huic epistolæ brevitas sua profuit ut falsarias manus Marcionis evaderet. Miror tamen, cum ad unum hominem litteras factas receperit, quod &c." (see the whole passage cited above, ch. vii. § i. 1. ε.)

(β) Origen, Hom. xix. in Jer. 2: vol. iii. p. 263:

ὅπερ καὶ ὁ Παῦλος ἐπιστάμενος ἔλεγεν ἐν τῇ πρὸς Φιλήμονα ἐπιστολῇ τῷ Φιλήμονι περὶ Ὀνησίμου· ἵνα μὴ κατ' ἀνάγκην τὸ ἀγαθόν σου ᾖ, ἀλλὰ καθ' ἑκούσιον (Philem. ver. 14).

And again in Matth. Comm. series, § 72, p. 889:

"Sicut Paulus ad Philemonem dicit: Gaudium enim magnum habuimus et consolationem in caritate tua, quia viscera sanctorum requieverunt per te, frater." (Philem. ver. 7.)

And again in id. § 66, p. 884:

"A Paulo autem dictum est ad Philemonem: hunc autem ut Paulus senex, &c." (ver. 9.)

(γ) Eusebius, H. E. iii. 25, reckons this Epistle among the ὁμολογούμενα.

(δ) Jerome, procem. in Philem. vol. vii. pp. 743, 4, argues at some length against those who refuse to acknowledge this Epistle for St. Paul's because it was simply on personal matters and contained nothing for edification.

2. That neither Irenæus nor Clement of Alexandria cites our Epistle, is easily accounted for, both by its shortness, and by the fact of its containing nothing which could illustrate or affirm doctrinal positions. Ignatius seems several times to allude to it:

Eph. c. ii., p. 645; ὀναίμην ὑμῶν διὰ παντός, ἐάνπερ ἄξιος ὦ (Philem. ver. 20).

Magnes. c. xii., p. 672; the same expression; which also occurs in the Ep. to Polycarp, c. i., p. 720, and c. vi., p. 725.

3. The internal evidence of the Epistle itself is so decisive for its Pauline origin,—the occasion and object of it (see below, § ii.) so simple, and unassignable to any fraudulent intent, that one would imagine the impugner of so many of the Epistles would at least have spared this one, and that in modern times, as in ancient, according to Tertullian and Jerome, "sua illam brevitas defendisset." But Baur has rejected it, or, which with him is the same thing practically, has placed it in his second class, of antilegomena, in common with the other Epistles of the imprisonment.

4. In doing so, he confesses ("Paulus, u.s.w." pp. 475 ff.) to a feeling of subjecting himself to the imputation of hypercritical scepticism as to authenticity: but maintains that the Epistle must stand or fall with those others: and that its very insignificance, which is pleaded in its defence, all the more involves it in their fate. Still, he professes to argue the question on the ground of the Epistle itself.

5. He finds in its diction several things which strike him as unpauline[1]; several which establish a link between it and those other Epistles. The latter position we should willingly grant him, and use against him. But the former is here, as so often, taken up by him in the merest disregard to common sense and probability. Such expressions, occurring in a familiar letter, such as we do not elsewhere possess, are no more than are perfectly natural, and only serve to enlarge for us the Apostle's vocabulary, instead of inducing doubt, where all else is so thoroughly characteristic of him.

6. The contents also of the Epistle seem to him objectionable. The incident on which it is founded, he says, of itself raises suspicion. He then takes to pieces the whole history of Onesimus's flight and conversion, and the feeling shewn to him by the Apostle, in a way which, as I observed before (ch. iii. § i. 2) respecting his argument against the Epistle to the Philippians, only finds a parallel in the pages of burlesque: so that, I am persuaded, if the section on the Epistle to Philemon had been first published separately and without the author's name, the world might well have supposed it written by some defender of the authenticity of the Epistle, as a caricature on Baur's general line of argument.

[1] I subjoin Baur's list: συστρατιώτης, ver. 2: ἀνῆκον, ἐπιτάσσειν, ver. 8: πρεσβύτης, ver. 9: ἄχρηστος and εὔχρηστος, ver. 11: ἀνέχω in the sense of 'receive back' (but see note there), ver. 15: ἀπορία, προσοφείλω, ver. 19: ὀνίνασθαι, ver. 20: ξενία, ver. 22: the frequent recurrence (vv. 7, 12, 20) of the expression σπλάγχνα, not otherwise unpauline.

7. On both his grounds of objection—the close connexion of this with the other Epistles of the imprisonment, and its own internal evidence,—fortified as these are by the consensus of the ancient Church, we may venture to assume it as certain that this Epistle was written by St. Paul.

SECTION II.

THE PLACE, TIME, OCCASION, AND OBJECT OF WRITING.

1. The Epistle is connected by the closest links with that to the Colossians. It is borne by Onesimus, one of the persons mentioned as sent with that Epistle (Col. iv. 9). The persons sending salutation are the same, with the one exception of Jesus Justus. In Col. iv. 17, a message is sent to Archippus, who is one of those addressed in this Epistle. Both Epistles are sent from Paul and Timotheus; and in both the Apostle is a prisoner (Col. iv. 18; Philem. vv. 1, 9).

2. This being so, we are justified in assuming that it was written at the same place and time as the Epistles to the Colossians and Ephesians, viz. at Rome, and in the year 61 or 62.

3. Its occasion and object are plainly indicated in the Epistle itself. Onesimus, a native of Colossæ[2], the slave of Philemon, had absconded, after having, as it appears, defrauded his master (ver. 18). He fled to Rome, and there was converted to Christianity by St. Paul. Being persuaded by him to return to his master, he was furnished with this letter to recommend him, now no longer merely a servant, but a brother also, to favourable reception by Philemon. This alone, and no didactic or general object, is discernible in the Epistle.

SECTION III.

TO WHAT PLACE ADDRESSED, &c.

1. From comparing Col. iv. 9, with ib. 17 and Philem. 2, we infer that Philemon was a resident at Colossæ. The impression on the reader from Philem. 1, 2, is that Apphia was his wife, and Archippus (a minister of the church there, Col. iv. 17), their son, or some near relative dwelling with them under the same roof. A letter on a matter so strictly domestic would hardly include strangers to the family in its address.

[2] ἐξ ὑμῶν can hardly in Col. iv. 9 bear any other meaning: he could surely not be described, under the circumstances, as "belonging to the Colossian Church," as supposed by Dr. Davidson, Introd. ii. p. 138. The case of Epaphras in Col. iv. 12 is not strictly parallel; but even there, there is no reason why the words should not bear their proper sense.

2. An hypothesis has been advanced, recently by Wieseler, that our present Epistle is alluded to in Col. iv. 16, as ἡ ἐκ Λαοδικείας, and that the message to Archippus in the next verse favours the view that he, and consequently Philemon, dwelt at Laodicea. And this is corroborated, by Archippus being called bishop of Laodicea in the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46, p. 1056, Migne).

3. The objection to this hypothesis is not so much from any evidently false assumption or inference in the chain of facts, all of which may have been as represented, but from the improbability, to my view, that by the latter limb of the parallelism—"this Epistle," "that from Laodicea,"—can be meant a private letter, even though it may have regarded a member of the Colossian church. We seem to want some Epistle corresponding in weight with that to the Colossians, for such an order, in such a form, to receive its natural interpretation[3].

4. Of Onesimus we know nothing for certain, except from the notices here and in Col. iv. 9. Tradition reports variously respecting him. In the Apostolical Canons (73) he is said to have been emancipated by his master, and in the Apostolical Constitutions (vii. 46, p. 1056) to have been ordained by St. Paul himself bishop of Berœa in Macedonia, and to have suffered martyrdom in Rome, Niceph. H. E. iii. 11. In the Epistle of Ignatius to the Ephesians, we read, cap. i., p. 645, ἐπεὶ οὖν τὴν πολυπληθίαν ὑμῶν ἐν ὀνόματι θεοῦ ἀπείληφα ἐν Ὀνησίμῳ, τῷ ἐν ἀγάπῃ ἀδιηγήτῳ, ὑμῶν δὲ ἐν σαρκὶ ἐπισκόπῳ· ὃν εὔχομαι κατὰ Ἰησοῦν χριστὸν ὑμᾶς ἀγαπᾶν, καὶ πάντας ὑμᾶς ἐν ὁμοιότητι εἶναι. εὐλογητὸς γὰρ ὁ χαρισάμενος ὑμῖν ἀξίοις οὖσι τοιοῦτον ἐπίσκοπον κεκτῆσθαι[4]. It is just possible that this may be our Onesimus. The earliest date which can be assigned to the martyrdom of Ignatius is A.D. 107, i. e. thirty-five years after the date of this Epistle. Supposing Onesimus to have been thirty at this time, he would then have been only sixty-five. And even setting Ignatius's death at the latest date, A.D. 116, we should still be far within the limits of possibility. It is at least singular that in ch. ii., p. 645 immediately after naming Onesimus, Ignatius proceeds ὀναίμην ὑμῶν διὰ παντός (cf. Philem. ver. 20; and above, § i. 2).

[3] In the Prælectio above referred to, Prolegg. to Eph., § i. 11, note, I had adopted Wieseler's hypothesis. Maturer consideration led me to abandon it, solely on the ground of the improbability stated in the text. We must regard the Epistle to the Laodiceans as one now lost to us (see Prolegg. to Vol. II. ch. iii. § iv. 3).

[4] See also id. chapters ii., vi., pp. 645, 649.

CHARACTER AND STYLE.

1. This Epistle is a remarkable illustration of St. Paul's tenderness and delicacy of character. Dr. Davidson well remarks, "Dignity, generosity, prudence, friendship, affection, politeness, skilful address, purity, are apparent. Hence it has been termed with great propriety, the polite Epistle. The delicacy, fine address, consummate courtesy, nice strokes of rhetoric, render the letter an unique specimen of the epistolary style." Introd. vol. iii. p. 160.

2. Doddridge (Expositor, introd. to Philem.) compares it to an Epistle of Pliny to Sabinianus, ix. 21, written as an acknowledgment on a similar occasion of the reception of a libertus by his master[5]: and justly gives the preference in delicacy and power to our Epistle. The comparison is an interesting one, for Pliny's letter is eminently beautiful, and in terseness, and completeness, not easy to surpass.

3. Luther's description of the Epistle is striking, and may well serve to close our notice of it, and this portion of our prolegomena to the Epistles.

"This Epistle sheweth a right noble lovely example of Christian love. Here we see how St. Paul layeth himself out for the poor Onesimus, and with all his means pleadeth his cause with his master; and so setteth himself, as if he were Onesimus, and had himself done wrong to Philemon. Yet all this doeth he not with power or force, as if he had right thereto; but he strippeth himself of his right, and thus enforceth Philemon to forego his right also. Even as Christ did for us with God the Father, thus also doth St. Paul for Onesimus with Philemon: for Christ also stripped Himself of His right, and by love and humility enforced the Father to lay aside His wrath and power, and to take us to His grace for the sake of Christ, who lovingly pleadeth our cause, and with all His heart layeth Himself out for us. For we are all His Onesimi, to my thinking."

[5] The Epistle runs thus:

"C. Plinius Sabiniano suo S.

"Bene fecisti quod libertum aliquando tibi charum, reducentibus epistolis meis, in domum, in animum recepisti. Juvabit hoc te: me certe juvat: primum quod te talem video, ut in ira regi possis: deinde, quod tantum mihi tribuis, ut vel autoritati meæ pareas, vel precibus indulgeas. Igitur et laudo et gratias ago: simul in posterum moneo, ut te erroribus tuorum, etsi non fuerit qui deprecetur, placabilem præstes. Vale."

[a] Jacobus Faber Stapulensis, i. e. Jacques le Fevre d'Estaples, a native of Etaples in Picardy, collated five Greek MSS. of St. Paul's Epistles which he sometimes appeals to in his Commentary (Paris, 1512). These citations, whenever it is necessary to refer to them, should not be quoted as if they came from some one MS. distinct from the others in the list, but as "var. read. in comm. Fab. Stap." or the like.

[b] A ms. which once belonged to J. C. Wolf of Hamburg. It was procured by Wetstein from Wolf's library, and collated by him. It consists of two square paper volumes, containing the whole N. T. exc. Apoc., copied by Jas. Faber, of Daventer (a brother scholar of Erasmus), from a ms. written A.D. 1293 on Mt. Athos, by the scribe Theodore, who wrote also Gosp. 74, and Scrivener's Gosp. q Epp. f. The Epistle of St. Jude occurs twice, the 2nd copy is entered as Cath. 55.

[c] "We know nothing more of it than that Amandus, who lived at Louvain, had it in his possession, that Zeger appealed to it," on Rom. i. 32 (as reading ου συνηκαν), "and that Erasmus supposed it to be a latinizing manuscript. How many books of the N. T. it contains, where it is at present preserved, whether it has been used in modern times under another name, are questions which I am unable to answer." (Michaelis.)

[d] These numbers are bracketed because it is perfectly possible that the MSS. denoted by them may be entered in the list under other numbers.

[e] Under this number Wetstein and succeeding editors have entered "Codices Laur. Vallæ." "Laurentius Valla, a learned Roman, who was born in 1417, and died in 1467, published in 1440, Annotationes in N. T., in which he collected the readings of three Greek and three Latin MSS., and took particular pains to amend the Latin version. The book was published at Paris in 1505, and gave occasion to the Complutensian Polyglott." (Michaelis' Introductory Lectures, 4to, London, 1761, p. 66.)

[f] Under this number Wetstein and succeeding editors have entered a Zürich MS.,

[k] Scholz has run into great confusion with the manuscripts in the Cambridge University Library from not understanding the signs in his memoranda respecting them. The following explanation may be sufficient to clear up the matter. All the MSS. in the Library have since 1753 been denoted by a double-letter class mark, a number for the shelf, and a number for the volume. Nasmith, in writing out a list of the MSS. as thus arranged, added numbers on the margin to indicate merely the position which each MS. held in his catalogue. Nasmith's classified index contains references to this catalogue by these marginal numbers, ψ being prefixed if the reference is to a printed book with MS. notes, an asterisk if to a Greek MS. Similar marginal numbers have been inserted in the printed catalogue now in course of publication; they are not the same as Nasmith's, and it is as misleading to refer to MSS. by these numbers without stating what catalogue is meant, as to the pages of a book more than once edited, without stating the edition used. This may be seen in the following examples:—

MS. Ff. 1. 30, is 1152 on Nasmith's margin, and 1163 on that of the new Printed Catalogue.

MS. Kk. 6. 4, is 2068 on Nasmith's margin, and 2084 on that of the new Printed Catalogue.

MS. Mm. 6. 9, is 2423 on Nasmith's margin, and 2468 on that of the new Printed Catalogue.

MS. Nn. 3. 20, is ψ 2537 in Nasmith's index.

MS. Nn. 5. 27, is ψ 2622 in Nasmith's index.

It is right to prefix MS. to the double letter to indicate that the volumes meant belong to the Cases so marked in the Library, and to prevent any confusion with the classes of Printed Books alone known by the same letters.

scholarlike volumes. They have set the first example in this country of a thorough and fearless examination of the grammatical and philological requirements of every word in the sacred text. I do not know any thing superior to them, in their own particular line, in Germany: and they add what, alas, is so seldom found in that country, profound reverence for the matter and subjects on which the author is labouring. Nor is their value lessened by Bishop Ellicott having confined himself for the most part to one department of a Commentator's work—the grammatical and philological. No student ought to be without these books, nor ought he to spare himself in making them his own by continual study.

[2] This Lexicon (which has now all appeared) is as superior to all other editions of Passow, German and English, as Passow was to all that went before. A comparison of any important words will shew the difference at once. The immense labour requisite will, it is to be feared, deter our lexicographers from giving the English public a translation: but it would be a great boon to the scholarship of our country. [It is understood that a new edition of Liddell and Scott's Lexicon, now long promised, will contain all the valuable improvements and additions from Rost and Palm. A translation was in progress, but was broken off by the lamented death of Dr. Donaldson in the spring of 1861.]

Readings of the Codex Vaticanus (B) in the text of this volume, which have been ascertained by the Editor's personal inspection of the MS. at Rome, February, 1861.

Gal. i. 4. του ενεστωτος, not ενεστωτος as Bentley.
5. των αιωνων as in Mai ed. 1, not τω αι. as in ed. 2.
15. αφωρισας is in codex.
ii. 4. καταδουλουσουσιν is 1. m.
14. Κηφα is in codex.
iii. 16. ερρεθησαν is 1. m.
21. ουτως εν νομω, not εν ν. ουτως as Bentley.
iv. 4. ο θεος is in codex, not omitted as in Bentley.
15. ουν μακαρισμος as in ed. 2, not ουν ο μακ. as in ed. 1.
17. ημας θελουσιν is in codex without correction, not ημας.
25. το δε αγαρ, not το αγαρ as Bentley.
v. 11. $\overline{\text{π}}$ ηλικοις is in codex, all from 1. m.

Eph. i. 1. ουσιν is at the end of a line, and εν εφεσω in margin, but it is very doubtful whether it is 2. m., and not rather 1. m., as some of its letters seem to have the double ink of 1. and 2. m.
23. του τα παντα, not του παντα as Bentley and Birch.
iv. 2. εν αγαπη, not αγαπη as Bentley.
20. εμαθετε as Mai ed. 1, not εμαθητε as ed. 2.
23. δε is not omitted as in Bentley.
32. ημιν is not "added by another hand" as Bentley asserts, but in the codex, 1. m.

Phil. i. 22. αιρησωμαι as Bentley, not -σομαι as Mai.
ii. 9. αυτω το ονομα is in codex.
30. παρακολευσαμενος, not -βολ-.
o

Col. Title. κολασσαεις, both letters being 1. m.
i. 2. κολοσσ- is 1. m.
4. εις παντας, not τη εις as Muralto.
16. εν τοις, not τα εν τοις as Muralto.
18. η αρχη, not αρχη as Muralto.
20. επι γης, not επι της γης as Muralto.
27. ο εστιν, not ος εστιν as Muralto.
ii. 1 and 2. Vercellone's marginal notes are right: cod. has εωρ-, and του θεου χριστου. εορ- is 1 m. in ver. 18.
iii. 8. ννυει 1. m.
end. κολλασσ. is here plainly 1. m.

1 Thess. i. 2. 1st υμων is not omitted as in Bentley.
iii. 8. στηκετε as in Mai ed. 2, not -ητε as in ed. 1.
iv. 1. λοιπον αδελφοι is 1. m.: το λ. ουν αδ. 2. m.
[4. "ειδεναι ends a line, and is followed by ενα written by the 2da manus." — Mr. Cure, April, 1862.]
v. 13. ηγειτθε is in codex.

2 Thess. ii. 3. η αποστασ. is in codex.
iii. 14. συναναμιγνυσθαι as Bentley, not -σθε as Mai.

CHAP. I. 1—5.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. πολλοῦ τὸ προοίμιον γέμει θυμοῦ κ. μεγάλου φρονήματος· οὐ τὸ προοίμιον δὲ μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ πᾶσα, ὡς εἰπεῖν, ἡ ἐπιστολή. Chrys. In the very opening sentence of the Epistle, we see the fervour of the Apostle's mind and the weightiness of his subject betraying themselves. The vindication of his own apostolic calling,—and the description of the work and purpose of Christ towards us, shew him to be writing to those who had disparaged that apostleship, and were falling from their Saviour. 1.] It is better not to join ἀπόστολος (here of course used in its strict and highest sense: see Ellicott, and an interesting note in Jowett) with ἀπ', but to let it stand by itself, and take the two prepositions as indicating, ἀπό the remote originating cause, διά the nearer instrumental one. In St. Paul's case, neither of these was merely human; the Lord Jesus was both the original Sender, and Himself the Announcer of the mission. Perhaps however the prepositions must not be so strictly pressed,—see ref. 1 Cor.,—and observe that the following διά belongs to θεοῦ πατρός as well as to Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ.—ἀνθρώπου is perhaps (as Mey., De W., Ellic., al.) singular, for the sake of contrast to Ἰησ. χρ. following; but more probably for solemnity's sake, the singular making even a more marked exclusion of human agency than the plural. Luther's view of the sentence is: "The Judaizing teachers could shew their credentials as disciples of Apostles or messengers of churches and despised Paul as having none such. To this he answers that he had not indeed any commission from men, but derived his authority from a higher source." But (1) this was not the fact, for he had a regular mission from the church at Antioch: (2) the words do not express it.

κ. θεοῦ πατρός] If by Jesus Christ, then also by God the Father, in and by whose appointment all the mediatorial acts of Christ in the Headship of His Church are done. The inferences of Chrys. al. as to the equality of the Father and the Son from this juxtaposition, appear far-fetched, and according to "the mind, not of the apostolic, but of the Nicene age," as Jowett: but we may say at least this, that the strongest possible contrast is here drawn between man, in the ordinary sense, on the one side, and Jesus Christ, and God the Father, on the other. Had not the Apostle regarded Jesus Christ as one with the Father in the Godhead, he never could have written thus. On the use of διά here where ἀπό might be expected, see Ellicott's note. He refers it to the brevity with which St. Paul expresses himself: I should rather say that he states our Lord Jesus and God the Father to have been the causa medians, in bringing down divine agency even to the actual fact of his mission—and leaving it therefore to be inferred à fortiori that the causa principalis was the will of God.

It is important to remember that the mission of Paul to the actual work of the ministry was by the command of the Holy Spirit, Acts xiii. 2,—proceeding from, and expressing the will of, the Father and the Son. πατρός is better taken generally, as in reff., the Father, than supplied with ἡμῶν (as De W. al.) or αὐτοῦ (as Meyer al.). τοῦ ἐγ. αὐτ.] Why specified here? Not, I think, because (Meyer) Paul was called to be an Apostle by the risen Saviour,—nor merely (De W.) to identify the Father as the Originator of the Son's work of Redemption (which is so in Rom. iv. 24,—but here would not immediately concern Paul's calling to be an Apostle),—nor (Calvin, al.) to meet the objection that he had never seen Christ, and turn it into an advantage, in that (Aug. [but cf. his Retractations], Erasm., Beza, al.) he alone was commissioned by the already risen and ascended Jesus,—for in this case we should not find τοῦ ἐγείραντος κ.τ.λ. stated as a predicate of the Father, but τοῦ ἐγερθέντος κ.τ.λ. as one of the Son,—nor as asserting the Resurrection against the Jews and Judaizing Galatians (Chrys., Luther), which is far-fetched,—nor again (Jowett) as expressing an attribute of the Father, without which He can hardly be thought of by the believer,—for this is too loose a relevancy for a sentence so pointed as the present: but because the Resurrection, including and implying the Ascension, was the Father's bestowal on Christ of gifts for men, by virtue of which (ἔδωκεν τοὺς μὲν ἀποστόλους, κ.τ.λ. Eph. iv. 11) Paul's Apostleship had been received. Cf. a similar sentiment in Rom. i. 4, 5. ἐκ νεκρῶν = ἐκ τῶν ν.,—see note on Rom. iv. 24. In Matt. xiv. 2; xxvii. 64; xxviii. 7; Eph. v. 14; Col. i. 18 (ii. 12?); 1 Thess. i. 10, the article is expressed: otherwise it is always omitted. 2. ἀδελφοί] Who these were, may best be inferred by the Apostle's usage in the addresses of other Epistles, where we have Σωσθένης ὁ ἀδελφός (1 Cor. i. 1), Τιμόθεος ὁ ἀδ. (2 Cor. i. 1. Col. i. 1. Philem. 1). They were his colleagues in the work of the Gospel, his companions in travel, and the like (not all the members of the church where he was, as Erasm., Grot., Jowett, al., who would hardly be specified as being σὺν αὐτῷ,—besides that such an address would be unprecedented): and their unanimity (πάντες) is here stated, as Chrys., Luther, al., to shew that he was not alone in his doctrine, but joined by all the brethren who were present. At the same time πάντες would seem to imply that just now he had many of these ἀδελφοί with him. But we cannot draw any inference from this as to the date of our Epistle: for we do not know who were his companions on many occasions. At Ephesus, where probably it was written, we hear only of Gaius and Aristarchus (Acts xix. 29), but we cannot say that there were not others: in all likelihood, several more of those mentioned Acts xx. 4, were with him.

ταῖς ἐκκλ.] πανταχοῦ γὰρ εἶρψεν ἡ νόσος. Thdrt. The principal cities of Galatia were Pessinus and Ancyra: but this plural seems to imply more than two such churches. See 1 Cor. xvi. 1, and Acts xvi. 6; xviii. 23. That we have here barely ταῖς ἐκκλ., without any honourable adjunct (as in 1 Cor., 2 Cor., 1 Thess., 2 Thess., &c.), must be explained as Chrys. al.: θέα δέ μοι καὶ ἐνταῦθα τ. πολλὴν ἀγανάκτησιν. οὐ γὰρ εἶπε Τοῖς ἀγαπητοῖς, οὐδὲ Τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις, ἀλλὰ Τ. ἐκκλ. τ. Γαλ. Meyer denies this, alleging (carelessly, which is not usual with him) 1 Thess. and 2 Thess. as addressed barely τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, whereas in both we have added ἐν θεῷ πατρὶ κ. κυρίῳ Ἰησ. χρ.

3.] See introductory note on Rom. i. 1—7. 4.] He thus obiter reminds the Galatians, who wished to return to the bondage of the law, of the δόντος ἑαυ.] viz. as an offering, unto death: an expression only found (in N. T.) here and in the Pastoral Epistles. Several such will occur; see the inference, in Prolegomena to Past. Epistles, § i. 32, note.

περί, in this connexion, has much the same sense as ὑπέρ: see reff., and note on Eph. vi. 19; also Ellic.'s note here. ὅπ. ἐξέληται] ἐξαιρεῖσθαι is the very word used by the Lord of St. Paul's own great deliverance, see reff.

τ. αἰῶνος τ. ἐνεστ. πονηροῦ] the present (not, as Mey., 'coming.' The word will not bear this meaning in 1 Cor. vii. 26, nor apparently [see note] in 2 Thess. ii. 2, much less in Rom. viii. 38) evil age (state of things; i. e. the course of this present evil world;—and, as understood, make us citizens and inheritors of a better αἰῶνος, τοῦ μέλλοντος. So Luther: "vocat hunc totum mundum, qui fuit, est et erit, præsens seculum, ad differentiam futuri et æterni sæculi." The allusion (Jowett) to the Jewish expressions, "the present age," "the age to come," as applying to the periods before and after the Messiah's coming, is very faint,—indeed hardly traceable, in the change which the terms had undergone as used in a spiritual sense by Christians. See however the rest of his note, which is full of interest).

κατὰ τὸ θέλημα . . .] And this, (1) not according to our own plan, in proportion to our legal obedience or any quality in us, but according to the Father's sovereign will, the prime standard of all the process of redemption: and (2) not so that we may trifle with such rescuing purpose of Christ by mixing it with other schemes and fancies, seeing that it is according to a procedure prescribed by Him, who doeth all things after the counsel of His own will. And this, not as the lord merely of His works, but as πατρὸς ἡμῶν, bound to us in the ties of closest love—for our good, as well as to fulfil His own eternal purpose. On the question, whether the genitive ἡμῶν depends on both, or only on the latter of the two nouns θεοῦ κ. πατρός, I agree in Ellicott's conclusion, that as πατρός is regularly anarthrous, and thus purely grammatical considerations are confounded, — as θεός conveys one absolute idea, while πατήρ might convey many relative ones, it is natural to believe that the Apostle may have added a defining genitive to πατήρ, which he did not intend to be referred to θεός. Render therefore, God and our Father, not 'our God and Father.' 5. ᾧ ἡ δόξ.] So (reff.) on other occasions, when speaking of the wonderful things of God, St. Paul adds a doxology. "In politeia, quando regum aut principum nomina appellamus, id honesto quodam gestu, reverentia, et genuflexione facere solemus. Multo magis cum de Deo loquimur, genu cordis flectere debemus." Luther. In ἡ δόξα,—the glory κατ' ἐξοχήν, or 'the glory which is His,'—the article is probably inserted for solemnity. "In this and similar forms of doxology,—excepting the angelic doxology, Luke ii. 14, and that of the multitude, Luke xix. 38,—δόξα regularly takes the article when used alone: see Rom. xi. 36; xvi. 27; Eph. iii. 21; Phil. iv. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 18; Heb. xiii. 21; 2 Pet. iii. 18. When joined with one or more substantives, it appears sometimes with the article (1 Pet. iv. 11; Rev. i. 6; vii. 12): sometimes without it (Rom. ii. 10; 1 Tim. i. 17; Jude 25)." CHRIST, AND NOT POPULARITY AMONG MEN. We have none of the usual expressions of thankfulness for their faith, &c.; but he hurries vehemently into his subject, and, as Chrys. says, σφοδρότερον τῷ μετὰ ταῦτα κέχρηται λόγῳ, καθάπερ πυρωθεὶς σφοδρῶς ὑπὸ τῆς ἐννοίας τῶν εὐεργεσιῶν τοῦ θεοῦ. 6.] θαυμάζω in this sense (see reff.) is a word of mildness, inasmuch as it imports that better things were expected of them,—and of condescension, as letting down the writer to the level of his readers and even challenging explanation from them. Still, like many other such mild words, it carries to the guilty conscience even sharper rebuke than a harsher one would. οὕτως ταχέως] either (1) 'so soon after your conversion' (Calv., Olsh., Meyer, &c.), or (2) 'so quickly,'—'after so little persuasion,' when the false teachers once came among you (Chr., De W., &c.), or (3) 'so soon after my recent visit among you' (Bengel, &c.). Of these I prefer (1), as more suiting the dignity of the passage, and as the more general and comprehensive reason. But it does not exclude (2) and (3): 'so soon,' might be, and might be intended to be, variously supplied. See Prolegomena, on the time and place of writing this Epistle. μετατίθεσθε.] are passing over, pres.: not as E. V. 'are removed,' which is doubly wrong, for μετ. is not passive but middle, in the common usage of the word, according to which the Galatians would understand it. So Plat. Theog. 122 c, σμικρὸν γάρ τι μετατίθεμαι, 'I am beginning somewhat to change my opinion:' see also Gorg. 493 c: Demosth. 379. 10: Ἴβηρες, ὅσοι . . . ἐς Ῥωμαίους μετέθεντο, Appian, Hisp. c. 17; &c. See also examples in Wetst. Chrys. says well, οὐκ εἶπε Μετέθεσθε, ἀλλὰ Μετατίθεσθε· τουτέστιν, οὐδέπω πιστεύω, οὐδὲ ἡγοῦμαι ἀπηρτισμένην εἶναι τὴν ἀπάτην· ὃ καὶ αὐτὸ πάλιν ἐστὶν ἀνακτωμένου. It is interesting to notice, in connexion with οὕτως ταχέως μετατίθεσθε, the character given by Cæsar of the Gauls: "ut ad bella suscipienda Gallorum alacer ac promtus est animus: sic mollis ac minime resistens ad calamitates mens ipsorum est." B. G. iii. 19:—"Cæsar . . . infirmitatem Gallorum veritus, quod sint in consiliis capiendis mobiles, et novis plerumque rebus student:" ib. iv. 5: see also ib. ii. 8; iii. 10. τοῦ καλέσ. ὑμ.] not to be taken with χριστοῦ, as Syr., Jer., Luth. (gives both constructions, but prefers this), Calv., Grot., Bengel, &c., nor understood of Paul, as al. and recently by Bagge,—but, as almost always with the Apostle (see note on Rom. i. 6), of GOD the Father (see ver. 15; and cf. Rom. viii. 30; ix. 24, 25: 1 Cor. i. 9; vii. 15, 17: 1 Thess. ii. 12: 2 Thess. ii. 14: 2 Tim. i. 9. Also 1 Pet. v. 10). ἐν χάρ. χρ.] in (as the element, and hence the medium; not into, as E. V.; see for construction 1 Cor. vii. 15. In the secondary transferred sense of local prepositions, so often found in later Greek, it is extremely difficult to assign the precise shade of meaning: see Jowett's and Ellic.'s notes here. But we may safely lay down two strongly marked regions of prepositional force, which must never be confounded, that of motion, and that of rest. ἐν, for example, can never be strictly rendered 'into,' nor εἰς, 'in.' Where such appears to be the case, some logical consideration has been overlooked, which if introduced would right the meaning) the grace of Christ. Christ's grace is the elementary medium of our 'calling of God,' as is set forth in full, Rom. v. 15, ἡ δωρεὰ (τοῦ θεοῦ) ἐν χάριτι τῇ τοῦ ἑνὸς ἀνθρ. Ἰησ. χρ.:—see also Acts xv. 11. And 'Christ's grace' is the sum of all that He has suffered and done for us to bring us to God;—whereby we come to the Father,—in which, as its element, the Father's calling of us has place. εἰς ἕτερ. εὐαγγ.] to a different (in kind: not ἄλλο, another of the same kind, which title he denies it, see below) gospel (so called by its preachers; or said by way of at once instituting a comparison unfavourable to the new teachers, by the very etymology of εὐαγγέλιον). 7.] Meyer's note appears to me well to express the sense: "the preceding εἰς ἕτερον εὐαγγέλιον was a paradoxical expression, there being in reality but one Gospel. Paul appeared by it to admit the existence of many Gospels, and he therefore now explains himself more accurately, how he wishes to be understood—ὃ οὐκ ἔστιν ἄλλο, εἰ μή &c.," i. e. which "different Gospel," whereto you are falling away, is not another, not a second, besides the one Gospel (ἄλλο, not ἕτερον again; see above), except that there are some who trouble you &c. is: 'This ἕτερον εὐαγγ. is only in so far another, that there are certain, who &c.' Notice that the stress is on οὐκ; so that Paul, though he had before said εἰς ἕτερον εὐαγγ., yet guards the unity of the Gospel, and explains what he meant by ἕτερον εὐαγγέλιον to be nothing but a corruption and perversion of the one Gospel of Christ. Others, as Chrys., Œc., Thdrt., Luther, De Wette, &c., take ὃ οὐκ ἔστιν ἄλλο as all referring to εὐαγγέλιον, "which is (admits of being) no other" (= μὴ ὄντος ἄλλου): and then εἰ μή is merely adversative, 'but,' or 'only,' a meaning which it will hardly bear, but which, as De W. remarks, is not necessarily involved in his interpretation: 'except that' answering for it quite as well. The objection to his view is (1) that the meaning assigned to ὃ οὐκ ἔστιν ἄλλο is very harsh, taking the relative from its application to the concrete (ἕτερον εὐαγγ.), and enlarging it to the abstract (τὸ εὐαγγ. in general) (2) that the juxtaposition of ἕτερον and ἄλλο in one sentence seems to require, as in 1 Cor. xv. 40, 41, that the strict meaning of each should be observed. Others again (Winer, Olsh., &c.) refer the ὅ to the whole sentence from ὅτι &c. to εὐαγγέλιον — 'which (viz. your falling away) is nothing else but (has no other cause, but that) ἀφ.' To this the objection (2) above applies, and it is besides very unlikely that St. Paul would thus have shifted all blame from the Galatians to their false teachers ('hanc culpam non tam vobis imputo quam perturbatoribus illis,' &c. Luther), and, as it were, wiped out the effect of his rebuke just after uttering it. Lastly, Schött., and Cornel. a Lapide, take ὃ οὐκ ἔστ. ἄλλο as a parenthesis, and refer εἰ μή to θαυμάζω, which should thus have been ἐθαύμαζον (ἄν). This would besides make the sentence a very harsh and unnatural one. The nature of this 'different Gospel,' as gathered from the data in our Epistle, was (1), though recognizing Jesus as the Christ, it insisted on circumcision and the observance of the Mosaic ordinances as to times, &c.: (2) it professed to rest on the authority of some of the other Apostles: see Chrys. quoted below. οἱ ταρ.] The article points out in a more marked manner the (notorious) occupation of these men, q. d. Perhaps also, as Chrys., there is a reference to the new teachers having sheltered themselves under the names of the great Apostles: μὴ γάρ μοι Ἰάκωβον εἴπῃς, φησί, καὶ Ἰωάννην κἂν γὰρ τῶν πρώτων ἀγγέλων ᾖ τις τῶν ἐξ οὐρανοῦ διαφθειρόντων τὸ κήρυγμα κ.τ.λ. So that οὐδέ has nothing to do, except in ruling the negative form of the clause, with οὔτε following, but belongs to this clause only. See on the whole, Ellic.'s note) did I (ἐγώ strongly emphatic,—see example from Herodot. above: 'neither did I, any more than the other Apostles.' Thus this clause stands alone; the 'neither' is exhausted and does not extend to the next clause) receive it (historically) from man (i. e. Thdrt. [but not altogether: for he subjoins, αὐτὸς αὐτὸν ἔσχε διδάσκαλον] al. take the genitive as objective, 'revelation of,' i. e. revealing) Jesus Christ. WHEN did this revelation take place?—clearly, soon after his conversion, imparting to him as it did the knowledge of the Gospel which he afterwards preached; and therefore in all probability it is to be placed during that sojourn in Arabia referred to in ver. 17. It cannot be identical with the visions spoken of 2 Cor. xii. 1 ff.,—for 2 Cor. was written in A.D. 57, and fourteen years before that would bring us to A.D. 43, whereas his conversion was in 37 (see Chron. Table in Prolegomena, Vol. II.), and his subsequent silence, during which we may conceive him to have been under preparation by this apocalyptic imparting of the Gospel, lasted but three years, ver. 18. Nor can it be the same as that appearance of the Lord to him related Acts xxii. 18,—for that was not the occasion of any revelation, but simply of warning and command. He appears to refer to this special revelation in 1 Cor. xi. 23 (where see on the supposed distinction between ἀπό and παρά); xv. 3. 1 Thess. iv. 15; see notes in those places.

There is no article before nor after ποτε, perhaps because the whole, ἀναστ.-ποτε ἐν-τῷ-Ἰουδ., is taken as one, q. d. τὸν ἐμὸν ποτε Ἰουδαϊσμόν: or better, as Donaldson in Ellicott, "the position of ποτε is due to the verb included in ἀναστροφήν. kind, "generally with the idea of weakness and frailty," Ellic. whose note see, and also reff. 17.] ἀπῆλθον both times refers to his departure from Damascus: q. d. 'when I left Damascus, I did not go ..... but when I left Damascus, I went.' The repetition of ἀπῆλθον is quite in the Apostle's manner; Meyer adduces as examples Rom. viii. 15 [Heb. xii. 18, 22. We may add Heb. ii. 16]. εἰς Ἀραβ.] On the place which this journey holds in the narrative of Acts ix., see notes on vv. 19, 22 there. Its object does not seem to have been (as Chrys., al., Meyer, al.) the preaching of the gospel, —nor are the words ἵνα εὐαγγελ. κ.τ.λ. necessarily to be connected with it,—but preparation for the apostolic work; though of course we cannot say, that he did not preach during the time, as before and after it (Acts ix. 20, 22) in the synagogues at Damascus. Into what part of Arabia he went, we have no means of determining. The name was a very vague one, sometimes including Damascus ('Damascus Arabiæ retro deputabatur, antequam transcripta erat in Syrophœnicem ex distinctione Syriarum.' Tert. adv. Marcion., iii. 13, vol. ii. p. 339: so also (verbatim) adv. Judæos 9, p. 619. ὅτι δὲ Δάμασκος τῆς Ἀραβικῆς γῆς ἦν κ. ἔστιν, εἰ καὶ νῦν προσενέμηται τῇ Συροφοινίκῃ λεγομένῃ, οὐδ' ὑμῶν τινες ἀρνήσασθαι δύνανται, Justin Mart. c. Trypho, 78, p. 176),—sometimes extending even to Lebanon and the borders of Cilicia (Pliny, Hist. Nat. vi. 32). It was however more usually restricted to that peninsula now thus called, between the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf. Here we must apparently take it in the wider sense, and understand that part of the Arabian desert which nearly bordered on Damascus. (From C. and H. edn. 2, i. p. 117, f.) How long he remained there we are equally at a loss to say. Hardly for any considerable portion of the three years: Acts ix. 23 will scarcely admit of this: for those ἡμέραι ἱκαναί were manifestly passed at Damascus. The journey is mentioned here, to account for the time, and to shew that he did not spend it in conferring with men, or with the other Apostles. καὶ πάλ. ὑπέστ.] cf. Acts ix. 22, 25. 18—24.] But after a very short visit to Peter at Jerusalem, he retired to Syria and Cilicia.

18.] At first sight, it would appear as if the three years were to be reckoned from his return to Damascus: but on closer examination we see that μετὰ ἔτη τρ. stands in opposition to εὐθέως above, and the ἀνῆλθον κ.τ.λ. here answers to ἀπῆλθον κ.τ.λ. there. So that we must reckon them from his conversion: ὅτε δὲ εὐδόκησεν κ.τ.λ. ruling the whole narrative. See also on ch. ii. 1. This is the journey of Acts ix. 26,—where see note. There is no real discrepancy between that account and this. The incident which led to his leaving Damascus (Acts ix. 25. 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33) has not necessarily any connexion with his purpose in going to Jerusalem: a purpose which may have been entertained before, or determined on after, that incident. To this visit must be referred the vision of Acts xxii. 17, 18. ἱστορ. Κηφ.] to make the acquaintance of Cephas —not to get information or instruction from him: see reff., and Ellic. here. James, the Lord's brother, was one of the Twelve, and the only one besides Peter whom Paul saw at this visit: (2) that he was one τῶν ἀποστόλων, but not necessarily of the Twelve. Of these, (1) apparently cannot be: for after the choosing of the Twelve (John vi. 70), the ἀδελφοί of our Lord did not believe on Him (John vii. 5): an expression (see note there) which will not admit of any of His brethren having then been His disciples. We must then adopt (2): which is besides in consonance with other notices respecting the term ἀπόστολος, and the person here mentioned. I reserve the subject for full discussion in the prolegomena to the Ep. of James. See also notes, Matt. x. 3; xiii. 55; John vii. 5. 20.] This asseveration (cf. 2 Cor. xi. 31) applies most naturally to the important fact just asserted —his short visit to Jerusalem, and his having seen only Peter and James, rather than to the whole subject of the chapter. If a report had been spread in Galatia that after his conversion he spent years at Jerusalem and received regular institution in Christianity at the hands of the Apostles, this last fact would naturally cause amazement, and need a strong confirmatory asseveration. As regards the construction, ἃ . . . . . ὑμῖν stands alone, (with regard to) the things which I am writing to you,—and the word necessary to be supplied to carry on the sense from ἰδοὺ ἐνώπ. τ. θεοῦ to ὅτι, lies under the ἰδού, which here answers to such words as διαμαρτύρομαι, 1 Tim. v. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 14; iv. 1,—παραγγέλλω, 1 Tim. vi. 13. Meyer would supply γράφω, which seems harsh: others take ὅτι as 'for,' which is worse still (cf. 2 Cor. xi. 21, ὁ θεὸς οἶδεν . . . . ὅτι οὐ ψεύδομαι),—and this too, understanding ἐστίν after θεοῦ (Bengel). 21.] The beginning only of this journey is related in Acts ix. 30, where see note. Mr. Howson suggests (edn. 2, i. p. 129, f.) that he may have gone at once from Cæsarea to Tarsus by sea, and Syria and Cilicia may afterwards have been the field of his activity, —these provinces being very generally mentioned together, from their geographical affinity, Cilicia being separated from Asia Minor by Mount Taurus. (See also note on Luke ii. 1, 2.) Winer, al. have understood by Syria here, Phœnicia: but as Meyer has shewn, inconsistently with usage. In Acts xv. 23, 41, we find churches in Syria and Cilicia, which may have been founded by Paul on this journey. The supposition is confirmed by our ver. 23: see below. 22, 23.] 'So far was I from being a disciple of the Apostles, or tarrying in their company, that the churches of Judæa, where they principally laboured, did not even know me by sight.' τῷ προσώπῳ, the referential, or adverbial dative: Donalds., Gramm. § 457. τῆς Ἰουδαίας excludes Jerusalem, where he was known. Jowett doubts this: but it seems to be required by Acts ix. 26—29. Chrys. seems to mistake the Apostle's purpose, when he says, Ἵνα μάθῃς, ὅτι τοσοῦτον ἀπεῖχε τοῦ κηρύξαι αὐτοῖς περιτομήν, ὅτι οὐδὲ ἀπὸ ὄψεως γνώριμος ἦν αὐτοῖς: and Olshausen, in supposing him to be refuting the idea that he had learned the Gospel from other Christians in Palestine. 23. ἀκ. ἦσαν] They (the members of the churches: cf. By thus shewing the spirit with which the churches of Judæa were actuated towards him, he marks more strongly the contrast between them and the Galatian Judaizers. Thdrt. says strikingly: μανθάνοντες γὰρ τὴν ἀῤῥᾳδίαν μεταβολήν, κ. ὅτι ὁ λύκος τὰ τοιμένων ἐργάζεται, τῆς εἰς τὸν θεὸν ὑμνῳδίας τὰ κατ' ἐμὲ πρόφασιν ἐλάμβανον.

II. 1—10.] On his subsequent visit to Jerusalem, he maintained equal independence, was received by the Apostles as of co-ordinate authority with themselves, and was recognized as the Apostle of the uncircumcision.

1. διὰ δεκατ. ἐτῶν] First, what does this διά imply? According to well-known usage, διά with a genitive of time or space signifies 'through and beyond:' thus, ὁ μὲν χρόνος δὴ διὰ χρόνου προβαινέ μοι, Soph. Philoct. 285, —διὰ δέκα ἐπάλξεων πύργοι ἦσαν μεγάλοι, Thuc. iii. 21, and then τῶν πύργων ὄντων δι' ὀλίγου: see reff., and Bernhardy, Syntax, p. 235. Winer, Gramm. edn. 6, § 51. (The instrumental usage, διὰ δακρύων, διὰ νυκτὸς, &c. is derived from this, the instrument being regarded as the means, passed through before the end is attained: but obviously has no place here, where a definite time is mentioned.) See more in Ellic. διὰ δεκ. ἐτ. then is after fourteen years, δεκατεσσάρων παρελθόντων ἐτῶν, Chrys. Next, from what time are we to reckon? Certainly at first sight it would appear,—from the journey last mentioned. And Meyer maintains that we are bound to accept this first impression without enquiring any further. But why? Is the prima facie view of a construction always right? Did we, or did he, judge thus in ch. i. 18? Are we not bound, in all such cases, should any reason ab extra exist for doing so, to re-examine the passage, and ascertain whether our prima facie impression may not have arisen from neglecting some indication furnished by the context? That this is the case here, I am persuaded. The ways of speaking, in ch. i. 18, and here, are very similar. The ἔπειτα in both cases may be well taken as referring back to the same terminus a quo, διά being used in this verse as applying to the larger interval, or even perhaps to prevent the fourteen years being counted from the event last mentioned, as they would more naturally be, had a second μετά been used. What would there be forced or unnatural in a statement of the following kind? "After my conversion (ὅτε δέ, &c. ch. i. 15) my occasions of communicating with the other Apostles were these: (1) after three years I went up, &c. (2) after fourteen years had elapsed, I again went up, &c.?" This view is much favoured, if not rendered decisive, by the change in position of ἐτῶν and the numeral, in this second instance. In ch. i. 18, it is μετὰ ἔτη τρία: ἔτη, in the first mention of the interval, having the emphatic place. But now, it is not δι' ἐτῶν δεκατεσσάρων, but διὰ δεκατεσσάρων ἐτῶν—ἐτῶν now passing into the shade, and the numeral having the emphasis—a clear indication to me that the ἔτη have the same reference as before, viz. to the time of his conversion. A list, and ample discussion, of the opinions on both sides, will be found in Anger, de ratione temporum, ch. iv. This (cf. Chronol. Table in Prolegg. Vol. II.) would bring the visit here related to the year 50: see below. πάλιν ἀνέβην] I again went up: but nothing is said, and there was no need to say any thing, of another visit during the interval. It was the object of the Apostle to specify, not all his visits to Jerusalem, but all his occasions of intercourse with the other Apostles: and it is mere trifling, when Meyer, in his love of creating discrepancies, maintains that in such a narration as this, St. Paul would be putting a weapon into the hands of his opponents by omitting his second journey. That journey was undertaken (Acts xi. 30) in pursuance of a mission from the church at Antioch, to convey alms to the elders of the suffering church at Jerusalem. It was at a period of persecution, when James the son of Zebedee and Peter were under the power of Herod, —and in all probability the other Apostles were scattered. Probably Barnabas and Saul did not see any of them. They merely (Acts xii. 25) fulfilled their errand, and brought back John Mark. If in that visit he had no intercourse with the Apostles, as his business was not with them, the mention of it here would be irrelevant: and to attempt, as Mey., to prove the Acts inaccurate, because that journey is not mentioned here, is simply absurd. That the visit here described is in all probability the THIRD related in the Acts (A.D. 50) on occasion of the council of Apostles and elders (Acts xv.), I have shewn in a note to the chronological table, Prolegomena to Acts, Vol. II. The various separate circumstances of the visit will be noticed as we proceed.

συνπ. καὶ Τίτον] In Acts xv. 2, ἔταξαν ἀναβαίνειν Π. κ. Βαρν. καί τινας ἄλλους ἐξ αὐτῶν. Titus is here particularized by name, on account of the notice which follows, ver. 3: and the καί serves to take him out from among the others. On Titus, see Prolegg. to Ep. to Titus. 2.] δέ not only carries on the narrative, emphatically repeating the verb (Mey.), but carries on the refutation also—but I went up (not for any purpose of learning from or consulting others, but) &c.:—So Il. ω. 484, ὃς Ἀχιλεὺς θάμβησεν ἰδὼν Πριάμοιο θοειδέα· θάμβησαν δὲ καὶ ἄλλοι,—and other examples in Hartung, i. p. 168. Of his undertaking the journey κατ' ἀποκάλυψιν, nothing is said in the Acts, all that is related there being, the appointment by the church of Paul and Barnabas and others to go. What divine intimation Paul may have received, inducing him to offer himself for the deputation, we cannot say: that some such occurred, he here assures us, and it was important for him to assert it, as shewing his dependence only on divine leading, and independence of any behests from the Jerusalem church. Meyer well remarks that the history itself of the Acts furnishes an instance of such a double prompting: Peter was induced by a visiou, and at the same time by the messengers of Cornelius, to go to Cæsarea. Schrader would give a singular meaning to κατ' ἀποκάλυψιν; that his visit was for the purpose of making known the Gospel which he preached, &c. Hermann (de ep. ad Gal. trib. prim. capp., cited by Meyer) agrees; "explicationis causa, i. e. ut patefieret inter ipsos quæ vera esset Jesu doctrina." But it is against this sense, that (1) the N. T. usage of ἀποκάλυψις always has respect to revelation from above, and (2) this very phrase, κατ' ἀποκάλυψιν, is found in ref. Eph. used absolutely as here, undoubtedly there signifying by revelation. Hermann's objection that for this meaning, κατά τινα ἀποκ. would be required, is nugatory: not the particular revelation (concrete) which occasioned the journey, but merely the fact that it was by (abstract) revelation, is specified.

ἀνεθέμην] (reff.): so Aristoph. Nub. 1436, ὑμῖν ἀναθεὶς ἅπαντα τἀμὰ πράγματα. See more examples in Wetst. αὐτοῖς] to the Christians at Jerusalem, implied in Ἱεροσόλ. above: see reff. This wide assertion is limited by the next clause, κατ' ἰδίαν, &c. Œc., Calv., Olsh., al. take αὐτοῖς to mean the Apostles: in which case, the stress by and by must be on κατ' ἰδίαν,—I communicated it (indeed,—μέν would more naturally stand here on this interpretation) to them, but privately (i. e. more confidentially,—but how improbable, that St. Paul should have thus given an exoteric and esoteric exposition of his teaching) τοῖς δοκοῦσιν. Chrys. is quoted for this view by Mey., but not quite correctly; ἐπειδὴ γὰρ ἐν τοῖς Ἱεροσολύμοις πάντες ἐσκανδαλίζοντο, εἴ τις παραβαίη τὸν νόμον, εἴ τις κωλύσειε χρήσασθαι τῇ περιτομῇ .... παῤῥησίᾳ μὲν παρελθεῖν κ. τὸ κήρυγμα ἀποκαλύψαι τὸ ἑαυτοῦ οὐκ ἠνείχετο, κατ' ἰδίαν δὲ τοῖς δοκοῦσιν ἀνέθετο ἐπὶ Βαρνάβα κ. dæos ab observantia Mosaicæ legis .... esse liberandos.' κατ. ἰδ. δέ] but (limits the foregoing αὐτοῖς; q. d., "when I say 'to them,' I mean." Ellic. ed. 2, questions this, and understands δέ to introduce another conference, more private than that just mentioned) in private (in a private conference: not to be conceived as separate from, but as specifying, the former ἀνεθέμην) to those that were eminent (more at length ver. 6, οἱ δοκοῦντες εἶναί τι. These were James, Cephas, and John, ver. 9,—who appear to have been the only Apostles then at Jerusalem. Olsh. supposes the words to imply blame, not in the mind of the Apostle himself, but as reflecting on the unworthy exaltation of these Apostles by the Judaizing teachers. He illustrates this by οἱ ὑπερλίαν ἀπόστολοι, 2 Cor. xi. 5; but an expression of such feeling here seems out of place, and it is better to understand οἱ δοκοῦντες as describing mere matter of fact; see examples in Kypke and Elsner), lest by any means I should (seem to) be running, or (to) have run, in vain. οὐ περὶ ἑαυτοῦ τίθεικεν, ἀλλὰ περὶ τῶν ἄλλων· τουτέστιν, ἵνα μάθωσιν ἅπαντες τὴν τοῦ κηρύγματος συμφωνίαν, κ. ὅτι κ. τοῖς ἄλλοις ἀρέσκει τὰ ὑπ' ἐμοῦ κηρυττόμενα, Thdrt.: so also Chrys., Thl., Calv., al. The construction of two moods after the same conjunction is found elsewhere in Paul: cf. 1 Thess. iii. 5. The present subjunctive τρέχω implies continuance in the course; the 2 aorist indicative ἔδραμον, the course already run. It is quite out of the question, that this last clause should express a bonâ fide fear, lest his ministry should really be, or have been, in vain, without the recognition of the church at Jerusalem (De W., al.): such a sentiment would be unworthy of him, and, besides, at variance with the whole course of his argument here. The reference must be (as Thdrt. above) to the estimation in which his preaching would be held by those to whom he imparted it. When we consider the very strong prejudices of the Jerusalem church, this feeling of anxiety, leading him to take measures to prevent his work from being tumultuously disowned by them, is surely but natural. On εἰς κενὸν and τρέχω, see reff. (The grammatical difficulty is well discussed in Ellicott's note.)

3.] But (so far were they from regarding my course to have been in vain, that) neither (ἀλλ' οὐδέ introduces a climax, see reff.) was Titus, who was with me, being a Greek (i. e. though he was a Gentile, and therefore liable to the demand that he should be circumcised), compelled to be circumcised (i. e. we did not allow him to be thus compelled: the facts being, as here implied, that the church at Jerusalem [and the Apostles? apparently not, from Acts xv. 5] demanded his circumcision, but on account of the reason following, the demand was not complied with, but resisted by Paul and Barnabas. So Meyer, with Piscator and Bengel, and I am persuaded, rightly, from what follows. But usually it is understood, that the circumcision of Titus was not even demanded, and that Paul alleged this as shewing his agreement with the other Apostles. So Chrys.: ἀκρόβυστον ὄντα οὐκ ἠνάγκασαν περιτμηθῆναι οἱ ἀπόστολοι, ὅπερ ἀπόδειξις ἦν μεγίστη τοῦ μὴ καταγινώσκειν τῶν ὑπὸ τοῦ Παύλου λεγομένων ἢ πραττομένων: so also Thdrt., Thl., Œc., &c., and Winer and De W. Had this been so, besides that the following could not have stood as it does, not the strong word ἠναγκάσθη, but the weakest possible word would have been used—'the circumcision of Titus was not even mentioned'):

4.] but (i. e. 'and this:'—the construction of the sentence is [against Ellic.] precisely as ver. 2: this δέ restricts and qualifies the broader assertion which went before. 'Titus was not compelled .... : and that,' &c. To connect this with ver. 2, supposing ver. 3 to be parenthetical, as Mr. Bagge, seems harsh, and unnecessary. A second δέ would hardly be found in the same sentence in this restrictive sense) on account of the false brethren who had been foisted in among us (the Judaizers in the church at Jerusalem, see Acts xv. 1. The word παρείσακτος is not found elsewhere. It occurs in the title of the "prologus incerti auctoris" to Sirach: πρόλογος παρεισαντος ἀδήλου. It is found however in the lexicons of Hesych., Photius, and Suidas, and interpreted ἀλλότριος. The verb παρεισάγειν is common in Polybius, without any idea of surreptitious introduction: see Schweigh.'s Index: but such an idea certainly seems here to be attached to it, by the repetition of παρεισ-, in παρεισῆλθον immediately after), men who (οἵτινες classifies) crept in to spy out (in a hostile sense: so Chrys.,—ὁρᾷς πῶς καὶ τῇ τῶν κατασκόπων προσηγορίᾳ ἐδήλωσε τὸν πόλεμον ἐκεῖνον,—reff., and Eur. Helen. 1607, ὅστις νοσοῦσιν ξυμμάχων κατασκοπῶν) our freedom (from the ceremonial law: to see whether, or how far, we kept it) which we have in Christ Jesus, with intent to enslave us utterly (the future after ἵνα is found John xvii. 2; Rev. iii. 9; viii. 3; xxii. 14. Hermann, on Œd. Col. 156, says—"futuro non jungitur ἵνα, ut." The construction of the future with ὅπως and ὅπως μή is common enough in the classics. Winer remarks, Gr. edn. 6, § 41. b. 1. b, that it denotes continuance, whereas the aorist subjunctive is used of something transitory: but qu.? I should rather say that it signifies the certain sequence, in the view of the agent, of that which follows, not merely that it is his intent,—and that it arises from the mingling of two constructions, beginning as if ἵνα with the subjunctive were about to be used, and then passing off to the direct indicative); to whom not even for one hour (reff.) did we (Barnabas, Titus, and myself) yield with the subjection required of us (dative of the manner: the article giving the sense, 'with the subjection claimed.' Fritzsche takes it, 'yield by complying with the wish of the Apostles:' but this is manifestly against the context: Hermann, and similarly Bretschneider, 'quibus ne horæ quidem spatium Jesu obsequio segnior fui,'—absurdly enough, against the whole drift of the passage, and the Apostle's usage of ὑποταγή abstractedly), that the truth of the Gospel (as contrasted with the perverted view which they would have introduced: but not to be confounded with τὸ ἀληθὲς εὐαγγέλιον. Had they been overborne in this point, the verity of the Gospel would have been endangered among them,—i. e. that doctrine of justification, on which the Gospel turns as the truth of God) might abide (reff.: and note on ch. i. 18) with you ('you Galatians:' not, 'you Gentiles in general:' the fact was so,—the Galatians, specially, not being in his mind at the time: it is only one of those cases where, especially if a rhetorical purpose is to be served, we apply home to the particular what, as matter of fact, it only shares as included in the general).

The omission of οἷς οὐδέ in this sentence (see var. readd.) has been an attempt to simplify the construction, and at the same time to reconcile Paul's conduct with that in Acts xvi. 3, where he circumcised Timothy on account of the Jews. But the circumstances were then widely different: and the whole narrative in Acts xv. makes it extremely improbable that the Apostle should have pursued such a course on this occasion.

6.] He returns to his sojourn in Jerusalem, and his intercourse with the δοκοῦντες. The construction is difficult, and has been very variously given. It seems best (and so most Commentators) to regard it as an anacoluthon. The Apostle begins with ἀπὸ δὲ τῶν δοκούντων εἶναί τι, having it in his mind to add οὐδὲν προσελαβόμην or the like: but then, going off into the parenthesis ὁποῖοί ποτε ἦσαν &c., he entirely loses sight of the original construction, and proceeds with ἐμοὶ γάρ &c., which follows on the parenthesis, the γάρ rendering a reason [this is still my view, against Ellic. whose note see] for the οὐδέν μοι διαφέρει &c. De Wette and others think that the parenthesis ends at λαμβάνει, and the construction is resumed from ἀπὸ δέ &c. in an active instead of in a passive form: but it seems better, with Meyer, to regard the parenthesis as never formally closed, and the original construction not resumed. Other ways are; (1) most of the Greek Fathers (Chrys. hardly says enough for this to be inferred as his opinion), and others (e. g. Olsh., Rückert) take ἀπό as belonging to διαφέρει, as if it were περί: so Thl., οὐδεμία μοι φροντὶς περὶ τῶν δοκούντων, &c. The preposition seems capable, if not exactly of this interpretation, of one very nearly akin to it, as in βλέπετε ἀπό and the like expressions: but the objection is, that it is unnatural to join διαφέρει with ἀπό which lies so far from it, when ὁποῖοί ποτε ἦσ. so completely fills up the construction. (2) Homberg (Parerg. p. 275: Meyer) renders,—'ab illis vero, qui videntur esse aliquid, non differo.' But as Meyer remarks, though διαφέρω ἀπό τινος may bear this meaning, certainly διαφέρει μοι ἀπό τινος cannot. (3) Hermann assumes an aposiopesis, and understands 'what should I fear?' but an aposiopesis seems out of place in a passage which does not rise above the fervour of narrative. See other interpretations in Meyer and De Wette. οἱ δοκοῦντ. εἶναί τι may be either subjective ('those who believe themselves to be something'), or objective ('those who have the estimation of being something'). The latter is obviously the meaning here. ποτε is understood by some to mean 'once,' 'olim:' 'whatever they once were, when Christ was on earth:' so vulg. ('quales aliquando fuerint'), Pelag., Luth., Beza, al. But this is going out of the context, and unnecessary. The emphasis is on μοι, and is again taken up by the ἐμοὶ γάρ below. Phrynichus (p. 384) condemns τίνι διαφέρει as not used by the best writers, but Lobeck (note, ibid.) has produced examples of it, as well as of the more approved construction τί διαφέρει, from Xenophon, Plato, and Aristotle. πρόσωπ. . . . λαμβ.] q. d. See Eph. vi. 9. προσανέθεντο] as in ch. i. 16, —imparted. As I, at my first conversion, did not impart it to flesh and blood, so they now imparted nothing to me: we were independent the one of the other. The meaning 'added' (οὐκ ἐδίδαξαν, οὐ διώρθωσαν, οὐδὲν προσέθηκαν ὧν ἤδειν, Chrys.; so Thdrt., and most Commentators, and E. V. 'in conference added') is not justified by the usage of the word: see note, as above. Rückert, Bretschneider, Olsh., al. explain it: 'laid on no additional burden.' But this is the active, not the middle, signification of the verb: see Xen. Mem. ii. 1. 8, where προσαναθέσθαι is not 'to impose on another additional duties,' but 'to take them on a man's self.' 7.] Not only did they impart nothing to me, but, on the contrary, they gave in their adhesion to the course which I and Barnabas had been (independently) pursuing. Apparently in this, that instead of strengthening the hands of Paul, they left him to fight his own battle [practically: but they added the weight of their approval: see Ellic.]. his preaching among the Gentiles. Compare Acts xv. 12. πεπίστ. (for construction see reff. Acts and 1 Cor. and other examples in Winer, Gram., § 39. 1. a) has the emphasis: they saw that I was (lit. am: the state being one still abiding) ENTRUSTED with the Gospel of the uncircumcision, as Peter with that of the circumcision; therefore they had only to accede to the appointment of God. τῆς ἀκροβ.] i. e. belonging to, addressed to, the uncircumcised (οὐ τὰ πράγματα λέγων αὐτά, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἀπὸ τούτων γνωριζόμενα ἔθνη, Chrys.). Peter was not the Apostle of the circumcision only, for he had opened the door to the Gentiles (Acts x., to which he refers, ib. xv. 7), but in the ultimate assignment of the apostolic work, he wrought less among the Gentiles and more among the Jews than Paul: see 1 Pet. i. 1, and note. But his own Epistles are sufficient testimonies that, in his hands at least, the Gospel of the circumcision did not differ in any essential point from that of the uncircumcision. Cf., as an interesting trait on the other side, Col. iv. 11. 8.] Parenthetic explanation of πεπίστευμαι κ.τ.λ. Πέτρῳ and ἐμοί are datives commodi, not governed by the ἐν in ἐνεργ., the meaning of this preposition being already expressed in the word ἐνεργεῖν, and having therefore no force to pass on: cf. ref. Prov. ἐνήργ. applies to the ἀτακολουθοῦντα σημεῖα with which the Lord accompanied His word spoken by them, and to the power with which they spoke that word. The agent in ἐνεργ. is GOD,—the Father: see 1 Cor. xii. 6; Phil. ii. 13; Rom. xv. 15, 16. εἰς ἀποστ.] towards, with a view to, the Apostleship,—reff. εἰς τὰ ἔθνη] The fuller construction would be, εἰς ἀποστολὴν τ. ἐθνῶν: so τάων οὔτις ὁμοῖα νοήματα Πηνελοπείη | ἧδη, Od. β. 120: and frequently. 9.] resumes the narrative after the parenthesis. Ἰάκωβος] placed first, as being at the head of the church at Jerusalem, and presiding (apparently) at the conference in Acts xv. δοκοῦντες alludes to vv. 2 and 6; see there. στύλοι] pillars, i. e. principal supporters of the church, men of distinction and weight; see reff., and examples in Wetst.: and Suicer, sub voce. Clem.-rom. ad Cor. i. 5, p. 217, uses the word directly, without metaphor: οἱ δικαιότατοι στύλοι ἐδιώχθησαν. δεξ. ἔδωκ. κοιν.] On the separation of the genitive from its governing noun, see Winer, § 30. 3, note 2. It is made here, because what follows respects rather κοινωνίας than ἔδωκαν. ἵνα κ.τ.λ.] There is an ellipsis of some verb; πορευθῶμεν and -θῶσιν, or perhaps εὐαγγελιζώμεθα, -ζωνται, which might connect with εἰς (see 1 Thess. ii. 9; 1 Pet. i. 25. But Meyer objects that it is not found with εἰς in St. Paul): or as Beza, ἀπόστολοι γενώμεθα. Similar ellipses occur Rom. iv. 16; ch. v. 13. This division of labour was not, and could not be, strictly observed. Every where in the Acts we find St. Paul preaching 'to the Jews first,' and every where the Judaizers followed on his track: see Jowett's note. 10. μόν. τ. πτ. ἵνα μν.] The genitive is put before the conjunction for emphasis: see reff., and 2 Thess. ii. 7, and

John xiii. 29, where remarkably enough it is the same word which precedes ἵνα, ... τοῖς πτωχοῖς ἵνα τι δῷ. The construction is complete without supplying any participle (αἰτοῦντες or παρακαλοῦντες), depending upon ἔδωκαν. ὃ καὶ ἐσπ. αὐτὸ τ. ποι.] which was the very thing that I also was anxious to do,—viz., then and always: it was my habit. So that ἐσπούδασα has not a pluperfect sense. He uses the singular, because the plural could not correctly be predicated of the whole time to which the verb refers: for he parted from Barnabas shortly after the council in Acts xv. Meyer understands ἐσπούδ. of the time subsequent to the council only: but this does not seem necessary. The proofs of this σπουδή on his part may be found, Rom. xv. 25—27; 1 Cor. xvi. 1—4; 2 Cor. viii. ix.; Acts xxiv. 17: which, though they probably happened after the date of our Epistle, yet shewed the bent of his habitual wishes on this point. αὐτὸ τοῦτο is not merely redundant, as in ἧς εἶχεν τὸ θυγάτριον αὐτῆς πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον, Mark vii. 25,—but is an emphatic repetition of that to which ὅ refers, as in the version above. So that ὃ ἐσπ. αὐτὸ τοῦτο ποι. = καὶ ἐσπ. τὸ αὐτὸ τοῦτο ποι. Cf. Thuc. i. 10,—Ἀθηναίων δὲ τὰ αὐτὰ τοῦτα παθόντων. Cf. Ellicott's note. 11—17.] He further proves his independence, by relating how he rebuked Peter for temporizing at Antioch. This proof goes further than any before: not only was he not taught originally by the Apostles,—not only did they impart nothing to him, rather tolerating his view and recognizing his mission,—but he on one occasion stood aloof from and reprimanded the chief of them for conduct unworthy the Gospel: thus setting his own Apostleship in opposition to Peter, for the time. 11. ὅτε δὲ ἦλθ.] This visit of Peter to Antioch, not related in the Acts, will fall most naturally (for our narrative follows the order of time) in the period described, Acts xv. 35, seeing that (ver. 13) Barnabas also was there. See below. Κηφᾶς] ἡ ἱστορία παρὰ Κλήμεντι κατὰ τὴν πέμπτην τῶν ὑποτυπώσεων, ἐν ᾗ καὶ Κηφᾶν, περὶ οὗ φησιν ὁ Παῦλος Ὅτε δὲ ἦλθ. This story was manifestly invented to save the credit of St. Peter. See below. κατὰ πρόσωπον] to the face,—see reff.: not 'before all,' which is asserted by and by, ver. 14. One of the most curious instances of ecclesiastical ingenuity on record has been afforded in the interpretation of this passage by the fathers. They try to make it appear that the reproof was only an apparent one—that ὁ θεῖος Πέτρος was entirely in the right, and Paul withstood him, κατὰ πρόσωπον, 'in appearance merely,' because he had been blamed by others. So Chrys.: so Thdrt. also: and Jerome,—"Paulus ... nova usus est arte pugnandi, ut dispensationem Petri, qua Judæos salvari cupiebat, nova ipse contradictionis dispensatione corrigeret, et resisteret ei in facie, non arguens propositum, sed quasi in publico contradicens, ut ex eo quod Paulus eum arguens resistebat, hi qui crediderant e gentibus servarentur." In Ep. ad Gal. ad loc. This view of his met with strong opposition from Augustine, who writes to him, nobly and worthily, Ep. 40. 3, vol. ii. p. 155, ed. Migne: "In expositione quoque Ep. Pauli ad Gal., invenimus aliquid, quod nos multum moveat. Si enim ad Scripturas sanctas admissa fuerint velut officiosa mendacia, quid in eis remanebit auctoritatis? Quæ tandem de Scripturis illis sententia proferetur, cujus pondere contentiosæ falsitatis obteratur improbitas? Statim enim ut protuleris: si aliter sapit qui contra nititur, dicet illud quod prolatum erit honesto aliquo officio scriptorum fuisse mentitum. Ubi enim hoc non poterit, si potuit in ea narratione, quam exorsus Apostolus ait, Quæ autem scribo vobis, ecce coram Deo quia non mentior, credi affirmarique mentitus, eo loco ubi dixit de Petro et Barnaba, cum viderem, quia non recte ingrediuntur ad veritatem Evangelii? Si enim recte illi ingrediebantur, iste mentitus est: si autem ibi mentitus est, ubi verum dixit? dicitur, cane. Incomparabiliter enim pulchrior est veritas Christianorum, quam Helena Græcorum . . . ." (Similarly in several other Epistles in vol. ii. ed. Migne, where also Jerome's replies may be seen.) Afterwards, Jerome abandoned his view for the right one: 'Nonne idem Paulus in faciem Cephæ restitit, quod non recto pede incederet in Evangelio?' Apol. adv. Ruf. iii. 2, vol. ii. p. 532: see also cont. Pelag. i. 22, p. 718. Aug. Ep. 180. 5, vol. ii. p. 779. ὅτι κατεγνωσμένος ἦν] (not, as vulgate, quia reprehensibilis erat ['because he was to be blamed,' E. V.: similarly Calv., Beza, al.]: no such meaning can be extracted from the perfect participle passive; nor can Hebrew usage be alleged for such a meaning in Greek. The instance commonly cited from Lucian de saltat., p. 952, ἀληθῶς, ἐπὶ μανίᾳ κατεγνωσμένος, is none whatever; nor is Iliad, α. 388, ὃ δὴ τετελεσμένος ἐστί: the perfect participle having in both its proper sense. Nor again is ψηλαφωμένῳ (δρει), Heb. xii. 18, at all to the purpose: see note there) because he was condemned ('a condemned man,' as we say: by whom, does not appear: possibly, by his own act: or, by the Christians in Antioch: but St. Paul would hardly have waited for the prompting of others to pronounce his condemnation of him. I therefore prefer the former: he was [self] convicted: convicted of inconsistency by his conduct). 12.] These τινες ἀπὸ Ἰακώβου have been softened by some Commentators into persons who merely gave themselves out as from James (Winer, &c. and even Ellicott, edn. 2), or who merely came from Jerusalem where James presided (Beza, Grot., Olsh., &c.). But the candid reader will I think at once recognize in the words a mission from James (so Thl., Œc., Estius [doubtfully], Rückert, Meyer, De W.): and will find no difficulty in believing that that Apostle, even after the decision of the council regarding the Gentile converts, may have retained (characteristically, see his recommendation to St. Paul, in Acts xxi. 18 ff.) his strict view of the duties of Jewish converts,—for that is perhaps all that the present passage requires. And this mission may have been for the very purpose of admonishing the Jewish converts of their obligations, from which the Gentiles were free. Thus we have no occasion to assume (with De W.) that James had in the council been over-persuaded by the earnestness and eloquence of Paul, and had afterwards undergone a reaction: for his course will be consistent throughout. And my view seems to me to be confirmed by his own words, Acts xv. 19, where the emphatic τοῖς ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνῶν ἐπιστρέφουσιν tacitly implies, that the Jews would be bound as before. συνήσθιεν] As he had done, Acts x., on the prompting of a heavenly vision; and himself defended it, Acts xi. See below. ὑπέστελλεν] as well as ἀφώριζεν, governs ἑαυτόν: withdrew himself. So Polyb. i. 16. 10, ὁ δὲ βασιλεὺς Ἱέρων, ὑποστείλας ἑαυτὸν ὑπὸ τὴν Ῥωμαίων σκέπην, and al. freq. The imperfects express that there were more cases than one where he did this—it was the course he took. φοβούμενος] being afraid of. Chrys., to bear out his interpretation of the whole incident, says, οὐ τοῦτο φοβούμενος, μὴ κινδυνεύσῃ· ὁ γὰρ ἐν ἀρχῇ μὴ φοβηθεὶς (witness his denial of his Lord), πολλῷ μᾶλλον τότε· ἀλλ' ἵνα μὴ ἀποστῶσιν. ἐπεὶ καὶ αὐτὸς λέγει Γαλάταις, φοβοῦμαι ὑμᾶς μὴ πως εἰκῇ κεκοπίακα κ.τ.λ. And so Piscator, Grot., Estius, al. The whole incident is remarkably characteristic of Peter—ever the first to recognize, and the first to draw back from, great principles and truths: see this very ably enlarged on in Jowett's note on ver. 11. 13. συνυπεκρ.] were guilty of like hypocrisy. The word is not (as De W.) too strong a one to describe their conduct. They were aware of the liberty in Christ which allowed them to eat with Gentiles, and had practised it: and now, being still aware of it, and not convinced to the contrary, from mere fear of man they adopted a contrary course. but very little likeness to that discussed in 1 Cor. viii.—x.; Rom. xiv. There, it was a mere matter of licence which was in question: here, the very foundation itself. It was not now a question of using a liberty, but of asserting a truth, that of justification by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law. ὅτε . . . . συναπήχθη] The indicative usually follows ὅτε, when the result is matter of fact: the infinitive usually, when it is matter of course as well. So Herod. vi. 83,—Ἄργος δὲ ἀνδρῶν ἐχηρώθη οὕτω, ὥστε οἱ δοῦλοι αὐτέων ἔσχον πάντα τὰ πρήγματα, where it was not a necessary consequence of the depopulation, but a result which followed as matter of fact (so also John iii. 16, where the sending the Son to be the Saviour of the world was not a necessary consequence of the Father's love, but followed it as its result in fact: so that it is [against Ellic. edn. 1] an instance in point): Plat. Apol. 37 c,—οὕτως ἀλόγιστός εἰμι, ὥστε μὴ δύνασθαι λογίζεσθαι, where the degree of ἀλογία supposed involves the result of not being able to reason at all. See Krüger, Gram. § 65, 3. 1; Kühner, ii. p. 563. But the distinction does not seem always to be accurately observed. On συναπ., see ref. Rom., and note. Understand αὐτοῖς after συναπ., and take τῇ ὑπ. as the instrumental dative: 'was carried away (with them) by their hypocrisy:' or possibly the dative of the state into which &c.: see 2 Pet. iii. 17: but this construction seems questionable: see Ellic. edn. 2. Fritz. cites Zosimus, Hist. v. 6, καὶ αὐτὴ δὲ ἡ Σπάρτη συναπήγετο τῇ κοινῇ τῆς Ἑλλάδος ἀλώσει: add Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 17, p. 368 P., τῇ ἡδονῇ συναπαγόμενος (Ellicott). "Besides the antagonism in which this passage represents the two great Apostles, it throws an important light on the history of the apostolic church in the following respects:—1] As exhibiting Peter's relation to James, and his fear of those who were of the circumcision, whose leader we should have naturally supposed him to have been. 2] Also, as pourtraying the state of indecision in which all, except St. Paul, even including Barnabas, were in reference to the observance of the Jewish law." Jowett.

πρός] It is best, with Meyer, to take ἀλήθεια as in ver. 5, and render, connecting πρός with ὀρθοποδοῦσιν, towards (with a view to) maintaining and propagating the truth (objectively, the unadulterated character) of the Gospel. Others (De W., al.) render πρός 'with reference to,' ('according to,' E.V.,) and take τ. ἀλήθ. τ. εὐ. to mean 'the truth (fulness of character) required by the Gospel.' Mey. remarks, that St. Paul does not express nouns after verbs of motion by πρός, but by κατά, cf. Rom. viii. 4; xiv. 15; 1 Cor. iii. 3. Ellic. however answers, that in all these instances, περιπατέω, St. Paul's favourite verb of moral motion, is used, and that ὀρθοποδέω does not so plainly express motion as περιπατέω. Still, I prefer the former meaning, as better suiting the expression ἡ ἀλήθεια τ. εὐαγγ.: cf. ver. 5. ἔμπρ. πάντ.] 'before the church assembled.' The words require this, and the reproof would otherwise have fallen short of its desired effect on the Jewish converts. The speech which follows, and which I believe to extend to the end of the chapter, must be regarded as a compendium of what was said, and a free report of it, as we find in the narratives by St. Paul himself of his conversion. See below. If thou, being (by birth, originally, cf. Acts xvi. 20 and note) a Jew, livest (as thy usual habit. As Neander [Pfl. u. Leit., p. 114] remarks, these words shew that Peter had long been himself convinced of the truth on this matter, and lived according to it: see further on ver. 18) as a Gentile (how, is shewn by μετὰ τῶν ἐθνῶν συνήθιζεν above) and not as a Jew, how (is it that [reff.]) thou art compelling the Gentiles (i. e. virtually and ultimately; for the high authority of Peter and Barnabas would make the Gentile converts view their course as necessary to all Christians. There is no need, with De W. and Wieseler, to suppose that the τινες ἀπὸ Ἰακ. actually compelled the Gentile converts to Judaize, as necessary to salvation, and Peter upheld them: nor is there any difficulty in the expression: the present may mean, as it often does, 'art compelling to the best of thy power,' 'doing thy part to compel,'—for such certainly would be the ultimate result, if Jews and Gentiles might not company together in social life—"his principle logically involved this, or his influence and example would be likely to effect it." Jowett) to Judaize (observe the ceremonial law)?

15.] Some (Calv., Beza, Grot., Hermann, al.) think that the speech ends with ver. 14: Calov., al., with ver. 15: Luther, al., with ver. 16: Flatt, Neander, al., with ver. 18: Jowett, that the conversation gradually passes off into the general subject of the Epistle. "Ver. 14," he says, "is the answer of St. Paul to St. Peter: what follows, is more like the Apostle musing or arguing with himself, with an indirect reference to the Galatians." But it seems very unnatural to place any break before the end of the chapter. The Apostle recurs to the Galatians again with ὦ ἀνόητοι Γαλάται, ch. iii. 1: and it is harsh in the extreme to suppose him to pass from his speech to Peter into an address to them with so little indication of the transition. I therefore regard the speech (which doubtless is freely reported, and gives rather the bearing of what was said, than the words themselves, as in Acts xxii. and xxvi.) as continuing to the end of the chapter, as do Chr., Thdrt., Jer., Est., Beng., Rosenm., Winer, Rückert, Usteri, Olsh., B.-Crus., Meyer, De W. We (thou and I) by nature (birth) Jews and not sinners from among the Gentiles (he is speaking to Peter from the common ground of their Judaism, and using [ironically?] Judaistic language, in which the Gentiles were ἄθεοι, ἄνομοι, ἄδικοι, ἁμαρτωλοί [reff.]. The putting a comma after ἐθνῶν, and taking ἁμαρτωλοί with ἡμ. φύσ. Ἰουδ. [Prim. in Est., Elsner, Er.-Schmid, al.], 'We, by birth Jews, and, though not from the Gentiles, yet sinners,' is absurd), knowing nevertheless (this seems, against Ellic. ed. 2, the proper force of δέ here, and is the same in sense as his "but as we know," but clearer) that a man is not justified by (as the ground of justification: see Ellic.'s note on the sense of ἐκ) the works of the law (not, 'by works of law,' or 'on the score of duly done' [Peile]: this, though following as an inference, and a generalization of the axiom, was not in question here. 'The works of the law,' just as 'the faith of Jesus Christ;' the genitives in both cases being objective—the works which have the law [ceremonial and moral] for their object,—which are wrought to fulfil the law: Meyer compares ἁμαρτήματα νόμου, Wisd. ii. 12,—faith which has Jesus Christ for its object,—which is reposed in or on Him. On δικαιόω, see note, Rom. i. 17),—(supply, nor is any man justified, and see reff.) except by (as the medium of justification. Ellic. observes that two constructions seem to be mixed—οὐ δικ. ἄνθ. ἐξ ἔργ. ν., and οὐ δικ. ἄνθ. ἐὰν μὴ διὰ π. hypothesis, which arises in the mind, of the two being united) the faith of (see above) Jesus Christ,—we also (as well as the Gentile sinners, q. d., casting aside our legal trust) believed (reff.) on Christ Jesus (notice Ἰησ. χρ. above, χρ. Ἰησ. here. This is not arbitrary. In the general proposition above, Ἰησ. χρ., as the name of Him on whom faith is to be exercised: here, when Jews receive Him as their Messiah, χρ. Ἰησ., as bringing that Messiahship into prominence. Perhaps, however, such considerations are but precarious. For example, in this case, the readings are in some confusion. It may be remarked, that the Codex Sinaiticus agrees throughout with our text) that we might be justified by (this time, faith is the ground) the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law: because (it is an axiom in our theology that) by the works of the law shall all flesh find no justification (Angl.: 'shall no flesh be justified:' our language not admitting of the logical form of the Greek: but by this transposition of the negative, the sense is not accurately rendered). There is a difference between Commentators in the arrangement of the foregoing sentence. Meyer follows Lachmann in placing a period after χριστοῦ, and understanding ἐσμέν at Ἰουδ. or ἁμαρτωλοί. Beza, Hermann, Rückert, Usteri, Ellicott, al., begin a new sentence at εἰδότες δέ, also understanding ἐσμέν. But it seems much better, as above (with De W., al.), to carry on the sentence throughout. Meyer's objection, that thus it would not represent the matter of fact, for Peter and Paul were not converted as εἰδότες κ.τ.λ., would apply equally to his own arrangement, for they were not converted ἵνα δικαιωθῶσιν κ.τ.λ. 17.] Continues the argument. But if, seeking (put first for emphasis—in the course of our earnest endeavour) to be justified in Christ (as the element—the Body, comprehending us the members. This is lost sight of by rendering 'through Christ'), we ourselves also (you and I, addressed to Peter) were found to be sinners (as we should be, if we regarded the keeping of the law as necessary; for we should be just in the situation of those Gentiles who in the Judaistic view are ἁμαρτωλοί, faith having failed in obtaining righteousness for us, and we having cast aside the law which we were bound to keep), is therefore Christ the minister of sin (i. e. are we to admit the consequence which would in that case be inevitable, that Christ, having failed to obtain for his own the righteousness which is by faith, has left them sinners, and so has done all His work only to minister to a state of sin)? Whether we read ἄρα or ἆρα matters little; either will express the meaning, but the latter more pungently than the former. The clause must be interrogative, as μὴ γένοιτο always follows a question in St. Paul; see reff. Those who would take ἄρα for ἆρ' οὐ [qu. can it ever be so taken, in spite of Matthiæ (Gr. Gr. § 641), Winer (comm. h. l., but not in Gr. ed. 6, § 57. 2, where he allows the translation given above), Monk (on Eur. Alcest. 353), and Porson (pref. to Hec. p. x)?] seem to me to miss altogether the fine irony of the question, which, as it stands, presupposes the ἆρ' οὐ question already asked, the inevitable answer given, and now puts the result, 'Can we believe, are we to hold henceforth, such a consequence?' The same might be said of all the passages alleged by the above scholars in support of their view. Theodoret expresses well the argument: εἰ δὲ ὅτι τὸν νόμον καταλιπόντες τῷ χριστῷ προσεληλύθαμεν, διὰ τῆς ἐπ' αὐτὸν πίστεως τῆς δικαιοσύνης ἀπολαύσασθαι προσδοκήσαντες, παράβασιν τοῦτο νενόμισται, εἰς αὐτὸν ἡ αἰτία χωρήσει τὸν δεσπότην χριστόν· αὐτὸς γὰρ ἡμῖν τὴν

18.] For (substantiates the μὴ γένοιτο, and otherwise deduces the εὑρέθημεν ἁμαρτωλοί) if the things which I pulled down, those very things (and no others) I again build up (which thou art doing, who in Cæsarea didst so plainly announce freedom from the law, and again here in Antioch didst practise it thyself. The first person is chosen clementiæ causa; the second would have placed Peter, where the first means that he should place himself'), I am proving (reff.) myself a transgressor (παραβάτης is the species, bringing me under the genus ἁμαρτωλός. So that παραβ. ἐμ. συνιστ. is the explanation of ἁμαρτωλοὶ εὑρέθημεν). The force of the verse is,—'You, by now reasserting the obligation of the law, are proving (quoad te) that your former step of setting aside the law was in fact a transgression of it:' viz. in that you neglected and set it aside,—not, as Chrys., Thl., and Meyer (from ver. 19), because the law itself was leading you on to faith in Christ: for (1) that point is not yet raised, not belonging to this portion of the argument, and (2) by the hypothesis of this verse the ἐγώ has given up the faith in Christ, and so cannot be regarded as acknowledging it as the end of the law. See against this view, but to me not convincingly, Ellicott, ed. 2.

19.] For (the γάρ [agst Ellic.] retains, on our view of παραβάτης, its full exemplifying force) I (ἐγώ, for the first time expressed, is marked and emphatic. The first person of the last verse, serves as the transition point to treating, as he now does, of HIS OWN state and course. And this ἐγώ, as that in Rom. vii., is purely and bona fide 'I Paul;' not 'I and all believers') by means of the law died to the law (Christ was the end of the law for righteousness: the law itself, properly apprehended by me, was my παιδαγωγός to Christ: and in Christ, who fulfilled the law, I died to the law: i. e. satisfied the law's requirements, and passed out of its pale: the dative, as Ellic. remarks, is a sort of dativus commodi, as also in ζῆν θεῷ) that I should live to God (the end of Christ's work, LIFE unto God. ζήσω is 1 aor. subj. in subordination to the aor. preceding: not fut., as stated in former edd. See Ellic.). Many of the Fathers (some as an alternative), Luther, Bengel, al., take the first νόμος here to mean the Gospel (the νόμος τοῦ πνεύματος τῆς ζωῆς of Rom. viii. 2); but it will be manifest to any who follow the argument, that this cannot be so. This διὰ νόμου νόμῳ ἀπέθανον is in fact a compendium of his expanded experience in Rom. vii.: and also of his argument in ch. iii. iv. below.

I am ('and have been,' perf.) crucified with Christ (specification of the foregoing ἀπέθανον: the way in which I died to the law was, by being united to, and involved in the death of, that Body of Christ which was crucified): but it is no longer I that live, but (it is) Christ that liveth in me (the punctuation—χρ. συνεσταύρωμαι, ζῶ δέ· οὐκέτι ἐγώ, ζῇ δὲ ἐν ἐμ. χρ.,—as in E. V., &c.—is altogether wrong, and would require ἀλλά before οὐκέτι. The construction is one not without example, where the emphatic word is repeated in two parallel clauses, each time with δέ. Thus Eur. Iph. Taur. 1367, φιλεῖς δὲ καὶ σὺ τὸν κασίγνητον, θεός· φιλεῖν δὲ κἀμὲ τοὺς ὁμαίμονας δόκει: Xen. Cyr. vi. 2. 22, ἔνθα πολὺς μὲν οἶνος, πολλὰ δὲ σῖτος, πολὺ δὲ ἔλαιον, θάλαττα δὲ προσκλύζει. So that our second δέ is not 'sondern,—'not I, but,'—but aber, as the first—q. d. 'but the life is not mine,—but the life is Christ's within me.' Notice, not ὁ ἐν ἐμοὶ χρ.: Christ is the vine, we the branches: He lives, He, the same Christ, through and in every one of His believing ὑμᾶς has the emphasis—'YOU, to whom,' &c. ἐβάσκανεν] Not with Chr. al., 'envied,' in which sense the verb usually takes a dative: so Thom. Mag., βασκαίνω, οὐ μόνον ἀντὶ τοῦ φθονῶ, ὅπερ πρὸς δοτικὴν συντάσσεται, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀντὶ τοῦ μέμφομαι κ. διαβάλλω παρὰ τοῖς παλαιοῖς εὕρηται, κ. συντάσσεται πρὸς αἰτιατικήν (not always, cf. But this is quite irrelevant to the context. It is best therefore to keep to St. Paul's own meaning of προγράφειν, and understand it to refer to the time when he preached Christ among them, which he represents as a previous description in writing of Christ, in their hearts and before their eyes. Jerome, Hermann, al., understand it as above, 'olim scriptus est,' interpreting it, however, of the prophecies of the O. T. But not to mention that no prophecy sets Him forth as ἐσταυρωμένος, the whole passage (cf. vv. 2—5) evidently refers to the time when the Apostle preached among them. (See more in De W. and Meyer, from whom the above is mainly taken.) [The ἐν ὑμῖν of the rec. could hardly belong to ἐσταυρωμένος; for if so, it would more naturally be ἐσταυρ. ἐν ὑμῖν, the emphasis, as it now stands, being on ἐν ὑμῖν: but it must belong to προεγράφη, as above, and as in 2 Cor. iii. 2,—'in animis vestris.' So Mey. Among the various meanings proposed,—'among you' (E. V., &c., De W., Rück.), 'on account of you' (Koppe, but wrongly, see ch. i. 24, note),—Luther's is the most remarkable: "jam non solum abjecistis gratiam Dei, non solum Christus frustra vobis mortuus est, sed turpissime in vobis crucifixus est. Ad eum modum loquitur et Epistola ad Ebr. vi. 6: denuo crucifigentes sibimetipsis filium Dei, &c." This again is condemned by the context, and indeed by the aor. προεγράφη.] ἐσταυρωμένος, as expressing the whole mystery of redemption by grace, and of freedom from legal obligation. 'It has an echo of συνεσταύρωμαι in ch. ii. 20.' Jowett. 2.] τ. μόνον, — not to mention all the other grounds on which I might rest my argument, 'this only,' &c. διὰ συντόμου λόγου κ. ταχίστης ἀποδείξεως ὑμᾶς πεῖσαι βούλομαι. The first is preferable, because (1) where their first receiving the Gospel is in question, the preaching of it would probably be hinted at, as it is indeed taken up by the οὖν below, ver. 5: (2) where the question is concerning the power of faith as contrasted with the works of the law, faith would most likely be subjective. But certainly we must not understand it 'obedience' [ὑπακ. Rom. i. 5; xvi. 26. See 1 Kings xv. 22] to the faith,' as Wahl, al., which would spoil the contrast here)? 3.] Are ye so (to such an extent, emph.) foolish (as viz. the following fact would prove)? Having begun (see Phil. i. 6, where the same two verbs occur together, and 2 Cor. viii. 6, where προενήρξατο is followed by ἐπιτελέσῃ. Understand, 'the Christian life') in the Spirit (dative of the manner in which, reff. The Spirit, i. e. the Holy Spirit, guiding and ruling the spiritual life, as the 'essence and active principle' [Ellic.] of Christianity,—contrasted with the flesh,—the element in which the law worked), are ye now being completed (passive here, not mid., cf. Phil. i. 6, where the active is used: and for the passive, Luke xiii. 32. The middle does not appear to occur in the N. T., though it does in classical Greek, e. g. which the Galatians underwent at the time of their reception of the Gospel. And, I believe, rightly. For (a) πάσχω occurs (see reff.) seven times in St. Paul, and always in the strict sense of 'suffering,' by persecution, or hardship (similarly in Heb., 1 Pet., &c.): (b) the historic aorist here marks the reference to be to some definite time. Now the time referred to by the context is that of their conversion to the Gospel, cf. τὸ πν. ἐλάβετε,—ἐναρξάμενοι πνεύματι above. Therefore the meaning is, Did ye undergo all those sufferings (not specially mentioned in this Epistle, but which every convert to Christ must have undergone as a matter of course) in vain (Schomer first, and after him many, and Winer, B.-Crus., De Wette, understand παθεῖν here in a good sense, in reference to divine grace bestowed on them. But πάσχω seems never to be thus used in Greek without an indication in the context of such a meaning, e. g. εὖ πάσχειν, or as in Jos. Antt. iii. 15. 1, ὅσα παθόντες ἐξ αὐτοῦ κ. πηλικῶν εὐεργεσιῶν μεταλαβόντες, where the added clause defines the παθόντες; and never in N. T., LXX nor Apocrypha at all. (3) Bengel refers it to their patience with Paul [patientissime sustinuistis pertulistisque me]; but this, as Meyer remarks, would be expressed by ἀνέχειν, hardly by πάσχειν. (4) Meyer, to the troubles of their bondage introduced by the false and judaizing teachers. But not to dwell on other objections, it is decisive against this, (a) that it would thus be present, πάσχετε [see ch. iv. 10], not past at all, and (b) that even if it might be past, it must be the perfect and not the aorist. I therefore hold to (1); οὐ γὰρ ὑπὲρ τοῦ νόμου ἀλλ' ὑπὲρ τοῦ χριστοῦ τὰ παθήματα, Thdrt.: πάντα γὰρ ἐκεῖνα, φησίν, ἅπερ ὑπεμείνατε, ζημιῶσαι ὑμᾶς οὗτοι βούλονται, κ. τὸν στέφανον ὑμῶν ἁρπάσαι. Chrys. [So Ellic. ed. 2.] When Meyer says that this meaning is ganz isolirt vom Context, he is surely speaking at random: see above. [Ellic. ed. 1 took ἐπάθετε in a neutral sense, as applying to both persecutions and blessings, and nearly so Jowett: 'Had ye all these experiences in vain?' objecting to (1) that it is unlike the whole spirit of the Apostle. But we find surely a trace of the same spirit in Phil. i. 29, 30; as there suffering is represented as a special grace from Christ, so here it might well be said, 'let not such grace have been received in vain']) ? if it be really in vain (on εἴ γε καί, see note on 2 Cor. v. 3: the construction is, 'if, as it must be, what I have said, εἰκῇ, is really the fact.' The Commentators all take it as a supposition,—some, as Chr., &c., E. V., 'if it be yet in vain,' as a softening of εἰκῇ, others, as Meyer, De W., al., as an intensification of it, 'if it be only in vain [and not something worse]'). 5.] οὖν takes up again the question of ver. 2, and asks it in another form. There is a question whether the participles ἐπιχορηγῶν and ἐνεργῶν are present, referring to things done among them while the Apostle was writing, or imperfect, still spoken of the time when he was with them? Chrys., Thdrt., &c., and Bengel, al., maintain the latter: Luth., Calv., Rück., Meyer, De W., &c., the former. It seems to me, that this question must be settled by first determining who is the agent here spoken of. Is it the Apostle? or is it not rather GOD, and is not this indicated by the reference to Abraham's faith in the next verse, and the taking up the passive ἐλογίσθη by δικαιοῖ ὁ θεός in ver. 8? If it be so, then the participles here must be taken as present, but indefinite, in a substantive sense (Winer), as ὁ διώκων ἡμᾶς ποτέ, ch. i. 23. And certainly God alone can be said (and so in ref. 2 Cor.) ἐπιχορηγεῖν τὸ πνεῦμα, and ἐνεργεῖν (ch. ii. 8) δυνάμεις ἐν ὑμῖν (see below). ἐπιχορ.] The ἐπί does not imply addition, but as so often with prepositions of motion in composition, the direction of the supply: see notes on Acts xxvii. 7; Rom. viii. 16.

CH. III. 1—V. 12.] SECOND, or POLEMICAL PART OF THE EPISTLE. 1.] The Apostle exclaims indignantly, moved by the fervour and truth of his rebuke of Peter, against the folly of the Galatians, for suffering themselves to be bewitched out of their former vivid apprehension of Christ's work and Person. ἀνόητοι must not, with Jer., be taken as an allusion to any supposed national stupidity of the Galatians (Wetst. on ch. i. 6, cites from Themistius a very different description: οἱ ἄνδρες . . . ὀξεῖς κ. ἀγχίνοι κ. εὐμαθέστεροι τῶν ἄλλων Ἑλλήνων): it merely springs out of the occasion: see ref. Luke.

ness before God: and Scripture, in recording this, records also God's promise to him, by virtue of which all the faithful inherit his blessing. 6.] The reply to the foregoing question is understood: it is ἐξ ἀκοῆς πίστεως. And then enters the thought of God's ἐνεργεῖν as following upon Abraham's faith. The fact of justification being now introduced, whereas before the ἐπιχορηγεῖν τὸ πνεῦμα was the matter enquired of, is no real departure from the subject, for both these belong to the ἐνάρξασθαι of ver. 3,—are concomitant, and inseparable. On the verse, see note, Rom. iv. 3. 7.] γινώσκ. is better taken indicatively, with Jer., Ambr., Beza, Rück., al., than imperatively, with most Commentators (and Mey., De W., Olsh., Ellic.). It is no objection to the indicative that such knowledge could not well be predicated of the Galatians: it is not so predicated, but is here set before them as a thing which they ought to be acquainted with—from this then you know (q. d. 'omnibus patet.' The imperative seems to me to lose the fine edge of the Apostle's argumentative irony: besides that the usage of that mood with ἄρα is not frequent: indeed apparently only to be found in Homer; cf. Il. κ. 249; ω. 522. See on the other side, Ellicott's note here).

'is a God that justifieth') the Gentiles (observe, there is no stress here on τὰ ἔθνη,—it is not ἐκ πίστεως καὶ τὰ ἔθνη δικαιοῖ ὁ θ.: so that, as is remarked above, no question is raised between the carnal and spiritual seed of Abraham,—nor, as Bengel, 'δέ vim argumenti extendit etiam ad gentes:' the question is between those who were ἐκ πίστεως, and those who wanted to return to the ἔργα νόμου, whether Jews or Gentiles. by ver. 10 below. A share in Abraham's blessing must be the accompaniment of faith, not of works of the law.

πίστεως has the emphasis. σύν, to shew their community with him in the blessing: τῷ πιστῷ, to shew wherein the community consists, viz. FAITH.

10.] substantiation of ver. 9: they ἐξ ἔργων νόμου cannot be sharers in the blessing, for they are accursed; it being understood that they do not and cannot ἐμμένειν ἐν πᾶσιν &c.: see this expanded in Rom. iii. 9—20. The citation is freely from the LXX. On τοῦ ποιῆσαι, not a Hebraism, but a construction common in later Greek, see Ellic.'s note.

11, 12.] 'contain a perfect syllogism, so that ὁ δίκ. ἐκ πίστ. ζήσεται is the major proposition, ver. 12 the minor, and ἐν νόμῳ οὐδ. δικ. παρὰ τ. θεῷ the consequence.' Meyer. It is inserted to strengthen the inference of the former verse, by shewing that not even could a man keep the law, would he be justified—the condition of justification, as revealed in Scripture, being that it is by faith. But (=moreover) that in (not merely the elemental in, but the conditional as well: 'in and by:' not 'through') the law no man is justified (the normal present: is, in God's order of things) with God (not emphatic as Bengel, 'quicquid sit apud homines:' this would require οὐδεὶς παρὰ τῷ θεῷ δικαιοῦται: but δικαιοῦται-παρὰ-τῷ-θεῷ is simply predicated of οὐδείς) is evident, for (it is written, that) the just by faith shall live (not 'the just shall live by his faith,' as Winer, De W., al. The order of the words would indeed suggest this rendering, seeing that ὁ ἐκ π. δ. ζ. would properly represent the other: but we must regard St. Paul's logical use of the citation: and I think, with Meyer, that he has abstained from altering the order of the words as being well known. He is not seeking to shew by what the righteous shall live, but the ground itself of that righteousness which shall issue in life; and the contrast is between ὁ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεως and ὁ ποιήσας αὐτά. [It is right to say that Ellic. (both edd.) prefers the other rendering, and supports it by the fact that the original Hebrew will not bear this one, and that St. Paul adopts the words of the LXX as they stand; and by the contrast between ζήσεται ἐκ πίστεως, and ζήσεται ἐν αὐτοῖς. Jowett doubts whether ζήσεται could be used absolutely: but see Heb. xii. 9. I still however prefer rendering as above. The construction desiderated by Bp. Middleton to suit our rendering,—ὁ δίκαιος ὁ ἐκ π.,—would stultify the sentence, by bringing into view other δίκαιοι, who were not ἐκ πίστεως]): but (logical, introducing the minor of the syllogism: see above) the law (not 'law, as such,' Peile: no such consideration appears here, nor any where, except in so far as the law of Moses is treated of as possessing the qualities of law in general) is not of (does not spring from nor belong to: 'non agit fidei partes,' Beng.) faith: but (ſondern) (its nature is such that) he who has done them (viz. πάντα τὰ προστάγματά μου κ. π.

τὰ κρίματά μου of Levit. xviii. 5) shall live in (conditional element) them (see Rom. x. 5). 13.] But this curse has been removed by the redemption of Christ. The joyful contrast is introduced abruptly, without any connecting particle: see an asyndeton in a similar case in Col. iii. 4. The ἡμᾶς is emphatic, and applies solely to the JEWS. They only were under the curse of ver. 10,—and they being by Christ redeemed from that curse, the blessing of Abraham (justification by faith), which was always destined by God to flow through the Jews to the Gentiles, was set at liberty thus to flow out to the Gentiles. This, which is Meyer's view, is certainly the only one which suits the context. To make ἡμᾶς refer to Jews and Gentiles, and refer ἡ κατ. τοῦ νόμ. to the law of conscience, is to break up the context altogether. ἐξηγόρ.] See, besides reff., 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23; 2 Pet. ii. 1; Rev. v. 9. Ellicott remarks, 'the ἐξ- need not be very strongly pressed, see Polyb. iii. 42. 2, ἐξηγόρασε παρ' αὐτῶν τά τε μονόξυλα πλοῖα κ.τ.λ. . . . . The tendency,' he continues, 'to use verbs compounded with prepositions without any obvious increase of meaning, is one of the characteristics of later Greek: so Thiersch, de Pentat. vers. alex. ii. 1, p. 83.' The form of the idea is,—the Law (personified) held us (Jews) under its curse; (out of this) Christ bought us, BECOMING (emphatic, standing first) a curse (not ἐπικατάρατος, concrete, but κατάρα, abstract, to express that he became not only accursed, but the curse, coextensive with the disability which affected us) for us (the JEWS again. Not, as many older Commentators, and Rück., Olsh., Peile, &c., 'instead of us,' but 'on our behalf.' It was in our stead; but that circumstance is not expressed by ὑπέρ used of Christ's death for us—see reff. and Ellic.'s note; and Usteri, Paulin. Lehrbegriff, p. 115 ff.). ὅτι γέγρ. κ.τ.λ. is a parenthesis, justifying the formal expression γενόμ. ὑπ. ἡμ. κατάρα. The citation omits the words ὑπὸ θεοῦ of the LXX. They were not to the point here, being understood as matter of course, the law being God's law. The article ὁ is not in the LXX. The words are spoken of hanging after death by stoning; and are given in l. c. as a reason why the body should not remain on the tree all night, because one hanging on a tree is accursed of God. Such formal curse then extended to Christ, who died by hanging on a tree.

14.] in order that (the intent of γενόμ. ὑπ. ἡμ. κατάρα) the blessing of Abraham (promised to Abraham: i. e. justification by faith; ver. 9) might be (come) upon the Gentiles (not, all nations, but strictly the Gentiles: see above on ver. 13) in (in and by, conditional element) Jesus the Christ, that (ἵνα, parallel with, not dependent on and included in, the former ἵνα: for this clause has no longer to do with τὰ ἔθνη, see below. We have a second ἵνα co-ordinate with a first in Rom. vii. 13; 2 Cor. ix. 3; Eph. vi. 19, 20) we (not emphatic, nor is ἡμεῖς expressed: no longer the Jews, as Beza and Bengel, but all Christians: see Jowett's note, which perhaps is too finely drawn) might receive (in full, as fulfilled, aor.) through the (or, but not so usually, our) faith (as the subjective medium: but rendered objective by the article, as so often by St. Paul: no stress on διὰ τ. π.) the promise of the Spirit (viz. that made Joel ii. 28. See Acts ii. 17, 33; Luke xxiv. 49,—THE PROMISE of the new covenant). The genitive τοῦ πν. is objective,—the Spirit being the thing promised. But let me guard tiros against the old absurdity, "ἐπαγγελία τοῦ πνεύματος pro τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἐπηγγελμένον," which would destroy, here and every where else, the logical form of the sentence. This 'receiving the promise of the Spirit' distinctly refers back to ver. 2, where he asked them whether they received the

On the general meaning, see Mr. Bagge's note) when ratified (reff.), no one notwithstanding (that it is merely a human covenant) sets aside or supplements (with new conditions, Jos. Antt. xvii. 9. 4 describes Archelaus as ὁ ἐν ταῖς ἐπιδιαθήκαις ὑπὸ τοῦ πατρὸς ἐγγεγραμμένος βασιλεύς,—'in his father's subsequent testament:' and again says of Antipas, B. J. ii. 2. 3, ἀξιῶν τῆς ἐπιδιαθήκης τὴν διαθήκην εἶναι κυριωτέραν, ἐν ᾗ βασιλεὺς αὐτὸς ἐγέγραπτο. Nothing is implied as to the nature of the additions, whether consistent or inconsistent with the original covenant: the simple fact that no additions are made, is enounced). 16.] This verse is not, as commonly supposed, the minor proposition of the syllogism, applying to Abraham's case the general truth enounced in ver. 15: for had it been so, (1) we should certainly find ὑπὸ θεοῦ contrasted with the ἀνθρώπου before, and (2) the parenthesis οὐ λέγει . . . . χριστός would be a mere irrelevant digression. This minor proposition does not follow till ver. 17. What is now said, in a parenthetical and subsidiary manner, is this: The covenant was not merely nor principally made with Abraham, but with Abraham and HIS SEED, and that seed referred, not to the Jewish people, but to CHRIST. The covenant then was not fulfilled, but awaiting its fulfilment, and He to whom it was made was yet to appear, when the law was given. αἱ ἐπ.] because the promise was many times repeated: e.g. Gen. xii. 7; xv. 5, 18; xvii. 7, 8; xxii. 18.

κ. τῷ σπ. αὐ.] These words, on which, from what follows, the stress of the whole argument rests, are probably meant to be a formal quotation. If so, the promises quoted must be Gen. xiii. 15; xvii. 8 [Jowett supposes xxi. 12, but qu. ?], where the words occur as here.

οὐ λέγει] viz. He who gave the promises —God. ἐπὶ πολ., ἐφ' ἑνός] of one, of many, as E. V. Plato has very nearly this usage, βούλομαι δέ μοι μὴ ἐπὶ θεῶν (de diis) λέγεσθαι τὸ τοιοῦτον, Legg. p. 662 d. See also Rep. 524 e. Cf. Ellic.'s note. τοῖς σπέρμασιν . . . τῷ σπέρματι.] The central point of the Apostle's argument is this: The seed to whom the promises were made, was Christ. To confirm this position,—see Gen. xxii. 17, 18, where the collective σπέρμα of ver. 17 is summed up in the individual σπέρμα of ver. 18, he alleges a philological distinction, recognized by the Rabbinical schools (see Wetst. and Schöttgen ad loc.). This has created considerable difficulty: and all sorts of attempts have been made to evade the argument, or to escape standing committed to the distinction. Jerome (ad loc.), curiously and characteristically, applies the κατὰ ἄνθρωτον λέγω to this distinction especially, and thinks that the Apostle used it as adapted to the calibre of those to whom he was writing: "Galatis, quos paulo ante stultos dixerat, factus est stultus." The Roman-Catholic Windischmann, one of the ablest and most sensible of modern expositors, says, "Our recent masters of theology have taken up the objection, which is as old as Jerome, and forgetting that Paul knew Hebrew better than themselves, have severely blamed him for urging the singular σπέρματι here, and thus justifying the application to Christ, seeing that the word זֶרַע, which occurs here in the Hebrew text, has no plural (Wind. is not accurate here: the plur. זְרָעִים is found 1 Sam. viii. 15, in the sense of 'grains of wheat'), and so could not be used. Yet they are good enough to assume, that Paul had no fraudulent intent, and only followed the arbitrary exegesis of the Jews of his time (Rückert). The argument of the Apostle does not depend on the grammatical form, by which Paul here only puts forth his meaning in Greek,—but on this, that the Spirit of God in the promise to Abraham and the passage of Scripture relating that promise, has chosen a word which implies a collective unity, and that the promise was not given to Abraham and his children. Against the prejudice of the carnal Jews, who held that the promise applied to the plurality of them, the individual descendants of the Patriarch, as such,—the Apostle maintains the truth, that only the Unity, Christ, with those who are incorporated in Him, has part in the inheritance." On these remarks I would observe, (1) that the Apostle's argument is independent of his philology: (2) that his philological distinction must not be pressed to mean more than he himself intended by it: (3) that the collective and individual meanings of σπέρμα are both undoubted, and must have been evident to the Apostle himself, from what follows, ver. 29. We are now in a position to interpret the words ὅς ἐστιν χριστός. Meyer says 'χριστός is the personal Christ Jesus, not, as has been held (after Aug.), Christ and His Church.' This remark is true, and untrue. χρ. certainly does not mean 'Christ and His Church:' but if it imports only the personal Christ Jesus, why is it not so expressed, χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν? For the word does not here occur in passing, but is the predicate of a very definite and important proposition. The fact is, that we must place ourselves in St. Paul's position with regard to the idea of Christ, before we can appreciate all he meant by this word here. Christians are, not by a figure, but really, the BODY OF CHRIST: Christ contains His people, and the mention even of the personal Christ would bring with it, in the Apostle's mind, the inclusion of His believing people. This seed is, CHRIST: not merely in the narrower sense, the man Christ Jesus, but Christ the Seed, Christ the Second Adam, Christ the Head of the Body. And that this is so, is plain from vv. 28, 29, which are the key to ὅς ἐστιν χριστός: where he says, πάντες γὰρ ὑμεῖς ΕΙ῾Σ ἐστε ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ (notice Ἰησοῦ here carefully inserted, where the Person is indicated). εἰ δὲ ὑμεῖς χριστοῦ, ἄρα τοῦ Ἀβραὰμ ΣΠΕΡΜΑ ἐΣΤΕ, κατ' ἐπαγγελίαν κληρονόμοι. So that while it is necessary for the form of the argument here, to express Him to whom the promises were made, and not the aggregate of his people, afterwards to be identified with Him (but not here in view), yet the Apostle has introduced His name in a form not circumscribing His Personality, but leaving room for the inclusion of His mystical Body.

17.] Enthymematical inference from vv. 15, 16, put in the form of a restatement of the argument, as applying to the matters in hand. This however I say (this is my meaning, the drift of my previous statement): the covenant (better than a covenant, as most Commentators; even Meyer and De W.: the emphatic substantive is often anarthrous: cf. the different arrangement in ver. 15) which was previously ratified by God (εἰς χρ. being inserted by some to complete the correspondence with ver. 16: the fact was so, it was 'to Christ,' as its second party, that the covenant was ratified by God), the Law, which took place (was constituted) four hundred and thirty years after, does not abrogate, so as to do away the promise. As regards the interval of 430 years, we may remark, that in Exod. xii. 40, it is stated, "The sojourning of the children of Israel who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years." (In Gen. xv. 13, Acts vii. 6, the period of the oppression of Israel in Egypt is roundly stated at 400 years.) But to this, in order to obtain the entire interval between the covenant with Abraham and the law, must be added the sojourning of the patriarchs in Canaan,—i. e. to the birth of Isaac, 25 years (Gen. xii. 4; xxi. 5),—to that of Jacob, 60 more (Gen. xxv. 26),—to his going down into Egypt, 130 more (Gen. xlvii. 9); in all = 215 years. So that the time really was 645 years, not 430. But in the LXX (and Samaritan Pentateuch) we read, Exod. xii. 40, ἡ δὲ κατοίκησις (παροίκ., F.) τῶν υἱῶν Ἰσραὴλ, ἣν κατῴκησαν (παροίκ., F.) ἐν γῇ Αἰγύπτῳ καὶ ἐν γῇ Χαναάν (F. adding, from the Cod. Alex., αὐτοὶ καὶ οἱ πατέρες αὐτῶν) ἔτη τετρακόσια τριάκοντα: — and this reckoning St. Paul has followed. We have instances of a similar adoption of the LXX text, in the apology of Stephen: see Acts vii. 14, and note. After all, however, the difficulty lies in the 400 years of Gen. xv. 13 and Acts vii. 6. For we may ascertain thus the period of the sojourn of Israel in Egypt: Joseph was 39 years old when Jacob came into Egypt (Gen. xli. 46, 47; xlv. 6): therefore he was born when Jacob was 91 (91 + 39 = 130: see Gen. xlvii. 9). But he was born 6 years before Jacob left Laban (compare ib. xxx. 25 with xxxi. 41), having been with him 20 years (ib. xxxi. 38, 41), and served him 14 of them for his two daughters (xxxi. 41). Hence, seeing that his marriage with Rachel took place when he was 78 [91—20—7; the marriages with Leah and Rachel being contemporaneous, and the second seven years of service occurring after, not, as I assumed in the first edition, before, the marriage with Rachel]; Levi, the third son of Leah, whose first son was born after Rachel's marriage [xxix. 30—32], must have been born not earlier than Jacob's 81st year,—and consequently was about 49 [130—81] when he went down into Egypt. Now (Exod. vi. 16) Levi lived in all 137 years: i. e., about 88 [137—49] years in Egypt. But (Exod. vi. 16, 18, 20) Amram, father of Moses and Aaron, married his father Kohath's sister, Jochebed, who was therefore, as expressly stated Num. xxvi. 59, 'the daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi in Egypt.' Therefore Jochebed must have been born within 88 years after the going down into Egypt. And seeing that Moses was 80 years old at the Exodus (Exod. vii. 7),—if we call x his mother's age when he was born, we have 88 + 80 + x as a maximum for the sojourn in Egypt, which clearly therefore cannot be 430 years, or even 400; as in the former case x would = 262,—in the latter 232. If we take x = cir. 47 (to which might be added in the hypothesis any time which 88 and x might have had in common) we shall have the sojourn in Egypt = 215 years, which added to the previous 215, will make the required 430. Thus it will appear that the LXX, Samaritan Pent., and St. Paul, have the right chronology,—and as stated above, the difficulty lies in Gen. xv. 13 and Acts vii. 6,—and in the Hebrew text of Exod. xii. 40. 18.] See Rom. iv. 14. For if the inheritance (the general term for all the blessings promised to Abraham, as summed up in his Seed who was to inherit the land,—in other words, for the Kingdom of Christ: see 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10) is of the law (i. e. by virtue of the law, having as its ground the covenant of the law) it is no more (οὐκ ἔτι, as νῦν in argumentative passages, not of time, but logical—the οὐκ follows on the hypothesis) of (by virtue of) promise: but (the 'but' of a demonstration, appealing to a well-known fact) to Abraham by promise hath God granted [it] (and therefore it is not of the Law). 19—24.] The use and nature of the Law. What (ref.) then [is] the Law ('ubi audimus Legem nihil valere ad conferendam justitiam, statim obrepunt variæ cogitationes: aut igitur esse inutilem, aut contrariam fœderi Dei, aut tale quippiam.' Calv.) For the sake of the transgressions [of it] (the words τῶν παραβάσεων χάριν have been variously understood. (1) Aug., Calv., Beza, Luth., al., explain it of the detection of transgressions, as in Rom. vii. (2) Chrys., Œc., Thl., Jer., Erasm., Grot., Rück., Olsh., B.-Crus., De Wette, al., of their repression; μὴ ἐξῇ Ἰουδαίοις ἁδεῶς ζῆν . . . . ἀλλ' ἀντὶ χαλινοῦ ὁ νόμος αὐτοῖς ἐπικείμενος ᾖ, παιδεύων, ῥυθμίζων, κωλύων παραβαίνειν. Chrys. (3) Luth., Est., Bengel, al., combine (1) and (2). But it is hardly possible that either of these should be the true explanation. For the Apostle is not now treating of the detection of sin, or of the repression of sin [which latter was besides not the office of the Law, see Rom. v. 20], but of the Law as a preparation for Christ, vv. 23, 24: and therefore it must be regarded in its propædeutic office, not in its detective or (?) repressive. Now this propædeutic office was, to make sin into TRANSGRESSION,—so that what was before not a transgression might now become one. The law then was added [to the promise, which had no such power], for the sake of [in order to bring about as transgressions] the transgressions [of it] which should be, and thus [ver. 23] to shut us up under sin, viz. the transgression of the law. This is nearly Meyer's view, except that he makes this the exclusive meaning of χάριν, which usage will not sustain, cf. 1 John iii. 12. Ellic.'s view is very close to mine, which he has mistaken) it was superadded ("προσετέθη does not contradict the assertion of ver. 15, οὐδεὶς . . . . ἐπιδιατάσσεται. For the Law was not given as an ἐπιδιαθήκη, but came in as another institution, additional to that already existing." Meyer) until the seed shall have come (he places himself at the giving of the law and looks on into the future: hence the subjunctive, not the optative: and without ἄν, because the time is a certain and definite one), to whom (ver. 16) the promise has been (see above) made (the vulgate renders ἐπήγγελται promiserat, sc. Deus: and so Bengel prefers, from reff. active. But the passive suits ver. 16 [ἐῤῥέθησαν] better, and is justified by reff. Macc. Bretschneider understands it cui demandatum est, viz. to put an end to the law: but this is against N. T. usage of ἐπαγγέλλω, and absurd, where ἐπαγγελία is so often used in the context. This Seed is of course Christ), being enjoined (the aorist participle does not here denote previous occurrence, but is merely part of an aorist sentence: so Herod. i. 14, Γύγης δὲ τυραννεύσας ἀνέπεμψε ἀναθήματα . . .: Diod. Sic. xi. 31, γενναίως ἀγωνισάμενος πολλοὺς ἀνεῖλε τῶν Ἑλλήνων. See Hermann on Viger, pp. 772-3. For διατάσσω, cf. note on Acts vii. 53, and Hesiod, Op. 274, τόνδε γὰρ ἀνθρώποισι νόμον διέταξε Κρονίων: it is not promulgate, as Winer) by means of (not, under the attestation of, as Peile, nor in the presence of, as Calov., al.) angels (angels were, according to the Rabbinical view, the enactors and enjoiners of the Law: so Jos. Antt. xv. 5. 3, ἡμῶν τὰ κάλλιστα τῶν δογμάτων κ. τὰ ὁσιώτατα τῶν ἐν τοῖς νόμοις δι' ἀγγέλων παρὰ τοῦ θεοῦ μαθόντων: see also the citations in Wetst.: Heb. ii. 2; and note on Col. ii. 15. Of course no explaining away of ἄγγελοι into men [Moses, Aaron, &c.] as Chrys. [altern.: ἢ τοὺς ἱερέας ἀγγέλους λέγει, ἢ καὶ αὐτοὺς τοὺς ἀγγέλους ὑπηρετήσασθαί φησι τῇ νομοθεσίᾳ], al., can be allowed. Observe, the angels are not the givers of the Law, but its ministers, and instrumental enactors: the Law, with St. Paul, is always God's Law; see especially Rom. vii. 22) in the hand of a mediator (viz. MOSES, who came from God to the people with the tables of the law in his hands. Cf. his own words, Deut. v. 5, κἀγὼ εἱστήκειν ἀναμέσον κυρίου κ. ὑμῶν ἐν τῷ καιρῷ ἐκείνῳ ἀναγγεῖλαι ὑμῖν τὰ ῥήματα κυρίου, ὅτι ἐφοβήθητε ἀπὸ προσώπου τοῦ πυρὸς κ. οὐκ ἀνέβητε εἰς τὸ ὄρος, λέγων . . .: Philo, vit. the name Mediator is given to Moses.—But most of the Fathers (not Thdrt.), Bede, Lyra, Calvin, Calov., al., understand Christ to be meant: Schmieder and Schneckenburger, the Angel of the Covenant,—the Metatron. Neither of these interpretations however will hold against the above evidence). Why does the Apostle add this last clause? I am inclined to think with Meyer that it is,—not to disparage the Law in comparison with the Gospel (as Luth., Elsn., Flatt, Rück., Jowett, &c. &c.) or with the promise (Estius, Schneckenb., De Wette), but to enhance the solemnity of the giving of the law as a preparation for Christ, in answer to the somewhat disparaging question τί οὖν ὁ νόμος; If the δι' ἀγγέλων had been here disparaging, as in Heb. ii. 2, διὰ τοῦ κυρίου or the like must have been expressed, as there, on the other side. And ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου is certainly no disparagement of the old covenant in comparison with the new, for this it has in common with the other. The fact is (see below on ver. 20), that no such comparison is in question here. 20.] "The explanations of this verse, so obscure from its brevity, are so numerous (Winer counted 250: Jowett mentions 430) that they require a bibliography of their own." De Wette. I believe we shall best disentangle the sense as follows. (1) Clearly, ὁ μεσίτης and ὁ θεὸς are opposed. (2) As clearly, ἑνὸς οὐκ ἔστιν and εἷς ἐστιν are opposed. (3) From this contrast arises an apparent opposition between the law and the promises of God, which (not alone, but as the conclusion of the whole τί οὖν to εἷς ἐστιν) gives occasion to the question of ver. 21. Taking up therefore again (1),—ὁ μεσίτης, by whose hand the law was enacted, stands opposed to ὁ θεὸς, the giver of the promises. And that, in this respect (2);—(a) ὁ μεσίτης is not ἑνός, but (b) ὁ θεὸς is εἷς. And herein lies the knot of the verse; that is, in (b), – for the meaning of (a) is pretty clear on all hands; viz. that ὁ μεσίτης (generic, so ref. Job; 'quæ multa sunt cunctis in unum colligendis,' Hermann ad Iph. in Aul. p. 15, præf. cited by Meyer) does not belong to one party (masculine) (but to two, as going between one party and another). Then to guide us to the meaning of (b), we must remember, that the numerical contrast is the primary idea: ὁ μεσίτης belongs not to one, but ὁ θεὸς is one. Shall we then say, that all reference of εἷς (as applied to ὁ θεὸς) beyond this numerical one is to be repudiated? I cannot think so. The proposition ὁ θεὸς εἷς ἐστιν would carry to the mind of every reader much more than the mere numerical unity of God—viz. His Unity as an essential attribute, extending through the whole divine Character. And thus, though the proposition ὁ μεσίτης ἑνὸς οὐκ ἔστιν would not, by itself, convey any meaning but that a mediator belongs to more than one, it would, when combined with ὁ θεὸς εἷς ἐστιν, receive a shade of meaning which it did not bear before,—of a state of things involved in the fact of a μεσίτης being employed, which was not according to the ἑνότης of God, or, so to speak, in the main track of His unchanging purpose. And thus (3), the law, administered by the μεσίτης, belonging to a state of οὐχ εἷς, two at variance, is apparently opposed to the ἐπαγγελίαι, belonging entirely to ὁ εἷς, the one (faithful) God. And observe, that the above explanation is deduced entirely from the form of the sentence itself, and from the idea which the expression ὁ θεὸς εἷς ἐστιν must necessarily raise in the mind of its reader, accustomed to the proposition as the foundation of the faith;—not from any preconceived view, to suit which the words, or emphatic arrangement, must be forced. Notice by the way, that the objection, that the Gospel too is ἐν χειρὶ μεσίτου, does not apply here: for (α) there is no question here of the Gospel, but only of the promises, as direct from God: (β) the μεσίτης of the Gospel is altogether different, and His work different: He has absolutely reconciled the parties at variance, and MADE THEM ONE in Himself. Remember St. Paul's habit of insulating the matter in hand, and dealing with it irrespective of all such possible objections. To give even an analysis of the various opinions on this verse would far exceed the limits of this commentary: I will only take advantage of Meyer's long note, and of other sources, to indicate the main branches of the exegesis. (I) The Fathers, for the most part, pass lightly over it, as easy in itself,—and do not notice its pragmatic difficulty. Most of them understand by the μεσίτης, Christ, the mediator between God and man. In interpreting ἑνὸς οὐκ ἔστιν and εἷς ἐστιν, they go in omnia alia. It may suffice to quote one or two samples. Chrys. says, τί ἂν ἐνταῦθα εἴποιεν αἱρετικοί; εἰ γὰρ τὸ "μόνος ἀληθεινός," οὐκ ἀφίησι τὸν υἱὸν εἶναι θεὸν ἀληθινόν, οὐκ ἄρα οὐδὲ θεόν, διὰ τὸ λέγεσθαι "ὁ δὲ θεὸς εἷς ἐστιν." ..... ὁ δὲ μεσίτης, φησί, δύο τινῶν γίνεται μεσίτης. τίνος οὖν μεσίτης ἦν ὁ χριστός; ἢ δῆλον ὅτι θεοῦ κ. ἀνθρώπων; ὁρᾷς πῶς δείκνυσιν ὅτι καὶ τὸν νόμον αὐτὸς ἔδωκεν; εἰ τοίνυν αὐτὸς ἔδωκε, κύριος ἂν εἴη καὶ λῦσαι πάλιν. And Jerome, 'manu mediatoris potentiam et virtutem ejus debemus accipere, qui cum secundum Deum unum sit ipse cum patre, secundum mediatoris officium alius ab eo intelligitur.' Theodoret, having explained the μεσίτης of Moses, proceeds, on ὁ δὲ θεὸς εἷς ἐστιν,—ὁ καὶ τὴν ἐπαγγελίαν τῷ Ἀβραὰμ δεδωκώς, καὶ τὸν νόμον τεθεικώς, καὶ οὐν τῆς ἐπαγγελίας ἡμῖν ἐπιδείξας τὸ πέρας. οὐ γὰρ ἄλλος μὲν ἐκεῖνα θεὸς φκονόμησεν, ἄλλος δὲ ταῦτα. (II) The older of the modern Commentators are generally quite at fault: I give a few of them: Grotius says, 'Etsi Christus mediator Legem Judæis tulerit, ut ad agnitionem transgressionum adduceret, eoque ad fœdus gratiæ præpararet, non tamen unius est gentis Judaicæ mediator, sed omnium hominum: quemadmodum Deus unus est omnium.' Luther (1519), 'Ex nomine mediatoris concludit, nos adeo esse peccatores, ut legis opera satis esse nequeant. Si, inquit, lege justi estis, jam mediatore non egetis, sed neque Deus, cum sit ipse unus, secum optime conveniens. Inter duos ergo quæritur mediator, inter Deum et hominem; ac si dicat, impiissima est ingratitudo, si mediatorem rejicitis, et Deo, qui unus est, remittitis, &c.' Erasmus, in his paraphrase: 'Atqui conciliator, qui intercedit, inter plures intercedat oportet, nemo enim secum ipse dissidet. Deus autem unus est, quocum dissidium erat humano generi. Proinde tertio quopiam erat opus, qui naturæ utriusque particeps utramque inter sese reconciliaret, &c.' Calvin, as the preferable view, 'diversitatem hic notari arbitror inter Judæos et Gentiles. Non unius ergo mediator est Christus, quia diversa est conditio eorum quibuscum Deus, ipsius auspiciis, paciscitur, quod ad externam personam. Verum Paulus inde æstimandum Dei fœdus negat, quasi secum pugnet, aut varium sit pro hominum diversitate.' (III) The later moderns begin to approach nearer to the philological and contextual requirements of the passage, but still with considerable errors and divergences. Bengel, on the first clause, 'Medius terminus est in syllogismo, cujus major propositio et minor exprimitur, conclusio subauditur. Unus non utitur mediatore illo: atqui Deus est unus. Ergo Deus non prius sine mediatore, deinde per mediatorem egit. Ergo is cujus erat mediator non est unus idemque cum Deo sed diversus a Deo, nempe ὁ νόμος, Lex..... ergo mediator Sinaiticus non est Dei sed legis: Dei autem, promissio.' Locke (so also Michaelis): "God is but one of the parties concerned in the promise: the Gentiles and Israelites together made up the other, ver. 14. But Moses, at the giving of the law, was a mediator only between the Israelites and God: and therefore could not transact any thing to the disannulling the promise, which was between God and the Israelites and Gentiles together, because God was but one of the parties to that covenant: the other, which was the Gentiles as well as Israelites, Moses appeared or transacted not for." (IV) Of the recent Commentators, Keil (Opusc. 1809—12) says: 'Mediatorem quidem non unius sed duarum certe partium esse, Deum autem qui Abrahamo beneficii aliquid promiserit, unum modo fuisse: hincque apostolum id a lectoribus suis colligi voluisse, in lege ista Mosaica pactum mutuum Deum inter atque populum Israeliticum mediatoris opera intercedente initum fuisse, contra vero in promissione rem ab unius tantum (Dei sc. qui solus eam dederit) voluntate pendentem transactam,—hincque legi isti nihil plane cum hac rei fuisse, adeoque nec potuisse ea novam illius promissionis implendæ conditionem constitui, eoque ipso promissionem omnino tolli.' And similarly Schleiermacher (in Usteri's Lehrbegriff, p. 186 ff.), but giving to εἷς the sense of freedom and independence;—and Meyer, only repudiating the second part of Keil's explanation from 'hincque,' as not belonging to an abstract sentence like this, but being historical, as if it had been ἦν, and besides contrary to the Apostle's meaning, who deduces from our verse a consequence the contrary to this ('hincque ..... fuisse'), and obviates it by the question in ver. 21. For the numerous other recent interpretations and their refutations I must refer the reader to Meyer's note [as also to Ellicott's (in his ed. 1: see his present view in his ed. 2), who preferred Windischmann's interpretation of εἷς, 'One, because He was both giver and receiver united: giver, as the Father; receiver, as the Son, the σπέρμα ᾧ ἐπήγγελται.' But this seems going too deep—almost, we may say, arriving at the conclusion by a coup de main, which would not have borne any meaning to the readers]: see also Jowett's note, which seems to me further to complicate the matter by introducing into it God's unity of dealing with man, and man's unity with God in Christ. (V) We may profitably lay down one or two canons of interpretation of the verse. (α) Every interpretation is wrong, which understands Christ by ὁ μεσίτης. The context determines it to be abstract, and its reference to be to Moses, the mediator of the Law. (β) Every interpretation is wrong, which makes εἷς mean 'one party' in the covenant. ὁ θεὸς εἷς ἐστιν itself confutes any such view, being a well-known general proposition, not admitting of a concrete interpretation. (γ) Every interpretation is wrong, which confines εἷς (as Meyer) to its mere numerical meaning, and does not take into account the ideas which the general proposition would raise. (δ) Every interpretation is wrong, which deduces from the verse the agreement of the law with the promises: because the Apostle himself, in the next verse, draws the very opposite inference from it, and refutes it on other grounds. (ε) Every attempt to set aside the verse as a gloss is utterly futile.

21.] The Law being thus set over against the promises,—being given through a mediator between two,—the promises by the one God,—it might seem as if there were an inconsistency between them. The nature of the contrariety must not (as De W.) be deduced from the following disproof of it: this disproof proceeds on τῶν παραβάσεων χάριν προστέθη, which is not the ground of the apparent contrariety, but its explanation. The appearance of inconsistency lay in the whole paragraph preceding—the οὐκ ἀκυροῖ of ver. 17, the εἰ ἐκ νόμου, οὐκέτι ἐξ ἐπαγγελίας of ver. 18,—and the contrast between the giving of the two in ver. 20. "τοῦ θεοῦ is not without emphasis: the promises which rest immediately on God, and were attested (? sic still in ed. 2) by no mediator." Ellic. εἰ γάρ] Notwithstanding all the above features of contrast between the Law and the prophets, it is not against them, for it does not pretend to perform the same office; if it did, then there would be this rivalry, which now does not exist. νόμος ὁ δυν. is best expressed in English, as in E. V., a law which could . . . . . for the article circumscribes the νόμος to some particular quality indicated in the defining participle which follows: see reff. Peile's rendering, "if that which (ὁ δυνάμενος!) should have power to give life had been given in the form of law," is in the highest degree ungrammatical. ζωοποιῆσαι takes for granted that we by nature are dead in trespasses and sins. ὄντως has the emphasis: in very truth, and not only in the fancy of some, by the law (as its ground) would have been righteousness (which is the condition of life eternal,—ὁ δίκαιος . . . . ζήσεται. If life, the result, had been given by the law, then righteousness, the condition of life, must have been by it also: reasoning from the whole to its part). 22.] But on the contrary (ἀλλά, not δέ: comp. Ellic. This not being the case,—no law being given out of which could come righteousness) the Scripture (not the Law, as Chrys. and most of the Fathers, also Calv., Beza, al.; but as in ver. 8, the Author of Scripture, speaking by that His witness) shut up (not subjective, as Chrys., ἤλεγξεν . . . . κ. ἐλέγξας κατεῖχεν ἐν φόβῳ,—for it is their objective state of incapacity to attain righteousness which is here brought out: —nor 'conclusit omnes simul,' as Bengel, al.: the preposition enhances the force of κλείειν, as in 'contraho,' συμπίγειν, &c.: see note Rom. xi. 32, where the same expression occurs. "The word συγκλείειν is beautifully chosen, to set off more clearly the idea of Christian freedom by and by." Windischmann: cf. ch. v. 1. Nor has

The words ἐκ πίστ. cannot well be taken with δοθῇ without harshness, especially as Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ intervenes, and τοῖς πιστεύουσιν is already expressed. Besides, in this case they would most naturally come first,—ἵνα ἐκ πίστεως Ἰ. χρ. ἡ ἐπαγγ. δοθῇ τ. π.) might be given (be a free gift—δοθῇ has the emphasis) to them that believe (δοθῇ having the emphasis, τοῖς πιστ. does no more than take up ἐκ πίστ. above; q. d. 23.] But (δέ carries us on to a further account of the rationale and office of the law. "When the noun, to which the particle is attached, is preceded by a preposition, and perhaps the article as well, δέ may stand the third or fourth word in the sentence. So ἐν τοῖς πρῶτοι δὲ Ἀθηναῖοι, Thuc. i. 6: οὐχ ὑπὸ ἐραστοῦ δέ, Plat. Phædr. 227 d, &c." Hartung, Partikell. i. 190) before (this) faith (not, the faith, in the sense of the objects of faith, but the faith just mentioned, viz. πίστις Ἰησοῦ χρ., which did not exist until Christ) came (was found, or was possible, in men: cf. ref., where however it is more entirely subjective), we (properly, we Jewish believers—but not here to be pressed, because he is speaking of the divine dealings with men generally—the Law was for τὰ πάντα, the only revelation) were kept in ward (not simply 'kept' as E. V., but as Chrys., ὥσπερ ἐν τειχίῳ τινί,—though not as he proceeds, τῷ φόβῳ κατεχόμενοι—for, as above, our objective state is here treated of: see Rom. vii. 6. But we must not yet, with Chrys., al., introduce the παιδαγωγός, or understand ἐφρουρ. as conveying the idea of 'safely kept' [οὐδὲν ἕτερον δηλοῦντός ἐστιν, ἢ τὴν ἐκ τῶν ἐντολῶν τοῦ νόμου γενομένην ἀσφάλειαν]: συγκλειόμενοι is quite against this, and the pædagogic figure does not enter till the next verse, springing out of the preparation implied in εἰς, joined to the fact of our sonship, see below. Our present verse answers to ch. iv. 2, where we find ἐπίτροπους and οἰκονόμους, not the παιδαγωγός. See Jowett's beautiful illustration), shut up under the law, in order to (εἰς of the preparatory design, not merely of the result, or the arrival of the time: and it may belong either to συγκλειόμ. [not to συγκεκλεισμένοι, if that be read, as that would betoken the act completed when the Law was given], or to the imperfect ἐφρουρούμεθα) the faith (as in ver. 22) about to be revealed (on the order of the words see on ref. Rom. "As long as there was no such thing as faith in Christ, this faith was not yet revealed, was as yet an element of life hidden in the counsel of God." Meyer). 24.] So that (taking up the condition in which the last verse left us, and adding to it the fact that we are the SONS of God, cf. γάρ, ver. 26) the Law has become (has turned out to be) our tutor (pedagogue, see below) unto (ethically; for) Christ (the παιδαγωγός was a faithful slave, entrusted with the care of the boy from his tender years till puberty, to keep him from evil physical and moral, and accompany him to his amusements and studies. ing fully: but it disturbs the sense less than those have done, who have selected one portion only of the pedagogue's duty, and understood by it, 'the slave who leads a child to the house of the school-master' [οἷόν τινι σοφῷ διδασκάλῳ προσφέρει τῷ δεσπότῃ χριστῷ, Thdrt.: so also Thl.: see Suicer, νόμος, b], thus making Christ the schoolmaster, which is inconsistent with the imagery. On the contrary, the whole schoolmaster's work is included in the παιδαγωγός, and Christ represents the ἐλευθερία of the grown-up son, in which he is no longer guarded or shut up, but justified by faith, the act of a free man; and to Christ as a Teacher there is here no allusion), in order that by faith we might be justified (which could only be done when Christ had come): but (adversative) now that the faith (see above) has come, we are no longer under a tutor (pedagogue). 26.] Reason of the negation in last verse. For ye all (Jews and Gentiles alike) are SONS (no longer παῖδες, requiring a παιδαγωγός) of God by means of the (or, but not so well, your) faith in Christ Jesus (some [Usteri, Windisch., al.] would join ἐν χρ. Ἰησ. with υἱοὶ θεοῦ ἐστε, but most unnaturally,—and unmeaningly, for the idea of ἐν χρ. Ἰησ. in that case has been already given by διὰ τῆς πίστεως. The omission of τῆς before ἐν will stagger no one: see Col. i. 4, where the same expression occurs). 27.] For (substantiates and explains the assertion of ver. 26: see below) as many of you as were baptised into (see Rom. vi. 3 and notes) Christ, put on Christ (at that time, compare the aorists in Acts xix. 2: not "have been baptized," and "have put on," as E. V., which leaves the two actions only concomitant: the aorists make them identical: as many as were baptized into Christ, did, in that very act, put on, clothe yourselves with, Christ: see Ellicott's note). The force of the argument is well given by Chrys.: τίνος ἕνεκεν οὐκ εἶπεν, ὅσοι γὰρ εἰς χριστὸν ἐβαπτίσθητε, ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ ἐγεννήθητε; τὸ γὰρ ἀκόλουθον τοῦ δεῖξαι υἱοὺς τοῦτο ἦν. ὅτι πολὺ φρικωδέστερον αὐτὸ τίθησιν. εἰ γὰρ ὁ χριστὸς υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, σὺ δὲ αὐτὸν ἐνδέδυσαι, τὸν υἱὸν ἔχων ἐν ἑαυτῷ κ. πρὸς αὐτὸν ἀφομοιωθείς, εἰς μίαν συγγένειαν κ. μίαν ἰδέαν ἦχθης. Observe here how boldly and broadly St. Paul asserts the effect of Baptism on all [πάντες γὰρ . . . and ὅσοι ἐβαπτ.] the baptized. Luther remarks: "Hic locus diligenter observandus est contra fanaticos spiritus, qui majestatem baptismi extenuant, et sceleste et impie de eo loquuntur. Paulus contra magnificis titulis baptismum ornat, appellans lavacrum regenerationis ac renovationis Sp. sancti (Tit. iii. 5), et hic dicit omnes baptisatos Christum induisse, quasi dicat: non accepistis per baptismum tesseram, per quam adscripti estis in numerum christianorum, ut nostro tempore multi fanatici homines senserunt, qui ex baptismo tantum tesseram fecerunt, hoc est, breve et inane quoddam signum, sed 'quotquot' inquit etc.: id est, estis extra legem rapti in novam nativitatem, quæ facta est in baptismo." But we may notice too, as Meyer remarks, that the very putting on of Christ, which as matter of standing and profession is done in baptism, forms a subject of exhortation to those already baptized, in its ethical sense, Rom. xiii. 14.

28.] The absolute equality of all in this sonship, to the obliteration of all differences of earthly extraction or position. See Col. iii. 11; Rom. x. 12; 1 Cor. xii. 13. οὐκ ἔνι = οὐκ ἔνεστιν—'il n'y a pas:' De Wette quotes Plat. Gorg. 507, ὅτῳ δὲ μὴ ἔνι κοινωνία, φιλία οὐκ ἂν εἴη. Buttmann (ii. 299), Kühner (i. 671), Winer (§ 14. 2, note), maintain ἔνι to be a form of the preposition ἐν, and the same of ἔνι, πάρα, &c. But Meyer replies, that all those passages are against this view, where ἔνι and ἐν occur together, as 1 Cor. vi. 5; Xen. Anab. v. 3.

γάρ, reason why there is neither, &c.—viz. our unity in Christ. On the unavoidable inference from an assertion like this, that Christianity did alter the condition of women and slaves, see Jowett's note.

εἷς, more forcible and more strict than ἓν: for we are one, in Him, εἷς καινὸς ἄνθρωπος, as he says in Eph. ii. 15, speaking on this very subject. 29.] Christ is 'Abraham's seed' (ver. 16): ye are one in and with Christ, have put on Christ; therefore ye are Abraham's seed; consequently heirs by promise; for to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. The stress is on ὑμεῖς, τοῦ Ἀβραάμ, and κατ' ἐπαγγελίαν, especially on the latter,—carrying the conclusion of the argument, as against inheritance by the law. See on this verse, the note on ver. 16 above. "The declaration of ver. 7 is now substantiated by 22 verses of the deepest, the most varied, and most comprehensive reasoning that exists in the whole compass of the great Apostle's writings." Ellicott.

IV. 1—7.] The Apostle shews the correspondence between our treatment under the law and that of heirs in general: and thus, by God's dealing with us, in sending forth His Son, whose Spirit of Sonship we have received, confirms (ver. 7) the conclusion that WE ARE HEIRS. 1.] λέγω δέ refers to what follows (reff.), and does not imply, 'What I mean, is.'

ὁ κληρ., generic, as ὁ μεσίτης, ch. iii. 20. The question, whether the father of the κληρονόμος here is to be thought of as dead, or absent, or living and present, is in fact one of no importance: nor does it belong properly to the consideration of the passage. The fact is, the antitype breaks through the type, and disturbs it: as is the case, wherever the idea of inheritance is spiritualized. The supposition in our text is, that a father (from what reason or under what circumstances matters not. Mr. Bagge quotes from Ulpian, speaking of the right of a testator appointing guardians, "Tutorem autem et a certo tempore dare et usque ad certum tempus licet." Digest. xxvi. 2. 8) has preordained a time for his son and heir to come of age, and till that time, has subjected him to guardians and stewards. In the type, the reason might be absence, or decease, or even high office or intense occupation, of the father: in the antitype, it is the Father's sovereign will: but the circumstances equally exist.

2.] ἐπιτρόπους, overseers of the person; guardians: οἰκονόμους, overseers of the property, stewards. See Ellicott's and Bagge's notes. προθεσμία, the time (previously) appointed. The word (an adjective used substantively: scil. ἡμέρα or ὥρα. See for the classical meaning, 'the time allowed to elapse before bringing an action,' Smith's Dict. of Antt. sub voce) is a common one: Wetst. gives many examples. The following clearly explain it: ὁρίσαι προθεσμίαν, ἐν ᾗ τὸ ἱερὸν συντελεσθήσεται, Polyæn. p. 597:—εἰ δὲ ὁ τῆς ζωῆς τῶν ἀνθρώπων χρόνος εἰκοσαετὴς ἦν . . . . τὴν δὲ τῶν κ. ἐτῶν προθεσμίαν ἐκπληρώσαντα, Plut. ad Apollon. p. 113 e. It is no objection to the view that the father is dead, that the time was fixed by law (Hebrew as well as Greek and Roman): nor on the other hand any proof of it, that προθεσμία will hardly apply to a living man's arrangement: see on the whole, above.

3.] ἡμεῖς—are Jews only here included, or Jews and Gentiles? Clearly, both: for ἵνα τ. υἱοθεσ. ἀπολάβωμεν is spoken of all believers in Christ. He regards the Jews as, for this purpose, including all mankind (see note on ch. iii. 23), God's only positive dealings by revelation being with them—and the Gentiles as partakers both in their infant-discipline, and in their emancipation in Christ. ὅτε ἦμεν νήπιοι refers, not to any immaturity of capacity in us, but to the lifetime of the church, as regarded in the προθεσμία τοῦ πατρός: see below on ver. 4.

τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου] Aug. interprets this physically, of the worship of the elements of nature by the Gentiles: Chrys., Thdrt., al., of the Jewish new moons and sabbaths: Neander (Pfl. u. Leit. p. 370), of a religion of sense as opposed to that of the spirit. But it is more natural to take στοιχεῖα in its simpler meaning, that of letters or symbols of the alphabet, and τοῦ κόσμου not in its worst sense, but as in Heb. ix. 1, ἅγιον κοσμικόν,—'belonging to the unspiritual outer world.' Thus (as in reff. Col.) the words will mean, the elementary lessons of outward things (as Conybeare has rendered it in his note: 'outward ordinances,' in his text, is not so good). Of this kind were all the enactments peculiar to the Law; some of which are expressly named, ver. 10. See στοιχεῖα well discussed in Ellicott's note; and some useful remarks in Jowett, in loc.

Meyer prefers taking ἦμεν and δεδουλωμένοι separate: 'we were under the elements of the world, enslaved:' as answering better to ὑπὸ ἐπιτρόπους ἐστίν above. 4.] τὸ πλήρωμα τ. χρόνου ('that whereby the time was filled up:' see note on Eph. i. 23,—Fritzsche's note on Rom. xi. 12, and Stier's, Eph. i. p. 199 ff. for a discussion of the meanings of πλήρωμα) answers to the προθεσμία τ. πατρός, ver. 2: see reff. The Apostle uses this term with regard not only to the absolute will of God, but to the preparations which were made for the Redeemer on this earth: partly as Thl., ὅτε πᾶν εἶδος κακίας διεξελθοῦσα ἡ φύσις ἡ ἀνθρωπίνη ἐδεῖτο θεραπείας, partly as Bengel, 'suas etiam ecclesia ætates habet.' The manifestation of man's guilt was complete:—and the way of the Lord was prepared, by various courses of action which He had brought about by men as his instruments. ἐξαπέστ. cannot,—however little, for the purposes of the present argument, the divine side of our Lord's mission is to be pressed,—mean any thing less than sent forth from Himself (reff.).

γενόμ. ἐκ γυν. will not bear being pressed, as Calv., Grot., Estius, al., have done ("discernere Christum a reliquis voluit hominibus: quia ex semine matris creatus sit, non viri et mulieris coitu," Calv.): it is Christ's HUMANITY which is the point insisted on, not His being born of a virgin. On the other hand, the words cannot for an instant be adduced as inconsistent with such birth: they state generically, what all Christians are able, from the Gospel record, to fill up specifically.

γενόμ. ὑπὸ νόμον] 'born of a woman,' identified Him with all mankind: born under (the idea of motion conveyed by the accusative after ὑπό is accounted for by the transition implied in γενόμενος) the law, introduces another condition, in virtue of which He became the Redeemer of those who were under a special revelation and covenant. A Gentile could not (humanly speaking, as far as God has conditioned His own proceedings) have saved the world: for the Jews were the representative nation, to which the representative man must belong. γενόμ. is both times emphatic, and therefore not to be here rendered 'legi subjectum,' as Luther, 'unter das Geſetz gethan.' 5.] See above. Christ, being born under the law, a Jewish child, subject to its ordinances, by His perfect fulfilment of it, and by enduring, as the Head and in the root of our nature, its curse on the tree, bought off (from its curse and power, but see on ch. iii. 13) those who were under the law: and if them, then the rest of mankind, whose nature He had upon Him. Thus in buying off τοὺς ὑπὸ νόμον, He effected that ἡμεῖς, all men, τὴν υἱοθεσίαν ἀπολάβωμεν—should receive (not 'recover,' as Aug., al., and Jowett ['receive back']: there is no allusion to the innocence which we lost in Adam, nor was redemption by Christ in any sense a recovery of the state before the fall, but a far more glorious thing, the bestowal of an adoption which Adam never had. Nor is it, as Chrys., καλῶς εἶπεν, ἀπολάβωμεν, δεικνὺς ὀφειλομένην: it is true, it was the subject of promise, but it is the mere act of reception, not how or why it was received, which is here put forward. Nor again, with Rückert and Schött., must we render ἀπο—'therefrom,' as a fruit of the redemption. This again it is, but it is not expressed in the word) the adoption (the place, and privileges) of sons. The word υἱοθεσία occurs only in the N. T. In Herod. vi. 57 we have θετὸν παῖδα ποιέεσθαι, and the same expression in Diod. Sic. iv. 39. 6.] Meyer interprets this verse with Chrys.: καὶ πόθεν δῆλον ὅτι γεγόναμεν υἱοί, φησίν; εἶτε τρόπον ἕνα, ὅτι τὸν χριστὸν ἐνεδυσάμεθα τὸν ὄντα υἱὸν λέγει κ. δεύτερον, ὅτι τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς υἱοθεσίας ἐλάβομεν· οὐ γὰρ ἂν ἐδυνήθημεν καλέσαι πατέρα, εἰ μὴ πρότερον υἱοὶ κατέστημεν. And so Thdrt., Thl., Ambr., Pel., al., Koppe, Flatt, Rückert, Schött., and Ellicott. [Jowett combines both interpretations: but this can hardly be.] If so, we must assume a very unusual ellipsis after ὅτι δέ ἐστε υἱοί,—one hardly justified by such precedents as Rom. xi. 18,—εἰ δὲ κατακαυχᾶσαι, οὐ σὺ τ. ῥίζαν βαστάζεις, κ.τ.λ., Rom. xi. 15, and supply, 'God hath given you this proof, that . . . .' Meyer urges in defence of his view the emphatic position of ἐστε, on which see below. I prefer the ordinary rendering because it suits best (1) the simplicity of construction,—the causal ὅτι thus beginning a sentence followed by an apodosis, as in ref.,—whereas we have no example of the demonstrative ὅτι followed by the ellipsis here supposed: cf. ch. iii. 11, where δῆλον follows:—(2) the context;—it is not in corroboration of the fact that we are sons, but as a consequence of that fact, that the Apostle states what follows: to shew the completeness of the state of sonship. In Rom. viii. 16, the order of these is inverted, and the witness of the Spirit proves our sonship: but that does not affect the present passage, which must stand on its own ground. (3) The aorist ἐξαπέστειλεν is against Meyer's view—it would be in that case ἐξαπέσταλκεν. It is now used of the time of the gift of the Spirit. Render then: Because moreover ye are sons (the stress on ἐστε is hardly to be urged: υἱοὶ ἐστε would certainly give a very strong emphasis on the noun: all we can say of ἐστε υἱοί, where so insignificant a word as a verb substantive is concerned, is that there is now no such strong stress on υἱοί, but that the whole fact, of the state of sonship having been brought in, and actually existing, is alleged) God sent forth (not, 'hath sent forth'—see above) the Spirit of His Son (you being now fellows with that Son in the communion of the Spirit, won for you as a consequence of His atonement: called, Rom. viii. 15, πνεῦμα υἱοθεσίας, and ib. 9, πνεῦμα χριστοῦ, where participation in Him is said to be the necessary condition of belonging to Christ at all) into our hearts (as he changed from the third person to the first in the foregoing verse, so now from the second: both times from the fervour of his heart, wavering between logical accuracy and generous largeness of sympathy), crying (in Rom. viii. 15, it is ἐν ᾧ κράζομεν. Here the Spirit being the main subject, is regarded as the agent, and the believer merely as His organ) Abba Father. ὁ πατήρ is not a mere Greek explanation of Ἀββᾶ, but an address by His name of relation, of Him to whom the term Ἀββᾶ was used more as a token of affection than as conveying its real meaning of 'my father:' see notes on Mark xiv. 36, Rom. viii. 15. Aug. gives a fanciful reason for the repetition: "Elegantor autem intelligitur non frustra duarum linguarum verba posuisse idem significantia propter universum populum, qui de Judæis et de Gentilibus in unitatem fidei vocatus est: ut Hebræum verbum ad Judæos, Græcum ad gentes, utriusque tamen verbi eadem significatio ad ejusdem fidei spiritusque unitatem pertineat." And so Luther, Calvin, and Bengel. 7.] Statement of the conclusion from the foregoing, and corroboration, from it, of ch. iii. 29. The second person singular individualizes and points home the inference. Meyer remarks that this individualization has been gradually proceeding from ver. 5—ἀπολάβωμεν,—ἐστε,—εἶ.

διὰ θεοῦ] The rec. θεοῦ διὰ χριστοῦ seems to have been an adaptation to the similar passage, Rom. viii. 17. On the text, Windischmann remarks, "διὰ θεοῦ combines, on behalf of our race, the whole before-mentioned agency of the Blessed Trinity: the Father has sent the Son and the Spirit, the Son has freed us from the law, the Spirit has completed our sonship; and thus the redeemed are heirs through the tri-une God Himself, not through the law, nor through fleshly descent."

8—11.] Appeal to them, as the result of the conclusion just arrived at, why, having passed out of slavery into freedom, they were now going back again. 8.] τότε refers back for its time, not to ver. 3, as Windischmann, but to οὐκέτι εἶ δοῦλος, ver. 7. In οὐκ εἰδότ. θ., there is no inconsistency with Rom. i. 21: there it is the knowledge which the Gentile world might have had: here, the matter of fact is alleged, that they had it not.

τοῖς φύσει μὴ οὖσιν θ.] to gods, which by nature exist not: see 1 Cor. viii. 4; x. 19, 20 and note. The rec. would be, "to those which are not by nature gods," i. e. only made into gods by human fancy: but this is not the Apostle's way of conceiving of the heathen deities. Meyer compares 2 Chron. xiii. 9, ἐγένετο εἰς ἱερέα τῷ μὴ ὄντι θεῷ. Notice μή—giving the Apostle's judgment of their non-existence—and see 2 Cor. v. 21 note, where however I cannot hold with Ellic., that μὴ γνόντα expresses 'God's judgment' (?).

9.] "The distinction which Olsh. attempts to set up between εἰδότες as the mere outward, and γνόντες as the inner knowledge, is mere arbitrary fiction: see John vii. 26, 27; viii. 55; 2 Cor. v. 16." Meyer. μᾶλλον δὲ γν. ὑπ. θ.] See note on 1 Cor. viii. 3. Here the propriety of the expression is even more strikingly manifest than there: the Galatians did not so much acquire the knowledge of God, as they were taken into knowledge, recognized, by Him,—προσληφθέντες ὑπὸ θεοῦ, Thl.: οὐδὲ γὰρ ὑμεῖς καμόντες εὕρετε τὸν θεόν, . . . αὐτὸς δὲ ὑμᾶς ἐνεσπάσατο, Chrys. And this made their fall from Him the more matter of indignant appeal, as being a resistance of His will respecting them. No change of the meaning of γνωσθ. must be resorted to, as 'approved,' 'loved' (Grot., al.: see others in De W. and Mey.): cf. Matt. xxv. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 19. Cf. also Phil. iii. 12. πῶς] how is it that . . .? see reff. ἀσθ.] so the προάγουσα ἐντολή is called in Heb. vii. 18, ἀσθενὲς κ. ἀνωφελές. Want of power to justify is that to which the word points here. πτωχ.] in contrast with the riches which are in Christ. Or both words may perhaps refer back to the state of childhood hinted at in ver. 6, during which the heir is ἀσθενής, as immature, and πτωχός, as not yet in possession. But this would not strictly apply to the elements as the Gentiles were concerned with them: see below. On στοιχεῖα, see note, ver. 3. πάλιν] These Galatians had never been Jews before: but they had been before under the στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, under which generic term both Jewish and Gentile cultus was comprised: so that they were turning back again to these elements. ἄνωθεν] from the beginning,—afresh; not a repetition of πάλιν: Mey. quotes πάλιν ἐξ ἀρχῆς, Barnab. Ep. 16, p. 773 Migne: and Wetstein gives, from Plautus, Cas. Prol. 33, 'rursum denuo.' θέλετε, as in E. V., ye desire: but if thus expressed here by our translators, why not also in John v. 40, where it is still more emphatic?

10.] The affirmative form seems best, as (see Ellic.) supplying a verification of the charge just brought against them interrogatively: explaining τίς τῆς δουλείας τρόπος, Thdrt. Wishing to shew to them in its most contemptible light the unworthiness of their decadence, he puts the observation of days in the forefront of his appeal, as one of those things which they already practised. Circumcision he does not mention, because they were not yet drawn into it, but only in danger of being so (ch. v. 2, al.):—nor abstinence from meats, to which we do not hear that they were even tempted. ἡμέρας, emphatic, as the first mentioned, and also as a more general predication of the habit, under which the rest fall. The days would be sabbaths, new moons, and feast days: see Col. ii. 16, where these are specified. παρατηρ.] There does not seem to be any meaning of superstitious or inordinate observance (as Olsh., Winer, &c.), but merely a statement of the fact: see ref. Joseph., where, remarkably enough, the word is applied to the very commandment [the fourth] here in question. "When παρά is ethical, i. e. when the verb is used in a bad sense, e. g. ἐνεδρεύειν κ. παρατηρεῖν, Polyb. xvii. 3. 2, the idea conveyed is that of hostile observation." Ellicott. μῆνας] hardly new moons, which were days: but perhaps the seventh month, or any others which were distinguished by great feasts. καιρούς] any festal seasons: so Levit. xxiii. 4, αἵται αἱ ἑορταὶ τῷ κυρίῳ κλητὰ ἅγιαι, ἃς καλέσετε αὐτὰς ἐν τοῖς καιροῖς αὐτῶν. ἐνιαυτούς] can hardly apply to the sabbatical or jubilee years, on account of their rare occurrence, unless indeed with Wieseler, Chron. der Apost. Zeitalt. p. 286 note, we are to suppose that they were then celebrating one: perhaps those observations may be intended which especially regarded the year, as the new year. But this is not likely (see above on μῆνας): and I should much rather suppose, that each of these words is not minutely to be pressed, but all taken together as a rhetorical description of those who observed times and seasons. Notice how utterly such a verse is at variance with any and every theory of a Christian sabbath, cutting at the root, as it does, of ALL obligatory observance of times as such: see notes on Rom. xiv. 5, 6; Col. ii. 16. "These periodical solemnities of the law shewed, by the fact of their periodical repetition, the imperfection of the dispensation to which they belonged: typifying each feature of Christ's work, which, as one great and perfect whole, has been performed once for all and for ever,—and were material representations of those spiritual truths which the spiritual Israel learn in union with Christ as a risen Lord. To observe periods then, now in the fulness of time, is to deny the perfection of the Christian dispensation, the complete and finished nature of Christ's work: to forsake Him as the great spiritual teacher of His brethren, and to return to carnal pædagogues: to throw aside sonship in all its fulness, and the spirit of adoption: and to return to childhood and the rule of tutors and governors." Bagge: who however elsewhere maintains the perpetual obligation of the Sabbath. 11.] There is no attraction in the construction (φοβ. ὑμᾶς, μή πως . . . .), as Winer (comm. in loc.) holds: in that case ὑμεῖς must be the subject of the next clause (so in Diod. Sic. iv. 40 [Meyer], τὸν ἀδελφὸν εὐλαβεῖσθαι, μή ποτε . . . . ἐπίθηται τῇ βασιλείᾳ): but φοβ. ὑμᾶς stands alone, and the following clause explains it. So Soph. Œd. Tyr. 760, δέδοικ' ἐμαυτὸν . . . μὴ πόλλ' ἄγαν εἰρημέν' ᾖ μοι. The indicative assumes the fact which μή πως deprecates:—see reff. 12—16.] Appeal to them to imitate him, on the ground of their former love and veneration for him. 12.] This has been variously understood. But the only rendering which seems to answer the requirements of the construction and the context, is that which understands εἰμι or γέγονα after ἐγώ, and refers it to the Apostle having in his own practice cast off Jewish habits and become as the Galatians: i. e. a Gentile: see 1 Cor. ix. 20, 21. And so Winer, Neander, Fritz., De W., Meyer, Jowett (alt.), &c. (2) Chrys., Thdrt., Thl., Erasm.-par., al., regard it as said to Jewish believers, and explain,—τοῦτον εἶχον πάλαι τὸν ζῆλον· σφόδρα τὸν νόμον ἐπόθουν· ἀλλ' ὁρᾶτε πῶς μεταβέβλημαι. ταύτην τοίνυν καὶ ὑμεῖς ζηλώσατε τὴν μεταβολήν (Thdrt.). But to this Meyer rightly objects, that ἡμην, which would in this case have to be supplied, must have been expressed, as being emphatic, and cites from Justin ad Græcos, c. 2, where however I cannot find it, γίνεσθε ὡς ἐγώ, ὅτι κἀγὼ ἤμην ὡς ὑμεῖς. (3) Jerome, Erasm.-not., Corn.-a-lap., Estius, Michaelis, Rückert, Olsh., '. . . . as also I have accommodated myself to you.' But thus the second member of the sentence will not answer to the first. (4) Luther, Beza, Calvin, Grot., Bengel, Morus, Peile, al., would understand it, 'love me, as I love you' ("accipite hanc meam objurgationem eo animo quo vos objurgavi: . . . sit in nobis is affectus erga me, qui est in me erga vos," Luth.). But nothing has been said of a want of love: and certainly had this been meant, it would have been more plainly expressed. The words ἀδελφοί, δέομαι ὑμῶν are by Chrys., Thdrt., al., Luther, Koppe, al., joined to the following: but wrongly, for there is no δέησις in what follows. οὐδέν με ἠδικήσατε] The key to rightly understanding these words is, their apposition with ἐξουθενήσατε, . . . ἐξεπτύσατε . . . ἐδέξασθε below. To that period they refer: viz. to the time when he first preached the Gospel among them, and the first introduction of this period seems to be in the words, ὅτι κἀγὼ ὡς ὑμεῖς. Then I became as you: and at that time you did me no wrong, but on the contrary shewed me all sympathy and reverence. Then comes in the inference, put in the form of a question, at ver. 16,—I must then have since become your enemy by telling you the truth. The other explanations seem all more or less beside the purpose: δηλῶν ὅτι οὐ μίσους, οὐδὲ ἔχθρας ἦν τὰ εἰρημένα . . Chrys., and similarly Thl., Aug., Pel., Luth., Calv. ('non excandesco mea causa, nec quod vobis sim infensus'), Estius, Winer, al., which would be irrelevant, and indeed preposterous without some introduction after the affection of the foregoing words: 'ye have done me no wrong,' i. e. 'ex animo omnia condonabat si resipiscerentur,' Beza: so Bengel, Rückert, al.,—which is refuted by the aorist ἠδικήσατε, of some definite time. The same is true of 'ye have wronged not me but yourselves' (Ambr., Corn.-a-lap., Schött.), —'. . . not me, but God, or Christ' (Grot. al.). 13.] δι' ἀσθένειαν τῆς σαρκός can surely bear but one rendering,—on account of bodily weakness: all others (e. g. 'in weakness,' as E. V., μετὰ ἀσθενείας, as Œc., Thl., 'per infirmitatem,' as vulg., Luth., Beza, Grot., Estius, Jowett [comparing Phil. i. 15, where see note], 'during a period of sickness,' as Mr. Bagge) are ungrammatical, or irrelevant, as 'on account of the infirmity of (your) flesh' (Jer., Estius, Hig., Rettig), which would require some qualifying adverb such as οὕτως with εὐηγγελισάμην, and would besides be wholly out of place in an Epistle in which he is recalling them to the substance of his first preaching. The meaning then will be, that it was on account of an illness that he first preached in Galatia: i. e. that he was for that reason detained there, and preached, which otherwise he would not have done. On this, see Prolegomena, § ii. 3: the fact itself, I cannot help thinking, is plainly asserted here. Beware of conjectural emendation, such as δι' ἀσθενείας of Peile, for which there is neither warrant nor need. τὸ πρότερον may mean 'formerly,' but is more probably 'the first time,' with reference to that second visit hinted at below, ver. 16, and ch. v. 21. See Prolegomena, § v. 3. 14.] I had in some former editions retained the rec., feeling persuaded that out of it the other readings have arisen. The whole tenor of the passage seeming to shew that the Apostle's weakness was spoken of as a trial to the Galatians, μου appeared to have been altered to ὑμῶν,—or to have been omitted by some who could not see its relevance, or its needfulness. But the principles of sounder criticism have taught me how unsafe is such ground of arguing, and have compelled me to adopt the text of the most ancient MSS. The temptation seems to have been the 'thorn in the flesh' of 2 Cor. xii. 1 ff., whatever that was: perhaps something connected with his sight, or some nervous infirmity: see below, and notes on Acts xiii. 9; xxiii. 1. ἐξεπτύσατε] "expresses figuratively and in a climax the sense of ἐξουθ. Cf. the Latin despuere, respuere. In other Greek writers we have only καταπτύειν τινός, ἀποπτύειν τινά (Eur. Troad. 668; Hec. 1265. Hes. Ἔργ. 724), and διαπτύειν τινά in this metaphorical sense,—but ἐκπτύειν always in its literal sense (Hom. Od. ε. 322), as also ἐμπτύειν τινί. Even in the passage cited by Kypke from Plut., Alex. i. p. 328, it is in its literal sense, as ὅσπερ χαλινόν follows. We must treat this then as a departure from Greek usage, and regard it as occasioned by ἐξουθ., as Paul loves to repeat the same prepositions in composition (Rom. ii. 17; xi. 7 al.), not without emphasis." Meyer. ὡς ἄγγελ. θ., ὡς χρ. Ἰησ.] a climax:—besides the freedom of angels from fleshly weakness, there is doubtless an allusion to their office as messengers — and to His saying, who is above the angels, Luke x. 16. No inference can be drawn from these expressions being used of the Galatians' reception of him, that they were already Christians when he first visited them: the words are evidently not to be pressed as accurate in point of chronology, but involve an ὕστερον πρότερον: not, 'as you would have received,' &c., but 'as you would (now) receive.' 15.] Where then (i. e. where in estimation, holding what place) (was) your congratulation (of yourselves)? i. e. considering your fickle behaviour since. 'Quæ causa fuit gratulationis, si nos nunc pœnitet mei?' Bengel. Various explanations have been given: 'quæ (reading τίς) erat beatitudo vestra,' neglecting the οὖν, and making μακαρισμός into beatitudo, which it will not bear: so Œc., Luth., Beza, &c. All making the words into an exclamation (even if τίς be read) is inconsistent with the context, and with the logical precision of οὖν, and ὅτι below. 'Where is then the blessedness ye spake of?' (E. V.) is perhaps as good a rendering as the words will bear. μαρτυρῶ γὰρ . . .] a proof to what lengths this μακαρισμός, and consequently their high value for St. Paul ran, at his first visit. ἐξορ. ἐδώκ. μοι, the right course will be, not at once to adopt the conclusion, that they point to ocular weakness on the part of the Apostle, nor because they form a trite proverb in many languages, therefore to set down (as Meyer, De W., Windischmann, al., have done) at once that no such allusion can have been intended, but to judge from the words themselves and our information from other sources whether such an allusion is likely. And in doing so, I may observe that a proverbial expression so harsh in its nature, and so little prepared by the context, would perhaps hardly have been introduced without some particle of climax. Would not the Apostle have more naturally written, ὅτι εἰ δυνατόν, καὶ τοὺς ὀφθ. ὑμ. . . . . ? Had the καί been inserted, it would have deprived the words of all reference to a matter of fact, and made them purely proverbial. At the same time it is fair to say that the order τοὺς ὀφθ. ὑμῶν rather favours the purely proverbial reference. Had the Apostle's eyes been affected, and had he wished to express "You would, if possible, have pulled out your own eyes, and have given them to me," he would certainly have written ὑμῶν τοὺς ὀφθ., not τοὺς ὀφθ. ὑμῶν. In other words, the more emphatic τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς is, the more likely is the expression to be proverbial merely: the less emphatic τ. ὀφθ. is, the more likely to refer to some fact, in which the eyes were as matter of notoriety concerned. The inference then of any ocular disease from these words themselves seems to me precarious. Certainly Acts xxiii. 1 ff. receives light from such a supposition; but with our very small knowledge on the subject, many conjectures may be hazarded with some shew of support from Scripture, while none of them has enough foundation to make it probable on the whole. The proverb is abundantly illustrated by Wetst. ἐξορύσσω is the regular classic word: cf. Herod. viii. 116: this however is doubted by Ellic. See on the whole passage, Jowett's most interesting "fragment on the character of St. Paul," Epp. &c. vol. i. pp. 290—303. 16.] So that (as things now stand; an inference derived from the contrast between their former love and their present dislike of him. See Klotz, Devar. ii. 776) have I become your enemy ('hated by you;'—ἐχθρ. in passive sense: or perhaps it may be active, as Ellic.) by speaking the truth (see Eph. iv. 15 note) to you? When did he thus incur their enmity by speaking the truth? Not at his first visit, from the whole tenor of this passage: nor in this letter, as some think (Jer., Luther, al.), which they had not yet read; but at his second visit, see Acts xviii. 23, when he probably found the mischief beginning, and spoke plainly against it. Cf. similar expressions in Wetst.: especially 'obsequium amicos, veritas odium parit,' Ter. Andr. i. 1. 40: ὀργίζονται ἅπαντες τοῖς μετὰ παῤῥησίας τ' ἀληθῆ λέγουσι, Lucian, Abdic. 7.

17.] 'My telling you the truth may have made me seem your enemy: but I warn you that these men who court you so zealously (see ref. 2 Cor., and cf. Plut. vii. 762, cited by Fritz. ὑπὸ χρείας τὸ πρῶτον ἔπονται κ. ζηλοῦσιν, ὕστερον δὲ καὶ φιλοῦσιν) have no honourable purpose in so doing: it is only in order to get you away from the community as a separate clique, that you may court them.' Thus the verse seems to fit best into the context. As regards particular words, ἐκκλεῖσαι must bear the meaning of exclusion from a larger and attraction to a smaller, viz. their own, party. (Our very word 'exclusive' conveys the same idea.) I have therefore not adopted Mey.'s rendering, 'from all other teachers,'—nor that of Luther (1538), Calv., Grot., Beng., Rück., Olsh., Winer, al., 'from me and my communion,'—nor that of Chrys., Œc., Thl., τῆς τελείας γνώσεως ἐκβαλεῖν,—nor that of Erasm., Corn.-a-lap., 'from Christian freedom.'

there Meyer would give ἵνα the meaning of 'in which case:' but it is surely far better where the sentence so plainly requires ἵνα of the purpose, to suppose some peculiar usage or solœcism in formation of the subjunctive on the part of the Apostle.

18.] Two meanings are open to us: (1) as E. V. (apparently: but perhaps 'zealously affected' may be meant for the passive—for 'earnestly courted') and many Commentators taking ζηλοῦσθαι as middle—or passive with a signification nearly the same, 'it is good to be zealously affected in a good cause, and not only during my presence with you:' in which case the sense must be referred back to vv. 13—15, and the allusion must be to their zeal while he was with them. But, considering that this context is broken at ver. 17,—that the words ζηλοῦσθαι ἐν καλῷ are an evident reference to ζηλοῦσιν ὑμ. οὐ καλῶς, and that the wider context of the whole passage adduces a contrast between their conduct when he was with them and now, I think it much better (2) to explain thus: 'I do not mean to blame them in the abstract for τὸ ζηλοῦν ὑμᾶς: any teacher who did this καλῶς, preaching Christ, would be a cause of joy to me (Phil. i. 15—18): and it is an honourable thing (for you) to be the objects of this zeal ('ambiri') ἐν καλῷ, in a good cause (I still cannot see how this rendering of ἐν καλῷ 'alters the meaning of the verb' [Ellic.]: it rather seems to me that the non-use of καλῶς, while the paronomasia is retained, leads to this meaning), at all times and by every body, not only when I am (or was) present with you:' q. d. 'I have no wish, in thus writing, to set up an exclusive claim to ζηλοῦν ὑμᾶς—whoever will really teach you good, at any time, let him do it and welcome.' Then the next verse follows naturally also, in which he narrows the relation between himself and them, from the wide one of a mere ζηλωτής, to the closer one of their parent in Christ, much as in 1 Cor. iv. 14 f.,—ὡς τέκνα μου ἀγαπητὰ νουθετῶ· ἐὰν γὰρ μυρίους παιδαγωγοὺς ἔχητε ἐν χριστῷ, ἀλλ' οὐ πολλοὺς πατέρας· ἐν γὰρ χρ. Ἰησοῦ διὰ τ. εὐαγγελίου ἐγὼ ὑμᾶς ἐγέννησα. On other interpretations, I may remark, (α) that after ζηλοῦσιν, the strict passive meaning is the only suitable one for ζηλοῦσθαι, as it is indeed the only one justified by usage: (β) that ζηλόω must keep its meaning throughout, which will exclude all such renderings as 'invidiose tractari' here (Koppe): (γ) that all applications of the sentence to the Apostle himself as its object (ἐν καλῷ, in the matter of a good teacher, as Estius, Corn.-a-lap., al.) are beside the purpose. 19.] belongs to what follows, not to the preceding. Lachmann, (I suppose on account of the δέ following, but see below,) with that want of feeling for the characteristic style of St. Paul which he so constantly shews in punctuating, has attached this as a flat and irrelevant appendage to the last verse (so also Bengel, Knapp, Rückert, al.): and has besides tamed down τεκνία into τέκνα, thus falling into the trap laid by some worthless corrector. My little children (the diminutive occurs only here in St. Paul, but is manifestly purposely, and most suitably chosen for the propriety of the metaphor. It is found [see reff.] often in St. John, while our Apostle has τέκνον, 1 Tim. i. 18; 2 Tim. ii. 1), whom (the change of gender is common enough. Meyer quotes an apposite example from Eur. Suppl. 12, θανόντων ἑπτὰ γενναίων τέκνων .... οὕς ποτ' .... ἤγαγε) I again (a second time; the former was ἐν τῷ παρεῖναί με, ver. 18) travail with (bear, as a mother, with pain and anxiety, till the time of birth) until Christ shall have been fully formed within you (for Christ dwelling in a man is the secret and principle of his new life, see ch. ii. 20),

But surely such a change would be altogether beside the tone of this deeply affectionate address. I should rather hold, with Meyer, —from my former severity, when I became your enemy by ἀληθεύων ὑμῖν, to the softness and mildness of a mother, still ἀληθεύων, but in another tone. The great majority of Commentators understand ἀλλάξαι as Corn.-a-lap. [Mey.]: 'ut scilicet quasi mater nunc blandirer, nunc gemerem, nunc obsecrarem, nunc objurgarem vos.' But so much can hardly be contained in the mere word ἀλλάξαι without some addition, such as πρὸς τὸν καιρόν, πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον [1 Cor. xii. 7], or the like): for I am perplexed about you (not 'I am suspected among you,' but ἐν ὑμῖν as in 2 Cor. vii. 16, θαῤῥῶ ἐν ὑμῖν,—the element in which: the other is irrelevant, and inconsistent with the N. λέγον τὸ γράμμα, κ. ἄλλο τὸ νόημα: Hesych., ἀλληγορία, ἄλλο τι παρὰ τὸ ἀκουόμενον ὑποδεικνύουσα: and gloss. N. T., ἀλληγορούμενα, ἑτέρως κατὰ μετάφρασιν νοούμενα, καὶ οὐ κατὰ τὴν ἀνάγνωσιν. The word is often used, as the thing signified by it is exemplified, by Philo. It was the practice of the Rabbinical Jews to allegorize the O. T. history. "Singula fere gesta quæ narrantur, allegorice quoque et mystice interpretantur. Neque hac in parte labores ipsorum plane possumus contemnere. Nam eadem Paulus habet, qualia sunt de Adamo primo et secundo, de cibo et potu spirituali, de Hagare, etc. Sic Joannes memorat Sodomum et Ægyptum mysticam, plagas item Ægyptias per revelationem hostibus Ecclesiæ immittendas prædicit," Schöttgen. How various persons take this allegorical comment of the Apostle, depends very much on their views of his authority as a Scripture interpreter. To those who receive the law as a great system of prophetic figures, there can be no difficulty in believing the events by which the giving of the law was prepared to have been prophetic figures also: not losing thereby any of their historic reality, but bearing to those who were able to see it aright, this deeper meaning. And to such persons, the fact of St. Paul and other sacred writers adducing such allegorical interpretations brings no surprise and no difficulty, but only strong confirmation of their belief that there are such deeper meanings lying hid under the O. T. history. That the Rabbis and the Fathers, holding such deeper senses, should have often missed them, and allegorized fancifully and absurdly, is nothing to the purpose: it is surely most illogical to argue that because they were wrong, St. Paul cannot be right. The only thing which really does create any difficulty in my mind, is, that Commentators with spiritual discernment, and appreciation of such a man as our Apostle, should content themselves with quietly casting aside his Scripture interpretation wherever, as here, it passes their comprehension. On their own view of him, it would be at least worth while to consider whether his knowledge of his own Scriptures may not have surpassed ours. But to those who believe that he had the Spirit of God, this passage speaks very solemnly; and I quite agree with Mr. Conybeare in his note, edn. 2, vol. ii. p. 178, "The lesson to be drawn from this whole passage, as regards the Christian use of the O. T., is of an importance which can scarcely be overrated." Of course no one, who reads, marks, learns, and inwardly digests the Scriptures, can subscribe to the shallow and indolent dictum of Macknight, 'This is to be laid down as a fixed rule, that no ancient history is to be considered as allegorical, but that which inspired persons have interpreted allegorically: but at the same time, in allegorizing Scripture, he will take care to follow the analogy of the faith, and proceed soberly, and in dependence on that Holy Spirit, who alone can put us in possession of His own mind in His word.' Calvin's remarks here are good: "Quemadmodum Abrahæ domus tunc fuit vera Ecclesia: ita minime dubium est quin præcipui et præ aliis memorabiles eventus qui in ea contigerunt, nobis totidem sint typi. Sicut ergo in circumcisione, in sacrificiis, in toto sacerdotio levitico allegoria fuit: sicuti hodie est in nostris sacramentis, ita etiam in domo Abrahæ fuisse dico. Sed id non facit ut a literali sensu recedatur. Summa perinde est ac si diceret Paulus, figuram duorum testamentorum in duabus Abrahæ uxoribus, et duplicis populi in duobus filiis, veluti in tabula, nobis depictam." As to the objection of Luther, repeated by De Wette, that this allegory shews misapprehension of the history (die Allegorie von Sara und Hagar, welche .... zum Stich zu ſchwach iſt, denn ſie weichet ab vom hiſtoriſchen Verſtand. Luth., cited by De W.), because Ishmael had nothing to do with the law of Moses, the misapprehension is entirely on the side of the objectors. Not the bare literal historical fact is in question here, but the inner character of God's dealings with men, of which type, and prophecy, and the historical fact itself, are only so many exemplifications. The difference between the children of the bond and the free, of the law and the promise, has been shewn out to the world before, by, and since the covenant of the law. See an excellent note of Windischmann's ad loc., exposing the shallow modern critical school. See also Jowett's note, on the other side: and while reading it, and tracing the consequences which will follow from adopting his view, bear in mind that the question between him and us is not affected by any thing there said on the similarity between St. Paul and the Alexandrians as interpreters of Scripture,— but remains as it was before,—was the O. T. dispensation a system of typical events and ordinances, or is all such typical reference fanciful and delusive? For these (women [αὗται], not as Jowett, Ishmael and Isaac, which would confuse the whole: the mothers are the covenants;—the sons, the children of the covenants) are (import in the allegory, see reff.) two covenants (not 'revelations,' but literally covenants between God and men): one (covenant) indeed from Mount Sina (taking its origin from,—or having Mount Sina as its centre, as ὁ ἐκ Πελοποννήσου πόλεμος) gendering (bringing forth children: De W. compares υἱοὶ . . . . τῆς διαθήκης, Acts iii. 25) unto (with a view to) bondage, which one is (identical in the allegory with) Agar.

25.] (No parenthesis: συστοιχεῖ δέ begins a new clause.) For the word Agar (when the neuter article precedes a noun of another gender, not the import of that noun, but the noun itself, is designated,—so Demosth. p 255. 4, τὸ δ' ὑμεῖς ὅταν εἴπω, τὴν πόλιν λέγω. Kühner ii. 137) is (imports) Mount Sina, in Arabia (i. e. among the Arabians. This rendering, which is Chrysostom's,—τὸ δὲ Σινὰ ὄρος οὕτω μεθερμηνεύεται τῇ ἐπιχωρίῳ αὐτῶν γλώττῃ [so also Thl., Luther], is I conceive necessitated by the arrangement of the sentence, as well as by τὸ Ἄγαρ. Had the Apostle intended merely to localize Σινᾶ ὄρος by the words ἐν τῇ Ἀρ., he could hardly but have written τὸ ἐν τῇ Ἀρ., or have placed ἐν τ. Ἀρ. before ἐστιν. Had he again, adopting the reading τὸ γὰρ Σινᾶ ὄρος ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ Ἀραβίᾳ, intended to say [as Windischmann], 'for Mount Sina is in Arabia, where Hagar's descendants likewise are,' the sentence would more naturally have stood τὸ γὰρ Σινᾶ ὄρ. ἐν τῇ Ἀρ. ἐστίν, or καὶ γὰρ Σινᾶ ὄρ. ἐν τ. Ἀρ. ἐστίν. As it is, the law of emphasis would require it to be rendered, 'For Sina is a mountain in Arabia,' information which the judaizing Galatians would hardly require. As to the fact itself, Meyer states, "حجر in Arabic, is a stone: and though we have no further testimony that Mount Sina was thus named κατ' ἐξοχήν by the Arabians, we have that of Chrysostom; and Büsching, Erdbeschreibung, v. p. 535, adduces that of the traveller Haraut, that they to this day call Sinai, Hadschar. Certainly we have Hagar as a geographical proper name in Arabia Petræa: the Chaldee paraphrast always calls the wilderness of Shur, חגרא." So that Jowett certainly speaks too strongly when he says, "the old explanations, that Hagar is the Arabic word for a rock or the Arabic noun for Mount Sinai, are destitute of foundation." As to the improbability at which he hints, of St. Paul quoting Arabic words in writing to the Galatians, I cannot see how it is greater than that of his making the covert allusion contained in his own interpretation. We may well suppose St. Paul to have become familiarized, during his sojourn there, with this name for the granite peaks of Sinai), but (δέ marks the latent contrast that the addition of a new fact brings with it: so Ellic.) corresponds (viz. Agar, which is the subject, not Mount Sina, see below. "συστοιχεῖν is 'to stand in the same rank:' hence 'to belong to the same category,' 'to be homogeneous with:' see Polyb. xiii. 8. 1, ὅμοια κ. σύστοιχα." Mey., Chrys., all., and the Vulg. [conjunctus est], take it literally, and understand it, γειτνιάζει, ἅπτεται, 'is joined, by a continuous range of mountain-tops,' understanding Sina as the subject) with the present Jerusalem (i. e. the heavenly Jerusalem = Ἱερ. ἐπουράνιος Heb. xii. 22, ἡ καινὴ Ἱερ. Rev. iii. 12; xxi. 2, and see reff. on ἄνω. Michaelis, al., suppose ancient Jerusalem [Melchisedek's] to be meant. Vitringa, al., Mount Zion, as ἡ ἄνω πόλις means the Acropolis. But Rabbinical usage, as Schöttgen has abundantly proved in his Dissertation de Hierosolyma cœlesti [Hor. Heb. vol. i. Diss. v.], was familiar with the idea of a Jerusalem in heaven. See also citations in Wetst. This latter quotes a very remarkable parallel from Plato, Rep. ix. end, —ἐν ᾗ νῦν δὴ διήλθομεν οἰκίζοντες πόλει λέγεις, τῇ ἐν λόγοις κειμένῃ, ἐπεὶ γῆς γε οὐδαμοῦ οἶμαι αὐτὴν εἶναι. Ἀλλ, ἦν δ' ἐγώ ἐν οὐρανῷ ἴσως παράδειγμα ἀνάκειται τῷ βουλομένῳ ὁρᾷν καὶ ὁρῶντι ἑαυτὸν κατοικίζειν. διαφέρει δὲ οὐδὲν εἴτε που ἐστὶν εἴτε ἔσται· τὰ γὰρ ταύτης μόνης ἂν πράξειεν, ἄλλης δὲ οὐδεμιᾶς. Εἰκός γ', ἔφη. The expression here will mean, "the Messianic Theocracy, which before the παρουσία is the Church, and after it Christ's Kingdom of glory." Mey.) is free, which (which said city, which heavenly Jerusalem) is our mother (the emphasis is not on ἡμῶν as Winer: nay rather it stands in the least emphatic place, as indicating a relation taken for granted by Christians. See Phil. iii. 20. The rendering adopted by Mr. Bagge, "which [Jerusalem the free] is [answers to, as ἥτις ἐστὶν Ἄγαρ above] our mother [viz. Sarah]," is untenable from the absence of the article before μήτηρ, besides that it would introduce confusion, and a double allegory). 27.] Proof of this relation from prophecy. The portion of Isaiah from which this is taken, is directly Messianic: indicating in its foreground the reviviscence of Israel after calamity, but in language far surpassing that event. See Stier, Jesaias nicht pseudo-Jesaias, vol. ii. p. 512. The citation is from the LXX, verbatim. ῥῆξον] sc. φωνήν: cf. many examples in Wetst. Probably the rule of supplying ellipses from the context (following which Kypke and Schött. here supply εὐφροσύνην, from εὐφράνθητι, and Isa. xlix. 13; lii. 9; cf. also 'erumpere gaudium,' Ter. Eun. iii. 5. 2 [Ellic.]) need hardly be applied here; the phrase with φωνήν was so common, as to lead at last to the omission of the substantive. The Hebrew רִנָּה 'into joyful shouting,' seems not to have been read by the LXX. St. Paul here interprets the barren of Sara, who bore not according to the flesh (= the promise), and the fruitful of Agar (= the law). Clem. Rom., Ep. ii. ad Cor. 2, p. 333, takes the στεῖρα of the Gentile Church, ἐπεὶ ἔρημος ἐδόκει εἶναι ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ, ὁ λαὸς ἡμῶν, νυνὶ δὲ πιστεύσαντες πλείονες ἐγενόμεθα τῶν δοκούντων ἔχειν θεόν (the Jewish church), and similarly Origen (in Rom., lib. vi. 7, vol. iv. p. 578), . . . 'quod multo plures ex gentibus quam ex circumcisione crediderint.' And this has been the usual interpretation. It only shews how manifold is the 'perspective of prophecy:' this sense neither is incompatible with St. Paul's, nor surely would it have been denied by him. (So Chrys., al., in this passage, which is clearly wrong: for ἡμῶν, even without πάντων, must apply to all Christians for the argument to hold.) ὅτι πολ.] not, as E. V., "many more &c.," which is inaccurate: but, many are the children of the desolate, more than (rather than; both being numerous, hers are the more numerous) of her, &c. τὸν ἄνδρα] The E. V. has perhaps done best by rendering 'an husband,' though thus the force of the Greek is not given. 'The husband' would mislead, by pointing at the one husband (Abraham) who was common to Sara and Agar, which might do in this passage, but would not in Isaiah: whereas ἐχ. τὸν ἄνδρα means, 'her (of the two) who has (the) husband,' the other having none: a fineness of meaning which we cannot give in English.

28.] But (transitional: or rather perhaps adversative to the children of her who had an husband, which were last mentioned. With ἡμεῖς, it would be resumptive of ver. 26) ye (see var. readd.), brethren, like (the expression in full, κατὰ τ. ὁμοιότητα Μελχισεδέκ, occurs Heb. vii. 15. Wetst. quotes from Galen, ὁ ἄνθρωπος οὐ κατὰ λέοντά ἐστι τὴν ῥώμην, and from Arrian, Hist. Gr. ii., τιμώμενος ὑπὸ τοῦ δήμου κατὰ τὸν πατέρα Ἄγγωνα: see also reff.) Isaac, are children of PROMISE (ἐπαγγ. emphatic:—are children, not κατὰ σάρκα, but διὰ τῆς ἐπαγγελίας, see ver. 23, and below, ver. 29).

29.] ὁ κατ. σάρ. γεν., see ver. 23. It has been thought that there is nothing in the Hebrew text to justify so strong a word as ἐδίωκεν. It runs, 'and Sarah saw the son of Hagar .... מְצַחֵק' (παίζοντα μετὰ Ἰσαὰκ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτῆς, LXX); and some deny that צָחַק ever means 'he mocked.' But certainly it does: see Gen. xix. 14. And this would be quite ground enough for the ἐδίωκεν, for the spirit of persecution was begun. So that we need not refer to tradition, as many have done (even Ellic., whom see; Jowett, as unfortunately usual with him when impugning the accuracy of St. Paul, asserts rashly and confidently, that the sense in which the Apostle takes the Hebrew is inadmissible), to account for St. Paul's expression.

τὸν κατὰ πνεῦμα, sc. γεννηθέντα, him that was born after the Spirit, i. e. in virtue of the promise, which was given by the Spirit. Or, 'by virtue of the Spirit's agency:' but the other is better.

30.] ἀλλά, as in E. V., 'nevertheless:' notwithstanding the fact of the persecution, just mentioned. The quotation is adapted from the LXX, where μου Ἰσαάκ stands for τῆς ἐλευθέρας. We need hardly have recourse (with Ellic.) to the fact that God confirmed Sarah's words, in order to prove this to be Scripture: the Apostle is allegorizing the whole history, and thus every part of it assumes a significance in the allegory. κληρονομήσῃ] See Judg. xi. 2 (LXX), κ. ἐξέβαλον τὸν Ἰεφθάε, κ. εἶπον αὐτῷ, οὐ κληρονομήσεις ἐν τῷ οἴκῳ τοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν, ὅτι υἱὸς γυναικὸς ἑταίρας σύ. "The distinction drawn by Hermann on Œd. Col. 853, between οὐ μή with future indicative (duration or futurity) and with aorist subjective (speedy occurrence), is not applicable to the N. T. on account of (1) various readings (as here): (2) the decided violations of the rule where the MSS. are unanimous, as 1 Thess. iv. 15: and (3) the obvious prevalence of the use of the subjunctive over the future, both in the N. T. and 'fatiscens Græcitas:' see Lobeck, Phryn. p. 722." Ellicott.

31.] I am inclined to think, against Meyer, De W., Ellic., &c., that this verse is, as commonly taken, the conclusion from what has gone before: and that the διό is bound on to the κληρονομήσῃ preceding. For that we are κληρονόμοι, is an acknowledged fact, established before, ch. iii. 29; ver. 7. And if we are, we are not the children of the handmaid, of whom it was said οὐ μὴ κληρονομ., but of the free-woman, of whose son the same words asserted that he should inherit. Observe in the first clause παιδίσκης is anarthrous: most likely because emphatically prefixed to its governing noun (cf. ἐθνῶν ἀπόστολος, Rom. xi. 13): but possibly, as indefinite, q. d. we are the children of no bondwoman, but of the freewoman. I prefer the former reason, as most consonant to N. T. diction. V. 1—12.] De W. calls this the peroration of the whole second part of the Epistle. It consists of earnest exhortation to them, grounded on the conclusion of the foregoing argument, to abide in their evangelical liberty, and warning against being led away by the false teachers.

1.] It is almost impossible to determine satisfactorily the reading (see var. readd.). I have in this Edition adopted that in the text, as being best attested by the most ancient authorities. With liberty did Christ make you free (i. e. ἐλεύθεροι is your rightful name and ought to be your estimation of yourselves, seeing that ἐλευθερία is your inheritance by virtue of Christ's redemption of you). Stand fast, therefore (reff. στήκω is unknown in classical Greek), and be not again (see note on ch. iv. 9: in fact, the whole world was under the law in the sense of its being God's only revelation to them) involved (reff.) in the yoke of bondage (better than 'a yoke;' an anarthrous noun or personal pronoun following another noun in the genitive often deprives that other noun of its article: e. g., τίς ἔγνω νοῦν κυρίου; 1 Cor. ii. 16: see numerous instances in Cant. v. 1. Cf. Winer, § 19. 2, most of whose examples however are after prepositions. Wetst. quotes from Soph. Aj. 944, πρὸς οἷα δουλείας ζυγὰ χωροῦμεν). 2.] Ἴδε, not ἰδέ, in later Greek: see Winer, § 6. 1. a:—it draws attention to what follows, as a strong statement. ἐγὼ Παῦλος] ἀντικρυς ὑμῖν λέγω κ. διαρρήδην, κ. τὸ ἐμαυτοῦ προστίθημι ὄνομα, Thdrt. τὴν τοῦ οἰκείου προσώπου ἀξιοπιστίαν ἀντὶ πάσης ἀποδείξεως τίθησι, Theophyl., and so Chrys. There hardly seems to be a reference (as Wetst. "ego quem dicunt circumcisionem prædicare") to his having circumcised Timothy. Calvin says well: "Ista locutio non parvam emphasin habet; coram enim se opponit, et nomen dat, ne videatur causam dubiam habere. Et quanquam vilescere apud Galatas cœperat ejus auctoritas, tamen ad refellendos omnes adversarios sufficere asserit."

The present, ἐὰν περιτέμνησθε, implies the continuance of a habit, q. d. if you will go on being circumcised. He does not say, 'if you shall have been circumcised:' so that Calv.'s question, 'quid hoc vult? Christum non profuturum omnibus circumcisis?' does not come in. On χρ. ὑμ. οὐδ. ὠφελήσει, Chrys. remarks: ὁ περιτεμνόμενος ὡς νόμον δεδοικὼς περίτεμνεται, ὁ δὲ δεδοικὼς ἀπιστεῖ τῇ δυνάμει τῆς χάριτος, ὁ δὲ ἀπιστῶν οὐδὲν κερδαίνει παρὰ τῆς ἀπιστουμένης. Nothing can be more directly opposed than this verse to the saying of the Judaizers, Acts xv. 1. The exception to the rule in Paul's own conduct, Acts xvi. 3, is sufficiently provided for by the present tense here: see above. 3.] δέ, moreover, introduces an addition, and a slight contrast—'not only will Christ not profit . . . . . but

. . . . . .' On μαρτύρομαι (usually, in this sense, -ροῦμαι ;— -ρομαι having an accusative, whence Bretschn., al., supply τὸν θεόν here, but wrongly), see reff. πάλιν, once more: applies to the verb, not to the μαρτυρία which follows, for that is not a repetition. Thus it will refer to παντὶ ἀνθρ. as 'a more extended application of ὑμῖν' (Ellic.), not, as Meyer, to a former inculcation of this by word of mouth at his second visit. περιτεμνομένῳ, not -τμηθέντι, see above—to every man who receives circumcision,—'submits to be circumcised,' as Ellic. The emphasis is on παντί, substantiating, and carrying further, the last verse. ὅλον has the stress. The circumcised man became a 'proselyte of righteousness,' and bound to keep the whole law. "This true and serious consequence of circumcision the false Apostles had probably at least dissembled." Mey. 4.] Explains and establishes still further the assertion of ver. 2. Ye were annihilated from Christ (literally: the construction is a pregnant one, 'ye were cut off from Christ, and thus made void:' see ref. 2 Cor. 'were,' viz. at the time when you began your course of ἐν νόμῳ δικ.), ye who are being justified ('endeavouring to be justified,' 'seeking justification:' such is the force of the subjective present. Certainly I think the former: for this reason, that ἐλπίδα has the emphasis, and ἐλπίδα δικ. ἀπεκδεχ. answers to δικαιοῦσθε above —'Ye think ye have your righteousness in the law: we, on the contrary, anxiously wait for the hope of righteousness (full and perfect).' The phrase ἀπεκδέχεσθαι ἐλπίδα may be paralleled, Acts xxiv. 15; Tit. ii. 13; Eur. ii. 13 al., ut h. l. Passivo (cf. ἐνεργεῖται πόλεμος, Polyb. i. 13. 5; Jos. Antt. xv. 5. 3) nunquam Paulus usus est." The older Romanist Commentators (Bellarm., Est.) insisted on the passive sense as favouring the dogma of fides formata, for which it is cited by the Council of Trent, sess. vi. cap. 7, de justific. And the modern Romanist Commentators, though abandoning the passive sense, still claim the passage on their side (e. g. Windischmann); but without reason; love is the modus operandi of faith, that which justifies, however, is not love, but faith; nor can a passage be produced, where St. Paul says we are justified by 'faith working by love,' but it is ever by faith only. One is astonished at the boldness of such a generally calm and fair writer as Windischmann, in claiming the passage for the Tridentine doctrine, even when the passive interpretation, which was all it had to lay hold on, is given up. As parallels to our passage, see Rom. xiv. 17; 1 Cor. vii. 19.

7—12.] He laments their deflexion from their once promising course, and denounces severely their perverters. Ye were running well ('hoc est, omnia apud vos erant in felici statu et successu, vivebatis optime, contendebatis recta ad vitam æternam quam vobis pollicebatur verbum,' &c. Luther): who (see ch. iii. 1, the question expresses astonishment) hindered you (Polyb. xxiv. 1. 12, uses ἐγκόπτειν with a dative, διὰ τὸ τὸν φίλιππον ἐγκόπτειν τῇ δικαιοδοσίᾳ: Ellic. quotes, in connexion with the view of the primary notion being that of hindering by breaking up a road,—Greg. Naz. Or. xvi. p. 260, ἡ κακίας ἐγκοπτομένης δυσπάθεια τῶν πονηρῶν, ἡ ἀρετῆς ὁδοποιουμένης εὐπάθεια τῶν βελτιόνων) that ye should not (μή before πείθεσθαι is not pleonastic, but the construction, so often occurring, of a negative after verbs of hindering, is in fact a pregnant one, μὴ πείθεσθαι being the result of the hindrance: q. d. ὥστε μὴ π. or καὶ ἐποίησε μὴ π. See Bernhardy, Syntax, ix. 6 b, who quotes one example very apposite to this,—ἐμποδὼν ἡμῖν γένηται τὴν θεὸν μὴ 'ξελκύσαι, Aristoph. Pac. 315) obey the truth (i. e. submit yourselves to the true Gospel of Christ. These words, which Chrys. omits here, have been transferred hence to ch. iii. 1. See var. readd. there. On that account they are certainly genuine here)?

8.] The persuasion (to which you are yielding—active; not your persuasion, passive. πεισμονή may mean either. Ellic. says: "As the similar form πλησμονή means both satietas (the state) and also expletio (the act), Col. ii. 23; Plato, Sympos. 186 c. πλ. καὶ κένωσις,—so πεισμονή may mean the state of being persuaded, i. e. conviction, or the act of persuading, 'persuadendi sollertia' (Schött.): cf. Chrys. on 1 Thess. i. 3, οὐ πεισμονὴ ἀνθρωπίνη . . . ἦν ἡ πεῖθουσα." But here, ἡ πεισμ. being connected with ὁ καλῶν ὑμᾶς, and answering to the act of ἐγκόπτειν in the last verse, is better taken actively) is not from (does not come from, is not originated by) Him who calleth you (i. e. God: see ch. i. 6 and note).

9.] ζύμη may allude either to men (Jer., Aug., Grot., Est., Beng., De W., al.), or to doctrine. In the parallel place in 1 Cor. v. 6, it is moral influence; so also where our Lord uses the same figure, Matt. xvi. 12, where ζύμη = διδαχή. Nor can there be any objection to taking it as abstract, and φύραμα concrete:—a little false doctrine corrupts the whole mass (of Christians). So Chrys. (οὕτω καὶ ὑμᾶς ἰσχύει τὸ μικρὸν τοῦτο κακόν, μὴ διορθωθέν, καὶ εἰς τέλειον ἰουδαϊσμὸν ἀγαγεῖν), Thl., Luth., Calv., all. 10.] "After the warning of vv. 8, 9, Paul assures his readers that he has confidence in them,

ἐγώ, emphatic, I, for my part; 'quod ad me attinet, ...' εἰς, with regard to, see reff., and Bernhardy, p. 220. On ἐν κυρίῳ, see 2 Thess. iii. 4:—it is the element or sphere in which his confidence is conditioned. οὐδὲν ἄλλο φρον.] See ἑτέρως, Phil. iii. 15: of which this ἄλλο is a kind of softening. We take the meaning here to be, ye will be of no other mind than this, viz. which I enjoin on you,—not in vv. 8, 9 only, but in this Epistle, and in his preaching generally. ὁ δὲ ταράσσων need not be interpreted as referring necessarily to any one ἐπίσημος among the Judaizers (as Olsh., al.), but simply as individualizing the warning, and carrying home the denunciation to each one's heart among the perverters. Cf. οἱ ἀναστατοῦντες below, and ch. i. 7; iv. 17.

τὸ κρῖμα, the sentence, understood to be unfavourable, is a burden laid on the judged person, which he βαστάζει, bears. The ὅστις ἐὰν ᾖ generalizes the declaration to the fullest extent: see ch. i. 8, 9.

11.] The connexion appears to be this: the Apostle had apparently been charged with being a favourer of circumcision in other churches; as shewn e. g. by his having circumcised Timothy. After the preceding sharp denunciation of ὁ ταράσσων ὑμᾶς, and ὅστις ἐὰν ᾖ, it is open to the adversaries to say, that Paul himself was one of their ταράσσοντες, by his inconsistency. In the abruptness then of his fervid thoughts he breaks out in this self-defence. ἐγώ, emphatic as before.

περιτομήν has the chief emphasis, as the new element in the sentence, and not κηρύσσω, as Chrys. (οὐ γὰρ εἶπεν ὅτι περιτομὴν οὐκ ἐργάζομαι, ἀλλά, οὐ κηρύσσω, τουτέστιν, οὐχ οὕτω κελεύω πιστεύειν), al.,—its position not allowing this. The first ἔτι is best understood, as referring, not to any change in his preaching as an Apostle (for he appears always to have been of the same mind, and certainly was from the first persecuted by the Jews), but to the change since his conversion, before which he was a strenuous fautor of Judaism. Olsh. objects to this, that κηρύσσω could not be used of that period. But this (even if it be necessary to press κηρύσ. so far into matter of fact) cannot be said with any certainty:—the course of Saul as a zealot may have often led him even to preach, if not circumcision in its present debated position, yet that strict Judaism of which it formed a part. τί ἔτι διώκ.] ἔτι is logical, as in reff. (De W.): i. e., what further excuse is there for my being (as I am) persecuted (by the Jews)? For, if this is so, if I still preach circumcision, ἄρα, then is brought to nought, is done away, the OFFENCE (reff. stumbling-block, σκάνδ. has the emphasis) of the cross—because, if circumcision, and not faith in Christ crucified, is the condition of salvation, then the Cross has lost its offensive character to the Jew: οὐδὲ γὰρ οὗτος ὁ σταυρὸς ἦν ὁ σκανδαλίζων τοὺς Ἰουδαίους, ὡς τὸ μὴ δεῖν πείθεσθαι τοῖς πατρῴοις νόμοις. καὶ γὰρ τὸν Στέφανον προσενέγκοντες, οὐκ εἶπον ὅτι οὗτος τὸν ἐσταυρωμένον προσκυνεῖ, ἀλλ' ὅτι κατὰ τοῦ νόμου κ. τοῦ τόπου λέγει τοῦ ἁγίου. Chrys. 12.] The καί introduces a climax—I would (reff.) that they who are unsettling you would even . . . As to ἀποκόψονται, (1) it cannot be passive, as E. V., 'were even cut off.' (2) It can hardly mean 'would cut themselves off from your communion,' as the καί is against so mild a wish, besides that this sense of the word is unexampled. (3) There is certainly an allusion to ἐνέκοψεν in ver. 7, so that in reading aloud

the Greek, the stress would be, ὄφελ. κ. ἀποκόψονται οἱ ἀν. ὑμ. But (4) this allusion is one only of sound, and on account of the καί, all the more likely to be to some well-known and harsh meaning of the word, even as far as to which the Apostle's wish extends. And (5) such a meaning of the word is that in which (agreeably to its primitive classical sense, of hewing off limbs, see Lidd. and Scott) it is used by the LXX, ref. Deut., by Arrian, Epict. ii. 20, by Hesych., ὁ ἀπόκοπος, ἤτοι ὁ εὐνοῦχος—by Philo, de legg. special. ad vi. vii. dec. cap. § 7, vol. ii. p. 306, τὰ γεννητικὰ προσαπέκοψαν, — de vict. offerent. § 13, p. 261, θλαδίας κ. ἀποκεκομμένος τὰ γεννητικά (Wetst.). It seems to me that this sense must be adopted, in spite of the protests raised against it; e. g. that of Mr. Bagge recently, who thinks it "involves a positive insult to St. Paul" (?). And so Chrys., and the great consensus of ancient and modern Commentators: and, as Jowett very properly observes, "the common interpretation of the Fathers, confirmed by the use of language in the LXX, is not to be rejected only because it is displeasing to the delicacy of modern times."

ὄφελον is used in the N. T. as a mere particle: see reff.: also Hermann on Viger, p. 756-7, who says: "omnino observandum est, ὄφελον nonnisi tunc adhiberi, quum quis optat ut fuerit aliquid, vel sit, vel futurum sit, quod non fuit aut est aut futurum est." The construction with a future is very unusual; in Lucian, Solœc. 1, ὄφελον καὶ νῦν ἀκολουθῆσαι δυνήσῃ is given as an example of a solœcism. I need hardly enter a caution against the punctuation of a few mss. and editions, by which ὄφελον is taken alone, and the following future supposed to be assertive, as βαστάσει above, ver. 10. The reff. will shew, how alien such an usage is from the usage of the N. T. ἀναστατοῦντες, ἀνατρέποντες, Hesych. It belongs to later Greek: the classical expression is ἀνάστατον ποιεῖν, Polyb. iii. 81. 6 al.: or τιθέναι, Soph. Antig. 670: and it is said to belong to the Macedonian dialect. Ellic., referring to Tittmann, p. 266: where however I can find no such assertion.

13—CH. VI. 5.] THE THIRD OR HORTATORY PORTION OF THE EPISTLE, not however separated from the former, but united to it by the current of thought:—and, 13—15.] Though free, be one another's servants in love. γάρ gives the reason why the Apostle was so fervent in his denunciation of these disturbers; because they were striking at the very root of their Christian calling, which was for (on condition of; hardly, for the purpose of; see reff.) freedom. Only (make not) (so μή with the verb omitted and an accusative in μή 'μοιγε μύθους, Aristoph. Vesp. 1179; μὴ τριβὰς ἔτι, Soph. Antig. 577; μή μοι μυρίους μηδὲ δισμυρίους ξένους, Demosth. Phil. i. § 19. See more examples in Hartung, ii. 153) your liberty into (or, use it not for) an occasion (opportunity) for the flesh (for giving way to carnal passions), but by means of (your) love, be in bondage (opposition to ἐλευθερία) to one another. Chrys. remarks, πάλιν ἐνταῦθα αἰνίττεται, ὅτι φιλονεικία κ. στάσις κ. φιλαρχία κ. ἀπόνοια ταύτης αἰτία τῆς πλάνης αὐτοῖς ἐγένετο· ἡ γὰρ τῶν αἱρέσεων μήτηρ ἡ τῆς φιλαρχίας ἐστὶν ἐπιθυμία. 14.] See Rom. xiii. 8, 9. The rec. reading πληροῦται would mean merely 'is in course of being fulfilled,' whereas now it is, 'is fulfilled:' not 'comprehended' (Luth., Calv., Olsh., Winer, al.). "The question, how the Apostle can rightly say of the whole law, that it is fulfilled by loving one's neighbour, must not be answered by understanding νόμος of the Christian law (Koppe), or of the moral law only (Estius, al.), or of the second table of the decalogue (Beza, al.), or of every divinely revealed law in general (Schött.);—for ὁ πᾶς νόμος cannot, from the circumstances of the whole Epistle, mean any thing but 'the whole law of Moses:'—but by placing ourselves on the lofty spiritual level from which St. Paul looked down, and saw all other commands of the law so far subordinated to the law of love, that whoever had fulfilled this command, must be treated as having fulfilled the whole." Meyer: who also remarks that τὸν πλησίον σου applies to fellow-Christians; cf. ἀλλήλους below.

15.] ἀλλήλους has both times the emphasis. The form of the sentence is very like Matt. xxvi. 52, — πάντες οἱ λαβόντες μάχαιραν, ἐν μαχαίρᾳ ἀπολοῦνται, except that there λαβόντες, as having the stress, precedes. Chrys. says, ταῖς λέξεσιν ἐμφαντικῶς ἐχρήσατο. οὐ γὰρ εἶπε δάκνετε μόνον, ὅπερ ἐστὶ θυμουμένου, ἀλλὰ καὶ κατεσθίετε, ὅπερ ἐστὶν ἐμμένοντος τῇ πονηρίᾳ. ὁ μὲν γὰρ δάκνων, ὀργῆς ἐπλήρωσε πάθος· ὁ δὲ κατεσθίων, θηριώδας ἐσχάτης παρέσχεν ἀπόδειξιν, δήγματα δὲ κ. βρώσεις οὐ τὰς σωματικὰς φησιν, ἀλλὰ τὰς πολὺ χαλεπωτέρας. οὐ γὰρ οὕτως ὁ ἀνθρωπίνης ἀπογευσάμενος σαρκὸς ἔβλαψεν, ὡς ὁ δήγματα εἰς τὴν ψυχὴν πηγνύς· ὅσον γὰρ ψυχὴ τιμιωτέρα σώματος, τοσούτῳ χαλεπωτέρα ἡ ταύτης βλάβη.

σαρκός] the natural man:—that whole state of being in the flesh, out of which spring the practices and thoughts of ver. 19. οὐ μὴ τελέσητε] Is this (1) merely future in meaning, and a sequence on πνεύματι περιπ., 'and ye shall not fulfil,'—or is it (2) imperative, 'and fulfil not?' Ellic. in his note has shewn that this latter meaning is allowable, it being doubtful even in classical Greek whether there are not some instances of οὐ μή with the second person subjunctive imperatively used, and the tendency of later Greek being rather to use the subjunctive aorist for the future. And Meyer defends it on exegetical grounds. But surely (1) is much to be preferred on these same grounds. For the next and following verses go to shew just what this verse will then assert, viz., that the Spirit and the flesh exclude one another. 17.] Substantiation of the preceding,—that if ye walk by the Spirit, ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh. The second γάρ (see var. readd.) gives a reason for the continual ἐπιθυμεῖν of these two against one another: viz., that they are opposites.

result: but more is expressed by ἵνα. Winer gives the meaning well: "Atque hujus luctæ hoc est consilium, ut &c. Scil. τὸ πν. impedit vos, quo minus perficiatis τὰ τῆς σαρκός (ea, quæ ἡ σάρξ perficere cupit), contra ἡ σάρξ adversatur vobis ubi τὰ τοῦ πνεύματος peragere studetis;" and Bengel: "Spiritus obnititur carni et actioni malæ: caro, Spiritui et actioni bonæ, ut (ἵνα) neque illa neque hæc peragatur." The necessity of supposing an ecbatic meaning for ἵνα in theology is obviated by remembering, that with God, results are all purposed. See this verse expanded in Rom. vii. viii. as above: in vii. 20 we have nearly the same words, and the same construction. It is true that θέλειν there applies only to one side, the better will, striving after good: whereas here it must be taken 'sensu communi,' for 'will' in general, to whichever way inclined. So that our verse requires expansion, both in the direction of Rom. vii. 15—20,—and in the other direction, οὐ γὰρ ὃ θέλω (after the natural man) ποιῶ κακόν ἀλλ' ὃ οὐ θέλω ἀγαθόν, τοῦτο ποιῶ, —to make it logically complete. 18.] By this verse, the locus respecting the flesh and the Spirit is interwoven into the general argument, thus (cf. ver. 23): the law is made for the flesh, and the works of the flesh: the Spirit and flesh ἀντίκεινται: if (δέ bringing out the contrast between the treatment of both in ver. 17, and the selection of one side in this verse) then ye are led by (see Rom. ref., ὅσοι . . . . πνεύματι θεοῦ ἄγονται, οὗτοι υἱοί εἰσιν θεοῦ) the Spirit, ye are not under the law. This he proceeds to substantiate, by specifying the works of the flesh and of the Spirit. This interpretation is better than the merely practical one of Chrys., al., ὁ γὰρ πνεῦμα ἔχων ὑπὲρ χρή, σβέννυσι διὰ τούτου πονηρὰν ἐπιθυμίαν ἅπασαν ὁ δὲ τούτων ἀπαλλαγεὶς οὐ δεῖται τῆς ἀπὸ τοῦ νόμου βοηθείας, ὑψηλότερος πολλῷ τῆς ἐκείνου παραγγελίας γενόμενος,—for it is a very different thing οὐ δεῖσθαι νόμου, from οὐκ εἶναι ὑπὸ νόμον. 19—23.] substantiates (see above) ver. 18. 19.] φανερά (emphatic), plain to all, not needing, like the more hidden fruits of the Spirit, to be educed and specified: and therefore more clearly amenable to law, which takes cognizance of τὰ φανερά. ἅτινά ἐστιν] almost ='for example:' 'qualia sunt:' see on ch. iv. 24. ἀκαθ., impurity in general. ἀσελγ., ἑτοιμότης πρὸς πᾶσαν ἡδονήν, Etym. It does not seem to include necessarily the idea of lasciviousness: "Demosthenes, making mention of the blow which Meidias had given him, characterizes it as in keeping with the well-known ἀσέλγεια of the man (Meid. 514). Elsewhere he joins δεσποτικῶς and ἀσελγῶς and προπετῶς." Trench, New Test. Synonyms, p. 64. The best word for it seems to be wantonness, 'protervitas.' 20.] εἰδωλ., in its proper meaning of idolatry: not, as Olsh., 'sins of lust,' because of the unclean orgies of idolatry. φαρμ., either 'poisonings,' or 'sorceries.' The latter is preferable, as more frequently its sense in the LXX and N. T. (reff.), and because (Mey.) Asia was particularly addicted to sorceries (Acts xix. 19). θυμοί] passionate outbreaks. θυμὸς μέν ἐστι πρόσκαιρος, ὀργὴ δὲ πολυχρόνιος μητσικακία, Ammonius. διαφέρει δὲ θυμὸς ὀργῆς, τῷ θυμὸν μὲν εἶναι ὀργὴν ἀναθυμιωμένην κ. ἔτι ἐκκαιομένην, ὀργὴν δὲ ὄρεξιν ἀντιτιμωρήσεως. Orig. sel. in Ps. ii., vol. ii. 541: both cited by Trench, Syn. p. 146. ζῆλος, jealousy (in bad sense)—reff. ἐριθεῖαι] not 'strifes,' as E. V. and commonly, in error: see note on Rom. ii. 8,—but cabals, unworthy compassings of selfish ends. 21.] Wetst. N. T. ii. p. 147, traces in a note the later meanings of αἵρεσις. Here διχοστ., divisions, seems to lead to αἱρέσ., parties, composed of those who have chosen their self-willed line and adhere to it. Trench quotes Aug. (cont. Crescon. Don. ii. 7 (9), vol. ix. p. 471): "Schisma est recens congregationis ex aliquâ sententiarum diversitate dissensio: hæresis autem schisma inveteratum." But we must not think of an ecclesiastical meaning only, or chiefly here. φθόν., (φόν.)] see Rom. i. 29, where we have the same alliteration. ἃ προλ.] The construction of ἅ is exactly as John viii. 54, ὃν ὑμεῖς λέγετε ὅτι θεὸς ὑμῶν ἐστιν:—it is governed, but only as matter of reference, by προλέγω,—not to be joined by attraction with πράσσοντες, as Olsh., al. προλ. κ. προεῖπον] I forewarn you (now), and did forewarn you (when I was with you): the προ- in both cases pointing on to the great day of retribution. τὰ τοιαῦτα] The article generalizes τοιαῦτα, the things of this kind, i. e. all such things. See Ellic.'s note. βασ. θ. οὐ κλ.] See reff. 22.] καρπός, not ἔργα, τοῦ πνεύματος. The works of the flesh are no καρπός, see Rom. vi. 21. These are the only real fruit of men: see John xv. 1—8: compare also John iii. 20, note. They are, or are manifested in, ἔργα: but they are much more: whereas those others are nothing more, as to any abiding result for good. ἀγάπη—at the head, as chief—1 Cor. xiii. See Rom. xii. 9. χαρά, better merely joy, than as Winer, al., 'voluptas ex aliorum commodis percepta,' as opposed to φθόνος. We must not seek for a detailed logical opposition in the two lists, which would be quite alien from the fervid style of St. Paul. χρηστότης, ἀγαθωσ.] Jerome, comm. in loc., says, "Benignitas sive suavitas, quia apud Græcos χρηστότης utrumque sonat, virtus est lenis, blanda, tranquilla, et omnium bonorum apta consortio: invitans ad familiaritatem sui, dulcis alloquio, moribus temperata. Non multum bonitas (ἀγαθωσύνη) a benignitate diversa est, quia et ipsa ad beneficiendum videtur exposita. Sed in eo differt; quia potest bonitas esse tristior, et fronte severis moribus irrugata bene quidem facere et præstare quod poscitur: non tamen suavis esse consortio, et sua cunctos invitare dulcedine." Plato, deff. 412 e, defines χρηστότης, ἤθους ἁπλαστία μετ' εὐλογιστίας. ἀγαθωσ. is a Hellenistic word, see reff. Perhaps kindness and goodness would best represent the two words. πίστις, in the widest sense: faith, towards God and man: of love it is said, 1 Cor. xiii. 7, πάντα πιστεύει.

23.] πραΰτης seems to be well represented by meekness,—again, towards God and man: and ἐγκρ. by temperance,—the holding in of the lusts and desires.

τῶν τοιούτ. answers to τὰ τοιαῦτα above, and should therefore be taken as neuter, not masculine, as Chrys., al. This verse (see above on ver. 18) substantiates οὐκ ἐστὶ ὑπὸ νόμον—for if you are led by the Spirit, these are its fruits in you, and against these the law has nothing to say: see 1 Tim. i. 9, 10. 24.] Further confirmation of this last result, and transition to the exhortations of vv. 25, 26. But (contrast, the one universal choice of Christians, in distinction from the two catalogues) they who are Christ's crucified (when they became Christ's,—at their baptism, see Rom. vi. 2: not so well, 'have crucified,' as E. V.) the flesh, with its passions and its desires,—and therefore are entirely severed from and dead to the law, which is for the fleshly, and those passions and desires—on which last he founds,— 25.] If (no connecting particle—giving more vividness to the inference) we LIVE (emphatic—if, as we saw, having slain the flesh, our life depends on the Spirit) in (said to be a species of instrumental dative; but such usage is of very rare occurrence, and hardly ever undoubted. Here the dative is probably employed more as corresponding to the dative in the other member, than with strict accuracy. But it may be justified thus: our inner life, which is hid with Christ in God, Col. iii. 3, is lived πνεύματι [normal dative], the Spirit being its generator and upholder) the Spirit,—in the Spirit (emphatic) let us also walk (in our conduct in life: let our practical walk, which is led κατὰ προαίρεσιν of our own, be in harmony with that higher life in which we live before God by faith, and in the Spirit). 26.] connected with στοιχῶμεν above, by the first person,—and with ch. vi. 1, by the sense; and so forming a transition to the admonitions which follow. μὴ γινώμ., let us not become—efficiamur, vulg., Erasm.,—a mild, and at the same time a solemn method of warning. For while it seems to concede that they were not this as yet, it assumes that the process was going on which would speedily make them so. 'Let us not be,' of the E. V., misses this.

κενόδοξοι would include, as De W. observes, all worldly honour, as not an object for the Christian to seek, 1 Cor. i. 31; 2 Cor. x. 17. ἀλλήλ. προκαλ.] εἰς φιλονεικίας κ. ἔριδας, Chrys. nected however with the foregoing: see above), if a man be even surprised (προλημφθῇ has the emphasis, on account of the καί. This makes it necessary to assign a meaning to it which shall justify its emphatic position. And such meaning is clearly not found in the ordinary renderings. E. g. Chrysostom,—ἐὰν συναρπαγῇ, —so E. V. 'overtaken,' and De Wette, al., which could not be emphatic, but would be palliative: Grotius,—'si quis antea [h. e. antequam hæc ep. ad vos veniat] deprehensus fuerit:' Winer,—'etiam si [si vel] quis antea deprehensus fuerit in peccato, cum tamen [iterum peccantem] corrigite:' Olsh., who regards the προ- almost as expletive, betokening merely that the λαμβάνεσθαι comes in time before the καταρτίζειν. The only meaning which satisfies the emphasis is that of being caught in the fact, 'flagrante delicto,' before he can escape: which, though unusual, seems justified by ref. Wisd.: and so Meyer, Ellic., al.) in any transgression (with the meaning 'overtaken' for προλημφθῇ, falls also that of 'inadvertence' for παράπτωμα. The stronger meaning of 'sin,' is far commoner in St. Paul: see ref. Rom. and ib. v. 15, 16, 20; 2 Cor. v. 19; Eph. i. 7, ii. 1, 5; Col. ii. 13 bis), do ye, the spiritual ones (said not in irony, but bonâ fide: referring not to the clergy only, but to every believer), restore (Beza, Hammond, Bengel, al., have imagined an allusion to a dislocated limb being reduced into place: but the simple ethical sense is abundantly justified by examples: see Herodot., cited on 1 Cor. i. 10; Stob. i. 85, καταρτίζειν φίλους διαφερομένους [Ellic.]) such a person (see especially 1 Cor. v. 5, 11) in the spirit of meekness (beware of the silly hendiadys: Chrys. gives the right allusion, —οὐκ εἶπεν "ἐν πραότητι," ἀλλ' "ἐν πνεύματι πραότητος" δηλῶν ὅτι καὶ τῷ πνεύματι ταῦτα δοκεῖ, καὶ τὸ δύνασθαι μετ' ἐπιεικείας διορθοῦν τοὺς ἁμαρτάνοντας, χαρίσματός ἐστι πνευματικοῦ: and Ellic., "πν. here seems immediately to refer to the state of the inward Spirit, and ultimately to the Holy Spirit, as the in-working power. Cf. Rom. i. 4, viii. 15; 2 Cor. iv. 13; Eph. i. 17: in all of which cases πν. seems to indicate the Holy Spirit, and the abstract genitive the specific χάρισμα"),—looking to thyself (we have the same singling out of individuals from a multitude previously addressed in Thucyd. i. 42, ὃν ἐνθυμηθέντες, καὶ νεώτερός τις παρὰ πρεσβυτέρου μαθών, ἀξιοῦτω . . . . ἡμᾶς ἀμύνεσθαι. See more examples in Bernhardy, p. 421), lest thou also be tempted (on a similar occasion: notice the aorist). 2.] ἀλλήλων, prefixed and emphatic, has not been enough attended to. You want to become disciples of that Law which imposes heavy burdens on men: if you will bear burdens, bear ONE ANOTHER'S burdens, and thus fulfil (see var. readd.: notice aorist: by this act fulfil) the law of Christ,—a far higher and better law, whose only burden is love. The position of ἀλλήλων I conceive fixes this meaning, by throwing τὰ βάρη into the shade, as a term common to the two laws. As to the βάρη, the more general the meaning we give to it, the better it will accord with the sense of the command. The matter mentioned in the last verse led on to this: but this grasps far wider, extending to all the burdens which we can, by help and sympathy, bear for one another. There are some which we cannot: see below.

ἀναπλήρ., thoroughly fulfil: Ellic. quotes Plut. Poplicol. ii., ἀνεπλήρωσε τὴν βουλὴν ὀλιγανδροῦσαν, 'filled up the Senate.'

μηδὲν ὤν] there is (perhaps: but this must not be over-pressed, see Ellic.) a fine irony in the subjective μηδέν — 'being, if he would come to himself, and look on the real fact, nothing:' —whereas οὐδὲν ὄν expresses more the objective fact,—his real absolute worthlessness. See examples of both expressions in Wetst. h. l. φρεναπατᾷ] not found elsewhere: see ref. and James i. 26. The word seems to mean just as ἀπατῶν καρδίαν αὐτοῦ there: I should hardly hold Ellic.'s distinction: both are subjective deceits, and only to be got rid of by testing them with plain matter of fact. 4.] The test applied: emphasis on τὸ ἔργον, which (as Mey.) is the complex, the whole practical result of his life, see reff. δοκ.] put to the trial (reff.): not 'render δόκιμον,' which the word will not bear. κ. τότε] And then (after he has done this) he will have his matter of boasting (the article makes it subjective: the καύχημα, that whereof to boast, not without a slight irony,—whatever matter of boasting he finds, after such a testing, will be) in reference to himself alone (εἰς ἑαυ. μόν. emphatic—corresponds to εἰς τὸν ἕτ. below), and not (as matter of fact: not μή) in reference to the other, (or, his neighbour—the man with whom he was comparing himself: general in its meaning, but particular in each case of comparison). 5.] And this is the more advisable, because in the nature of things, each man's own load (of infirmities and imperfections and sins: not of 'responsibility,' which is alien from the context) will (in ordinary life: not 'at the last day,' which is here irrelevant, and would surely have been otherwise expressed: the βαστάσει must correspond with the βαστάζετε above, and be a taking up and carrying, not an ultimate bearing the consequences of) come upon himself to bear. φορτίον here, hardly with any allusion to Æsop's well-known fable (C. and H. ii. 182, edn. 2),—but,—as distinguished from βάρος, in which there is an idea of grievance conveyed,—the load imposed on each by his own fault. The future, in this sense of that which must be in the nature of things, is discussed by Bernhardy, pp. 377-8. 6—10.] Exhortation (in pursuance of the command in ver. 2, see below), to liberality towards their teachers, and to beneficence in general.

6.] κοινωνείτω most likely intransitive, as there does not appear to be an instance of its transitive use in the N. T. (certainly not Rom. xii. 13). But the two senses come nearly to the same: he who shares in the necessities of the saints, can only do so by making that necessity partly his own, i. e., by depriving himself to that extent, and communicating to them. On κατηχούμ. and κατηχῶν, see Suicer, Thes. sub voce. This meaning, of 'giving oral instruction,' is confined to later Greek: see Lidd. and Scott. δέ, as bringing out a contrast to the individuality of the last verse. τὸν λόγον, in its very usual sense of the Gospel,—the word of life. It is the accusative of reference or of second government, after κατηχούμενος, as in Acts xviii. 25. ἐν πᾶσ. ἀγ.] in all good things: the things of this life mainly, as the context shews. Nor does this meaning produce an abrupt break between vv. 5 and 6, and 6 and 7, as Meyer (who understands ἀγαθά of moral good; 'share with your teachers in all virtues:' i. e. 'imitate their virtues') maintains. From the mention of bearing one another's burdens, he naturally passes to one way, and one case, in which those burdens may be borne—viz. by relieving the necessities of their ministers (thus almost all Commentators); and then,

7.] regarding our good deeds done for Christ as a seed sown for eternity, he warns them not to be deceived: in this, as in other seed-times, God's order of things cannot be set at nought: whatever we sow, that same shall we reap. οὐ μυκτηρ.] is not mocked:—though men subjectively mock God, this mocking has no objective existence: there is no such thing as mocking of God in reality. μυκτηρίζειν λέγομεν τοὺς ἐν τῷ διαπαίζειν τινὰς τοῦτό πως τὸ μέρος (μυκτῆρα) ἐπισπῶντας, Etym. The final judgment is necessarily now introduced by the similitude (ὁ θερισμὸς—συντέλεια αἰῶνός ἐστιν, Matt. xiii. 39), but does not any the more belong to the context in ver. 5. 8.] ὅτι, for—i. e. and this will be an example of the universal rule. ὁ σπείρων, he that (now) soweth,—is now sowing.

φθοράν] (not ἀπώλειαν—as Phil. iii. 19) corruption—because the flesh is a prey to corruption, and with it all fleshly desires and practices come to nothing (De W.): see 1 Cor. vi. 13; xv. 50:—or perhaps in the stronger sense of φθορά (see 1 Cor. iii. 17; 2 Pet. ii. 12), destruction (Meyer). ἐκ τ. πν.] See Rom. viii. 11, 15—17. 9.] But (in our case, let there be no chance of the alternative: see Hartung, Partikell. i. 166) in well-doing (stress on καλόν) let us not be faint-hearted (on ἐγκ. and ἐκκ., see note, 2 Cor. iv. 1. It seems doubtful, whether such a word as ἐκκακέω exists at all in Greek, and whether its use by later writers and place in lexicons is not entirely due to these doubtful readings. See Ellic.'s note): for in due time (an expression of the pastoral Epistles, see reff.,—and Prolegomena to those Epistles, § i. 32, and note) we shall reap, if we do not faint (so reff., and Isocr., p. 322 a, ἵν' οὖν μὴ παντάπασιν ἐκλυθῶ, πολλῶν ἔτι μοι λεκτέων ὄντων). But though such a rendering would be unobjectionable (not requiring οὐ for μή, as Rück., al., for as Mey. rightly, the particle being subjective, μή would be in place), it would give a very vapid sense: whereas the other eminently suits the exhortation

In Isa. lviii. 7 'thy fellow-men' are called οἱ οἰκεῖοι τοῦ σπέρματός σου: so also in the examples from the later classics in Wetst., οἰκεῖοι φιλοσοφίας, — γεωγραφίας, — ὑλιγαρχίας, τυραννίδος,—τρυφῆς.

11—end.] POSTSCRIPT AND BENEDICTION. 11.] See in how large letters (in what great and apparently unsightly characters: see note on next verse. πηλίκοις will not bear the rendering (1) 'how many,' πόσοις,—or (2) 'what sort,' ποίοις:—but only (3) how great [reff.]. Nor can (3) be made to mean (1) by taking γράμματα for 'Epistle,' a sense unknown to St. Paul) I wrote (not strictly the epistolary scribebam, nor referring to the following verses only: but the aorist spoken as at the time when they would receive the Epistle, and referring I believe to the whole of it, see also below) with my own hand. I do not see how it is possible to avoid the inference that these words apply to the whole Epistle. If they had reference only to the passage in which they occur, would not γράφω have been used, as in 2 Thess. iii. 17? Again, there is no break in style here, indicating the end of the dictated portion, and the beginning of the written, as in Rom. xvi. 25; 2 Thess. iii. 17 al. I should rather believe, that on account of the peculiar character of this Epistle, St. Paul wrote it all with his own hand,—as he did the pastoral Epistles: and I find confirmation of this, in the partial resemblance of its style to those Epistles. (See Prolegomena, as above on ver. 9.) And he wrote it, whether from weakness of his eyes, or from choice, in large characters. 12.] As my Epistle, so my practice: I have no desire to make a fair show outwardly: my γράμματα are not εὐπρόσωπα (is there a further allusion to the same point in ὅσοι τῷ κανόνι τούτῳ στοιχήσουσιν, and even in στίγματα, below?) and I have no sympathy with these θέλοντες εὐπροσωπῆσαι ἐν σαρκί. The word εὐπροσωπεῖν occurs only here: but we have φαινοπροσωπεῖν, Cic. Att. vii. 21; xiv. 21: σεμνοπροσωπεῖν, Aristoph. Nub. 363. ἐν σαρκί, not merely 'in the flesh,' but in outward things, which belong to man's natural state: see ch. v. 19. οὗτοι, it is these who: see ver. 7. ἀναγκάζουσιν] are compelling:—go about to compel. τῷ σταυρῷ] dative of the cause, see reff. So Herod. iii. 15, ἔνθα τοῦ λοιποῦ διαιτᾶτο:—see numerous other examples in Wetstein. "τὸ λοιπόν continuum et perpetuum tempus significat,—ut apud Xen. Cyr. viii. 5. 24; τοῦ λοιποῦ autem repetitionem ejusdem facti reliquo tempore indicat, ut apud Aristoph. in Pace, v. 1684 [1050 Bekk.]." Hermann ad Viger., p. 706. But the above example from Herod. hardly seems to bear this out. Rather is a thing happening in time regarded as belonging to the period including it, and the genitive is one of possession. Against this Ellic., viewing the gen. as simply partitive, refers to Donalds. Gram. § 451: who however defines his meaning by saying "partitive, or, what is the same thing, possessive." This indeed must be the clear and only account of a partitive genitive. κόπ. παρεχ.] How? Thdrt. (hardly Chrys.), al., understand it of the trouble of writing more epistles —οὐκέτι, φησί, γράψαι τὶ πάλιν ἀνέξομαι· ἀντὶ δὲ γραμμάτων τοὺς μώλωπας δείκνυμι, κ. τῶν αἱκισμῶν τὰ σημεῖα. But it seems much more natural to take it of giving him trouble by rebellious conduct and denying his apostolic authority, seeing that it was stamped with so powerful a seal as he proceeds to state. ἐγὼ γάρ] for it is I (not the 'Judaizing teachers) who carry (perhaps as in ver. 5, and ch. v. 10,—bear, as a burden: but Chrys.'s idea seems more adapted to the 'feierlich' character of the sentence: οὐκ εἶπεν, ἔχω, ἀλλά, βαστάζω, ὅπερ τις ἐπὶ τροπαίοις μέγα φρονῶν ἢ σημείοις βασιλικοῖς: see reff. [2]) in (on) my body the marks of Jesus. τὰ στίγματα, —the marks branded on slaves to indicate their owners. So Herod. vii. 233, τοὺς πλεῦνας αὐτέων, κελεύσαντος Ξέρξεω, ἔστιζον στίγματα βασιλήϊα: and in another place (ii. 113) is a passage singularly in point: ὅτεῳ ἀνθρώπων ἐπιβάληται στίγματα ἱρά, ἑωυτὸν διδοὺς τῷ θεῷ, οὐκ ἔξεστι τούτου ἅψασθαι. See many more examples in Wetst. These marks, in St. Paul's case, were of course the scars of his wounds received in the service of his Master—cf. 2 Cor. xi. 23 ff. Ἰησοῦ is the genitive of possession,—answering to the possessive βασιλήϊα in the extract above. There is no allusion whatever to any similarity between himself and our Lord, 'the marks which Jesus bore;' such an allusion would be quite irrelevant: and with its irrelevancy falls a whole fabric of Romanist superstition which has been raised on this verse, and which the fair and learned Windischman, giving as he does the honest interpretation here, yet attempts to defend in a supplemental note. Neither can we naturally suppose any comparison intended between these his στίγματα as Christ's servant, and circumcision: for he is not now on that subject, but on his authority as sealed by Christ: and such a comparison is alien from the majesty of the sentence. 18.] THE APOSTOLIC BLESSING. No special intention need be suspected in πνεύματος (ἀπάγων αὐτοὺς τῶν σαρκικῶν, Chrys.), as the same expression occurs at the end of other Epistles (reff.). I should rather regard it as a deep expression of his Christian love, which is further carried on by ἀδελφοί, the last word,—parting from them, after an Epistle of such rebuke and warning, in the fulness of brotherhood in Christ.

διὰ θελ. θεοῦ] See on 1 Cor. i. 1. As these words there have a special reference, and the corresponding ones in Gal. i. 1 also, so it is natural to suppose that here he has in his mind, hardly perhaps the especial subject of vv. 3—11, the will of the Father as the ground of the election of the church, but, which is more likely in a general introduction to the whole Epistle, the great subject of which he is about to treat, and himself as the authorized expositor of it. τ. οὖσιν ἐν Ἐφ.] On this, and on Ephesus, see Prolegomena. On ἁγίοις, see Ellicott's note. It is used here in its widest sense, as designating the members of Christ's visible Church, presumed to fulfil the conditions of that membership: cf. especially ch. v. 3. καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν χ. Ἰ.] These words follow rather unusually, separated from τ. ἁγ. by the designation of abode: a circumstance which might seem to strengthen the suspicion against ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, were not such transpositions by no means unexampled in St. Paul. See the regular order in Col. i. 2. The omission of the article before πιστ. shews that the same persons are designated by both adjectives. Its insertion would not, however, prove the contrary.

Christ Jesus. This, in its highest sense, 'qui fidem præstant,' not mere truth, or faithfulness, is imported: see reff. The ἁγίοις and πιστοῖς denote their spiritual life from its two sides—that of God who calls and sanctifies,—that of themselves who believe. So Bengel, 'Dei est, sanctificare nos et sibi asserere; nostrum, ex Dei munere, credere.' Stier remarks that by πιστ. ἐν χ. Ἰ.,—ἁγίοις gets its only full and N. T. meaning. He also notices in these expressions already a trace of the two great divisions of the Epistle—God's grace towards us, and our faith towards Him. 2.] After χάρις ὑμ. κ. εἰρ. supply rather εἴη than ἔστω; see 1 Pet. i. 2; 2 Pet. i. 2; Jude 2. On the form of greeting, cf. Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 3; 2 Cor. i. 2; Gal. i. 3, &c. The Socinian perversion of the words, 'from God, who is the Father of us and of our Lord Jesus Christ,' is decisively refuted by Tit. i. 4, not to mention that nothing but the grossest ignorance of St. Paul's spirit could ever allow such a meaning to be thought of. We must not fall into the error of refining too much, as Stier, on χάρις and εἰρήνη, as referring respectively to ἁγίοις and πιστοῖς: see ‖ above, where these last epithets do not occur.

3—III. 21.] FIRST PORTION OF THE EPISTLE: THE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH OF CHRIST. And herein, I. 3—23.] GROUND AND ORIGIN OF THE CHURCH, IN THE FATHER'S COUNSEL, AND HIS ACT IN CHRIST, BY THE SPIRIT. And herein again, (A) the preliminary IDEA OF THE CHURCH, set forth in the form of an ascription of praise vv. 3—14:—thus arranged:—vv. 3—6] The FATHER, in His eternal Love, has chosen us to holiness (ver. 4),—ordained us to sonship (ver. 5),—bestowed grace on us in the Beloved (ver. 6):—vv. 7—12] In the SON, we have,—redemption according to the riches of His grace (ver. 7), knowledge of the mystery of His will (vv. 8, 9),—inheritance under Him the one Head (vv. 10—12):—vv. 13, 14] through the SPIRIT we are sealed,—by hearing the word of salvation (ver. 13),—by receiving the earnest of our inheritance (ver. 14),—to the redemption of the purchased possession (ib.). 3.] Blessed (see note on Rom. ix. 5. Understand εἴη (Job i. 21; Ps. cxii. 2; or ἔστω, 2 Chron. ix. 8. Ellicott)—'Be He praised.' See a similar doxology, 2 Cor. i. 3. Almost all St. Paul's Epistles begin with some ascription of praise. That to Titus is the only exception [not Gal.: cf. Gal. i. 5]. See also 1 Pet. i. 3) be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (cf. Rom. xv. 6; 2 Cor. i. 3; xi. 31; Col. i. 3—also 1 Cor. xv. 24. Such is the simplest and most forcible sense of the words—as Thl., ἴδιον κ. θεὸν κ. πατὴρ τοῦ αὐτοῦ κ. ἑνὸς χριστοῦ· θεὸς μέν, ὡς σαρκωθέντος· πατὴρ δέ, ὡς θεοῦ λόγου. See John xx. 17, from which saying of our Lord it is not improbable that the expression took its rise. Meyer maintains, 'God who is also the Father of . . . .:' on the ground that only πατήρ, not θεός, requires a genitive supplied. But we may fairly reply that, if we come to strictness of construction, his meaning would require ὁ θεός, ὁ καὶ πατήρ. Harless's objection, that on our rendering it must be ὁ θεὸς τε καὶ π., is well answered by Meyer from 1 Pet. ii. 25, τὸν ποιμένα κ. ἐπίσκοπον τῶν ψυχῶν ὑμῶν. Ellicott prefers Meyer's view, but pronounces the other both grammatically and doctrinally tenable), who blessed (aor.: not 'hath blessed:' the historical fact in the counsels of the Father being thought of throughout the sentence. εὐλογητός—εὐλογήσας——εὐλογία—such was the ground-tone of the new covenant. As in creation God blessed them, saying, 'Be fruitful and multiply,'—so in redemption,—at the introduction of the covenant, "all families of the earth shall be BLESSED,"—at its completion,—"Come ye BLESSED of my Father." But God's blessing is in facts—ours in words only) us (whom? not the Apostle only: nor Paul and his fellow-Apostles:—but, ALL CHRISTIANS—all the members of Christ. which, and means by which, the blessing is imparted) all (i. e. all possible—all, exhaustive, in all richness and fulness of blessing: cf. ver. 23 note) blessing of the Spirit (not merely, 'spiritual [inward] blessing:' πνευματικός in the N. T. always implies the working of the Holy Spirit, never bearing merely our modern inaccurate sense of spiritual as opposed to bodily. See 1 Cor. ix. 11, which has been thus misunderstood) in the heavenly places (so the expression, which occurs five times in this Epistle [see reff.], and nowhere else, can only mean: cf. ver. 20. It is not probable that St. Paul should have chosen an unusual expression for the purposes of this Epistle, and then used it in several different senses. Besides, as Harless remarks, the preposition ἐπί in composition with adjectives gives usually a local sense: e. g. in ἐπίγειος, ἐπιχθόνιος, ἐπουράνιος, as compared with γήϊνος, χθόνιος, οὐράνιος. Chrys., al., would understand it 'heavenly blessings,' in which case the Apostle would hardly have failed to add χαρίσμασιν, or ἀγαθοῖς, or the like.

But, with the above rendering, what is the sense? Our country, πολίτευμα, is in heaven, Phil. iii. 20: there our High Priest stands, blessing us. There are our treasures, Matt. vi. 20, 21, and our affections to be, Col. iii. 1 ff.: there our hope is laid up, Col. i. 5: our inheritance is reserved for us, 1 Pet. i. 4. And there, in that place, and belonging to that state, is the εὐλογία, the gift of the Spirit, Heb. vi. 4, poured out on those who τὰ ἄνω φρονοῦσιν. Materially, we are yet in the body: but in the Spirit, we are in heaven—only waiting for the redemption of the body to be entirely and literally there.

I may once for all premise, that it will be impossible, in the limits of these notes, to give even a synopsis of the various opinions on the rich fulness of doctrinal expressions in this Epistle. I must state in each case that which appears to me best to suit the context, and those variations which must necessarily be mentioned, referring to such copious commentaries as Harless or Stier for further statement) in Christ ("the threefold ἐν after εὐλογήσας, has a meaning ever deeper and more precise: and should therefore be kept in translating. The blessing with which God has blessed us, consists and expands itself in all blessing of the Spirit—then brings in Heaven, the heavenly state in us, and us in it—then finally, CHRIST, personally, He Himself, who is set and exalted into Heaven, comes by the Spirit down into us, so that He is in us and we in Him of a truth, and thereby, and in so far, we are with Him in heaven." Stier). 4.] According as (καθώς explains and expands the foregoing—shewing wherein the εὐλογία consists as regards us, and God's working towards us. Notice, that whereas ver. 3 has summarily included in the work of blessing the Three Persons, the FATHER bestowing the SPIRIT in CHRIST,—now the threefold cord, so to speak, is unwrapped, and the part of each divine Person separately described: cf. argument above) He selected us (reff. I render selected, in preference to elected, as better giving the middle sense,—'chose for himself,'—and the ἐξ., that it is a choosing out of the world. The word [ref. Deut.] is an O. T. word, and refers to the spiritual Israel, as it did to God's elect Israel of old. But there is no contrast between their election and ours: it has been but one election throughout—an election in Christ, and to holiness on God's side—and involving accession to God's people [cf. πιστεύσαντες, ver. 13, and εἶγε ἐπιμένετε τῇ πίστει, Col. i. 23] on ours. See Ellicott's note on the word, and some excellent remarks in Stier, p. 62, on the divine and human sides of the doctrine of election as put forward in this Epistle) in Him (i. e. in Christ, as the second Adam [1 Cor. xv. 22], the righteous Head of our race. In Him, in one wide sense, were all mankind elected, inasmuch as He took their flesh and blood, and redeemed them, and represents them before the Father: but in the proper and final sense, this can be said only of His faithful ones, His Church, who are incorporated in Him by the Spirit. But in any sense, all God's election is in HIM only) before the foundation of the world (πρὸ καταβ. κ. only here in St. Paul: we have ἀπὸ καταβ. κ. in Heb. iv. 3; his expressions elsewhere are πρὸ

[In edn. 6, the treatment of the inf. of the purpose without the art. τοῦ, seems to have been inadvertently omitted.] The Apostle seems to have Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2, before his mind; in both which places the same construction occurs) holy and blameless (the positive and negative sides of the Christian character—ἅγιοι, of the general positive category,—ἄμωμοι, of the non-existence of any exception to it. So Plut. Pericl., p. 173 [Mey.], βίος καθαρὸς κ. ἀμίαντος. This holiness and unblameableness must not be understood of that justification by faith by which the sinner stands accepted before God: it is distinctly put forth here [see also ch. v. 27] as an ultimate result as regards us, and refers to that sanctification which follows on justification by faith, and which is the will of God respecting us, 1 Thess. iv. 7. See Stier's remarks against Harless, p. 71) before Him (i. e. in the deepest verity of our being—throughly penetrated by the Spirit of holiness, bearing His searching eye, ch. v. 27: but at the same time implying an especial nearness to His presence and dearness to Him—and bearing a foretaste of the time when the elect shall be ἐνώπιον τοῦ θρόνου τοῦ θεοῦ, Rev. vii. 15. Cf. Col. i. 22, note) in love. There is considerable dispute as to the position and reference of these words. Three different ways are taken. (1) Œcum., &c., join them with ἐξελέξατο. I do not see, with most Commentators, the extreme improbability of the qualifying clause following the verb after so long an interval, when we take into account the studied solemnity of the passage, and remember that ἐν χριστῷ in the last verse was separated nearly as far from its verb εὐλογήσας. My objection to this view is of a deeper kind: see below. (2) The Syr., Chrys., Thdrt., Thl., Bengel, Lachm., Harless, Olsh., Mey., De W., Stier, Ellic., all., join them with προορίσας in the following verse. To this, in spite of all that has been so well said in its behalf, there is an objection which seems to me insuperable. It is, that in the whole construction of this long sentence, the verbs and participles, as natural in a solemn emphatic enumeration of God's dealings with His people, precede their qualifying clauses: e. g. εὐλογήσας ver. 3, ἐξελέξατο ver. 4, ἐχαρίτωσεν ver. 6, ἐπερίσσευσεν ver. 8, γνωρίσας ver. 9, προέθετο ib., ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι ver. 10. In no one case, except the necessary one of a relative qualification (ἧς ver. 6, and again ver. 8), does the verb follow its qualifying clause: and for this reason, that the verbs themselves are emphatic, and not the conditions under which they subsist. "Blessed be God who DID all this, &c." He may have fore-ordained, and did fore-ordain, in love: and this is implied in what follows, from κατὰ τ. εὐδ. to ἠγαπημένῳ: but the point brought out, as that for which we are to bless Him, is not that in love He fore-ordained us, but the fact of that fore-ordination itself: not His attribute, but His act. It is evidently no answer to this, to bring forward sentences elsewhere in which ἐν ἀγάπῃ stands first, such as ch. iii. 18, where the spirit of the passage is different. (3) The vulg., Ambrst., Erasm., Luth., Castal., Beza, Calvin, Grot., all., join them, as in the text, with εἶναι . . . . ἀμώμους κατ. αὐτοῦ. This has been strongly impugned by the last-mentioned set of Commentators: mainly on the ground that the addition of ἐν ἀγάπῃ to ἁγ. κ. ἀμώμ. κατ. αὐτοῦ, is ungrammatical,—is flat and superfluous,—and that in neither ch. v. 27, nor Col. i. 22, have these adjectives any such qualification. But in answer, I would submit, that in the first place, as against the construction of ἐν ἀγ. with ἀμώμ., the objection is quite futile, for our arrangement does not thus construct it, but adds it as a qualifying clause to the whole εἶναι . . . . αὐτοῦ. Next, I hold the qualification to be in the highest degree solemn and appropriate. ἀγάπη, that which man lost at the Fall, but which God is, and to which God restores man by redemption, is the great element in which, as in their abode and breathing-place, all Christian graces subsist, and in which, emphatically, all perfection before God must be found. And so, when the Apostle, ch. iv. 16, is describing the glorious building up of the body, the Church, he speaks of its increasing εἰς οἰκοδομὴν ἑαυτοῦ ἐν ἀγάπῃ. And it his practice, in this and the parallel Epistle, to add ἐν ἀγάπῃ as the completion of the idea of Christian holiness—cf. ch. iii. 18; Col. ii. 2, also ch. iv. 2; v. 2. With regard to the last objection,—in both the places cited, the adjectives are connected with the verb παραστῆσαι, expressed therefore in the abstract as the ultimate result of sanctification in the sight of the Father, not, as here, referring to the state of sanctification, as consisting and subsisting in love. 5.] Having predestined us (subordinate to the ἐξελέξατο: see Rom. viii. 29, 30, where the steps are thus laid down in succession;—οὓς προέγνω, καὶ προώρισεν — οὓς προώρισεν, τούτους καὶ ἐκάλεσεν. Now the ἐκλογή must answer in this rank to the προέγνω, and precede the προώρισεν. Stier remarks well, "In God, indeed, all is one; but for our anthropomorphic way of speaking and treating, which is necessary to us, there follows on His first decree to adopt and to sanctify, the nearer decision, how and by what this shall be brought about, because it could only thus be brought about." προ,—as Pelagius [in Harless],—"ad eos refertur qui antea non fuerunt, et priusquam fierent, de his cogitatum est et postea substiterunt") unto adoption (so that we should become His sons, in the blessed sense of being reconciled to Him and having a place in His spiritual family,—should have the remission of our sins, the pledge of the Spirit, the assurance of the inheritance) through Jesus Christ (THE SON of God, in and by whom, elementally and instrumentally, our adoption consists, cf. Rom. viii. 29, προώρισεν συμμόρφους τῆς εἰκόνος τ. υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ, εἰς τὸ εἶναι αὐτὸν πρωτότοκον ἐν πολλοῖς ἀδελφοῖς) to Him (the Father: see Col. i. 20, δι' αὐτοῦ [Christ] ἀποκαταλλάξαι τὰ πάντα εἰς αὐτόν [the Father]. So Thdrt., all., Harl., Olsh., Meyer, Stier: and rightly, for the Son could not be in this sentence the terminus ultimus [the whole reference being to the work and purpose of the Father]; and had this been intended, as Harl. remarks, we must have had καὶ εἰς αὐτόν. De W., who, after Anselm, Tho.-Aq., Castal., all., refers it to the Son, fails to answer this objection of Harl.'s. But now arise two questions: (1) the meaning. Does it merely represent ἑαυτῷ, a dativus commodi? So Grot., al., but it cannot be, after the insertion of the special διὰ Ἰ. χ., that the sentence should again return to the general purpose. It seems much better, to join it with διὰ Ἰ. χ. as in Col. i. 20, above: and so Harl., but too indefinitely, taking it only as a phrase common with the Apostle and not giving its full import. As in Col. i. 20, the εἰς αὐτόν, though thus intimately connected with δι' αὐτοῦ, depends on ἀποκαταλλάξαι, so here it must depend on υἱοθεσίαν, and its import must be 'to [into] Himself,'—i. e. so that we should be partakers of the divine nature: cf. 2 Pet. i. 4. (2) Should we read αὐτόν or αὐτόν? It will depend on whether we refer this clause, from διά to κατά, to the Father as its subject, or consider it as a continuation of the Apostle's thanksgiving. And the latter is much the most likely; for had the former been the case, we should probably have had, instead of διὰ Ἰησ. χριστοῦ, διὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ Ἰ. χρ., so that reference to the Father might still be kept up. I decide therefore for αὐτόν, as Thdrt. certainly read, or his remark, τὸ δὲ εἰς αὐτόν, τὸν πατέρα λέγει, would have been needless. And so Erasm., Wetst., Lachm., Harl., Olsh., Meyer. Then αὐτοῦ in ver. 6 naturally takes it up again) according to (in pursuance of) the good pleasure (it is disputed whether εὐδοκία has here merely this general meaning of beneplacitum, or that of benevolentia. Harl. [see also Ellicott] examines thoroughly the use of the word by the LXX, and decides in favour of the latter, alleging especially, that a mere assertion of doctrine would be out of place in an ascription of thanksgiving. But surely this is a most unfortunate position. The facts on which doctrines rest are here the very subjects of the Apostle's thanksgiving: and the strict parallels of Matt. xi. 26, Luke x. 21, should have kept him from adducing it. Granting, as we must, both senses to εὐδοκεῖν and εὐδοκία, the context must in each case determine which is meant. And its testimony here is clear. It is, as De W. remarks, not in προωρισμένοι, but in προορίσας, that the object, to which εὐδοκία refers, is to be sought: and the subsequent recurrences to the same idea in ver. 9 and ver. 11 point out that it is not the Father's benevolentia, but His beneplacitum, which is in the Apostle's mind. And so Meyer, De W., Stier, and Ellic. This beneplacitum WAS benevolentia, ver. 6; but that does not affect the question. See, besides Harl., a long note in Fritz. on Romans ii. p. 369) of His will, 6.] to (with a view to, as the purpose of the predestination) the praise (by men and angels—all that can praise) of the glory of His grace (beware of the miserable hendiadys, 'His glorious grace,' by which all the richness and depth of meaning are lost. The end, God's end, in our predestination to adoption, is, that the glory,—glorious nature, brightness and majesty, and kindliness and beauty,—of His grace might be an object of men and angels' praise: both as it is in HIM, ineffable and infinite,—and exemplified in us, its objects; see below, ver. 12. "Owing to the defining genitive, the article (before δόξης) is not indispensable: see Winer, edn. 6, § 19. 2, b: compare Madvig, Synt. § 10. 2." Ellic.) which (there is some difficulty in deciding between the readings, ἐν ᾗ, and ἧς. The former would be the most naturally substituted for an attraction found difficult: and the existence of ᾗ, as a reading, seems to point this way. The latter, on the other hand, might perhaps be written by a transcriber carelessly, χάριτος having just preceded. But I own this does not seem to me very probable. A relative following a substantive, is as often in a different case, as in the same: and there could be no temptation to a transcriber to write ἧς here, which could hardly occur at all unless by attraction, a construction to which transcribers certainly were not prone. I therefore, with Lachm., Mey., Rück, al., adopt ἧς. Considerations of the exigencies of the sense, alleged by Harl., al., do not come into play unless where external authorities are balanced [which is the case here], and probabilities of alteration also [which is not]) He bestowed upon us (the meaning of χαριτόω is disputed. The double meaning of χάρις, —favour, grace bestowed, and that which ensures favour, viz. grace inherent, beauty, —has been supposed to give a double meaning to the verb also,—to confer grace, and to render gracious, or beautiful, or acceptable. And this latter sense is adopted, here and in Luke i. 28 [where see note], by many,—e. g. by Chrys., τουτέστιν, οὐ μόνον ἁμαρτημάτων ἀπήλλαξεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐκπρεπεστέρους ἐποίησε,—Erasm., Luth., all. But the meaning of χάρις, on which this is founded, does not seem to occur in the N. T., certainly not in St. Paul. And χαριτόω, both here and in l. c., according to the analogy of such verbs, will be 'to bestow grace.' Another reason for this sense is the indefinite aorist, referring to an act of God once past in Christ, not to an abiding state which He has brought about in us. This, as usual, has been almost universally overlooked, and the perfect sense given. Another still is, the requirement of the context. Harl. well remarks, that, according to the sense 'bestowed grace,' ver. 7 is the natural answer to the question, 'How hath He bestowed grace?' whereas, on the other rendering, it has only a mediate connexion with this verse. Stier would unite both meanings; but surely this is impossible. The becoming χαριτωμένοι may be a consequence of being κεχαριτωμένοι, but must be quite independent of its verbal meaning. Conyb. remarks that it may be literally rendered 'His favour, wherewith He favoured us:' but 'favour' would not reach deep enough for the sense) in (see above on ἐν χριστῷ, ver. 3. Christ is our Head and including Representative) the Beloved (i. e. Christ: = υἱὸν τῆς ἀγάπης αὐτοῦ, Col. i. 13. He is God's ἠγαπημένος κατ' ἐξοχήν,—cf. Matt. iii. 17; John iii. 16; 1 John iv. 9—11). 7.] Now the Apostle passes, with ἐν ᾧ, to the consideration of the ground of the church in the SON (7—12): see the synopsis above. But the Father still continues the great subject of the whole;—only the reference is now to the Son. In whom (see on ἐν χρ. ver. 3—cf. Rom. iii. 24) we have (objective—'there is for us.' But

The article expresses notoriety—'of which we all know,'—'of which the law testified, and the prophets spoke') through (as the instrument:—a further fixing of the ἐν ᾧ) His blood (which was the price paid for that redemption, Acts xx. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 20; both the ultimate climax of His obedience for us, Phil. ii. 8, and, which is most in view here,—the propitiation, in our nature, for the sin of the world, Rom. iii. 25; Col. i. 20. It is a noteworthy observation of Harless here, that the choice of the word, the BLOOD of Christ, is of itself a testimony to the idea of expiation having been in the writer's mind. Not the death of the victim, but its BLOOD, was the typical instrument of expiation. And I may notice that in Phil. ii. 8, where Christ's obedience, not His atonement, is spoken of, there is no mention of His shedding His Blood, only of the act of His Death), the remission (not "overlooking" [πάρεσιν]; see note on Rom. iii. 25) of (our) transgressions (explanation of τ. ἀπολύτρωσιν: not to be limited, but extending to all riddance from the practice and consequences of our transgressions: at least equipollent with ἀπολύτρωσις:—so Thdrt., δι' ἐκείνου γὰρ τὰς τῶν ἁμαρτημάτων ἀποθέμενοι κηλῖδας, κ. τῆς τοῦ τυράννου δουλείας ἀπαλλαγέντες, τοὺς τῆς εἰκόνος τῆς θείας ἀνελάβομεν χαρακτῆρας. This against Harless), according to the riches (Ellic. compares Plato, Euthyphr. 12 A, τρυφᾷς ὑπὸ πλούτου τῆς σοφίας) of His grace (this alone would prevent ἄφεσις applying to merely the forgiveness of sins. As Passavant [in Stier], "We have in this grace not only redemption from misery and wrath, not only forgiveness,—but we find in it the liberty, the glory, the inheritance of the children of God,—the crown of eternal life: cf. 2 Cor. viii. 9"), 8.] which he shed abundantly ('caused to abound:' ἀφθόνως ἐξέχεε, Thl.: Thdrt. has the same idea, ἀναβλύζει γὰρ τὰς τοῦ ἐλέους πηγάς, κ. τούτοις ἡμᾶς περικλύζει τοῖς ῥεύμασιν. The E. V. is wrong, 'wherein He hath abounded:' no such construction of attraction of a dative being found in the N. T. Calvin and Beza would take ἧς not as an attraction, but as the genitive after ἐπερίσ. as in Luke xv. 17, 'of which He was full, &c.' But this does not agree well with the γνωρίσας, &c. below. As little can the 'quæ superabundavit' of the Vulg. [and Syr.] stand: the attraction of the nominative being scarcely possible, and this being still more inconsistent with γνωρίσας) forth to us in all (possible) wisdom and prudence (with E. V., De Wette, &c., I would refer these words to God. On the other hand, Harless [with whom are Olsh., Stier, Ellic., al.] maintains, that neither πάσῃ nor φρονήσει will allow this. "πᾶς," he says, "never = summus,—never betokens the intension, but only the extension, never the power, but the frequency,—and answers to our 'every,' i. e. all possible;—so that, when joined to abstracts, it presents them to us as concrete: πᾶσα δύναμις, 'every power that we know of,' 'that exists;'—πᾶσα ὑπομονή, every kind of endurance that we know of;—πᾶσα ἐνσέβεια, &c. Now it is allowable enough, to put together all excellences of one species, and allege them as the motive of a human act, because we can conceive of men as wanting in any or all of them: but not so with God, of whom the Apostle, and all of us, conceive as the Essence of all perfection. We may say of God, 'in Him is all wisdom,' but not, 'He did this or that in all wisdom.'" "Again," he continues, "φρόνησις cannot be ascribed to God." And this he maintains,—not by adopting the view of Wolf, al., that it is practical knowledge, which suits neither the context nor usage,—nor that of Anselm, Bengel, al., that σοφ. is 'de præsentibus,' φρον. 'de futuris,'—but by understanding σοφία of the normal collective state of the spirit, with reference especially to the intelligence, which last is expressed according to its various sides, by the words so often found conjoined with σοφία,—σύνεσις, φρόνησις, γνῶσις. So that φρόνησις, as a one-sided result of σοφία, cannot be predicated of God, but only of men. According to this then, ἐν πάσ. σ. κ. φρ. must refer to that in the bestowal of which on us He hath made His grace to abound, so that we should thereby become σοφοὶ κ. φρόνιμοι:—as Olsh., ἵνα ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ κ. φρονήσει περισσεύσωμεν. Chrys. joins the words with γνωρίσας, understanding them, however, of us, not of God: ἐν π. σοφ. κ. φρ., φησί, γνωρίσας ἡμ. τὸ μ. τ. θ. αὐτ.· τουτέστι, σοφοὺς κ. φρονίμους ποιήσας τὴν ὄντως σοφίαν, τὴν ὄντως φρόνησιν. But see, on such arrangement, the note on ἐν ἀγάπῃ ver. 4.

Stier quotes from Passavant: "In the living knowledge of the thoughts and ways of God we first get a sure and clear light upon ourselves and our ways, a light cast from above upon the import and aim of this our earthly life in the sight of God and His eternity. Here is the true wisdom of the heart, the true prudence of life." But against this view, De W. alleges, (1) that φρόνησις can be as well predicated of God as γνῶσις, Rom. xi. 33, and is actually thus predicated, Prov. iii. 19; Jer. x. 12 LXX, of His creative wisdom, which is analogous to His redemptive wisdom. (2) that God's absolute wisdom is not here treated of, but His relative wisdom, as apparent in the use of means subservient to its end: so that ἐν πάσῃ would mean 'in all wisdom thereto belonging,' as Jer.: 'Deus in omni sapientia sua atque prudentia, juxta quod consequi poterant, mysterium revelavit.' And he compares ἡ πολυποίκιλος σοφία τ. θ. ch. iii. 10.

These last arguments are weighty, as shewing the legitimacy of the application to God: but even beyond them is that which construction and usage furnish. It would be hardly possible, did no other consideration intervene, to refer this ἐν π. σ. κ. φρ. to other than the subject of the sentence,—cf. ἧς ἐχαρ. ἡμᾶς ἐν τῷ ἠγαπ. above. I therefore decide [still; after reconsideration of Ellicott's note] for the application to God, not to us. It was in His manifold wisdom and prudence, manifested in all ways possible for us, that He poured out His grace upon us: and this wisdom and prudence was especially exemplified in that which follows, the notification to us of His hidden will, &c. In Col. i. 9, the reference is clearly different: see note there), having made known (γνωρίσας is explicative of ἐπερίσσευσεν, just as προορίσας is of ἐξελέξατο above:—'in that He made known.' This 'making known' is not merely the information of the understanding, but the revelation, in its fulness, to the heart) to us (not, the Apostles, but Christians in general, as throughout the passage) the mystery (reff. and Rom. xvi. 25. St. Paul ever represents the redemptive counsel of God as a mystery, i. e. a design hidden in His counsels, until revealed to mankind in and by Christ. So that his use of μυστήρ. has nothing in common, except the facts of concealment and revelation, with the mysteries of the heathen world, nor with any secret tradition over and above the gospel as revealed in the Scriptures. All who vitally know that, i. e. all the Christian church are the initiated: and all who have the word, read or preached, may vitally know it. Only the world without, the unbelieving, are the uninitiated) of (objective genitive, 'the material of which mystery was, &c.') His will (that which He purposed), according to His good pleasure (belongs to γνωρίσας, and specifies it: not to θελήμ. [τοῦ κατὰ τ. ε. αὐ.]: i. e. so that the revelation took place in a time and manner consonant to God's eternal pleasure—viz. εἰς οἰκον., &c. On εὐδοκ., see above ver. 5) which He purposed (reff.) in Himself (ἐν αὐτῷ is read, and referred (1) to Christ, by Chrys. and the ff., Anselm, Bengel, Luther, all. But this is impossible, because ἐν τῷ χριστῷ is introduced with the proper name below, which certainly would not occur on the second mention after ἐν αὐτῷ, in the same reference: (2) to the Father, by Harless. But this is equally impossible. For αὐτῷ to refer to the subject of the sentence, we must have the mind of the reader removed one step from that subject by an intermediate idea supervening, as in κατὰ τὴν εὐδοκίαν αὐτοῦ. Had this been κατὰ τ. πρόθεσιν αὐτοῦ, the reference would have been legitimate. But when, as here, no such idea intervenes,—ἣν προέθετο ἐν αὐτῷ—the subject is directly before the mind, and αὐτός, not being reflective but demonstrative, must point to some other person: who in this case can only be Christ. Our only resource then is to read αὐτῷ) in order to (belongs to προέθετο, not to γνωρίσας. Very many ancient Commentators and the Vulg. and E. V., take εἰς wrongly as = ἐν, by which the whole sense is confused. Hardly less confusing is the rendering of Erasm., Calv., Est., al., usque ad tempus dispensationis, thereby introducing into προέθετο the complex idea of decreed and laid up, instead of the simple one which the context requires) the œconomy of the fulfilment of the seasons (after long and careful search, I am unable to find a word which will express the full meaning of οἰκονομία. The difficulty of doing so will be better seen below, after τὸ πλήρ. τῶν καιρ. has been dealt with. This expression is by no means = τὸ πλ. τοῦ χρόνου in Gal. iv. 4, nor to be equalized with it, as Harl. attempts to do, by saying that many καιροί make up a χρόνος. The mistake which has misled almost all the Commentators here, and which as far as I know Stier has been the only one to expose, has been that of taking τ. πλ. τῶν καιρῶν as a fixed terminus a quo, = the coming of Christ, as Gal. iv. 4,—whereas usage, and the sense, determine it to mean, the whole duration of the Gospel times; cf. especially ch. ii. 7, ἐν τοῖς αἰῶσιν τοῖς ἐπερχομένοις: 1 Cor. x. 11, τὰ τέλη τῶν αἰώνων, and Luke xxi. 24, καιροὶ ἐθνῶν, Acts i. 7; iii. 19, 21; 1 Tim. ii. 6. Thus τ. πλ. τ. καιρῶν will mean, the filling up, completing, fulfilment, of the appointed seasons, carrying on during the Gospel dispensation. Now, belonging to, carried on during, this fulfilling of the periods or seasons, is the οἰκονομία here spoken of. And, having regard to the derivation and usage of the word, it will mean, the giving forth of the Gospel under God's providential arrangements. First and greatest of all, HE is the οἰκονόμος: then, above all others, His divine Son: and as proceeding from the Father and the Son, the Holy Spirit—and then in subordinate degrees, every one who οἰκονομίαν πεπίστευται, i. e. all Christians, even to the lowest, as οἰκονόμοι ποικίλης χάριτος θεοῦ, 1 Pet. iv. 10. So that our best rendering will be, œconomy, leaving the word to be explained in teaching. The genitive καιρῶν is one of belonging or appurtenance as in κρίσις μεγάλης ἡμέρας, Jude 6), to sum up (the infinitive belongs to and specifies εὐδοκίαν;—ἣν . . . . καιρῶν having been logically parenthetical,—and explains what that εὐδοκία was. The verb, here as in the only other place in the N. T. where it occurs [ref.], signifies to comprehend, gather together, sum up. As there the whole law is comprehended in one saying, so here all creation is comprehended, summed up, in Christ. But it can hardly be supposed that the ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι has express reference here to Him as the κεφαλή: for 1) this is not predicated of Him till below, ver. 22;—2) the verb is from κεφάλαιον, not from κεφαλή; so that such reference would be only a play on the word:—3) the compound verb, as here, is used in Rom. l. c. in the simple ordinary sense. The ἀνα- applies to the gathering of all individuals, not to any restoration [Syr., vulg., Olsh. (Ellic. in part), al.], in which τὰ ἐπὶ τοῖς οὐρανοῖς would have no share. See more below: and cf. the ||, Col. i. 19, 20, and note there) all things (neuter, and to be literally so taken: not as a masculine, which, when a neuter is so understood, must be implied in the context, as in Gal. iii. 22:—the whole creation, see Col. i. 20) in the Christ (q. d., His Christ. The article is not expressed with χριστός after a preposition, unless with some such special meaning: see below ver. 12), the things in (lit. on; see below) the heavens (universal—not to be limited to the angels [Chrys., &c.], nor spirits of the just [Beza, al.], still less to be understood of the Jews, τὰ ἐπὶ τ. γῆς being the Gentiles [Locke, &c.]. Chrys.'s words are so far true, μίαν κεφαλὴν ἅπασιν ἐπέθηκε τὸ κατὰ σάρκα χριστόν, κ. ἀγγέλοις κ. ἀνθρώποις· . . . . τοῖς μὲν τὸ κατὰ σάρκα, τοῖς δὲ τὸν θεὸν λόγον—but the Apostle's meaning extends much further. The rec. ἐν τ. οὐρ. seems to have been adopted from Col. i. 20. There also ἐπί is read, but by L and a few mss. only, and evidently from our passage. The construction is a common one: cf. ἐπὶ χθονί Il. γ. 195, ἐπὶ πόλῃσι, ib. 149. It is strange to find in Ellicott a defence of the rec. ἐν, grounded on the fact that "ἐπί is never joined in the N. T. with οὐρανός or οὐρανοί, and that ἐν οὐρανῷ and ἐπὶ γῆς are invariably found in antithesis." Such an argument would sweep away all ἅπαξ λεγόμενα of construction, and break down the significance of all exceptional usage) and the things on the earth (general, as before τὰ πάντα. All creation is summed up in Christ: it was all the result of the Love of the Father for the Son [see my Doctrine of Divine Love, Serm. i.], and in the Son it is all regarded by the Father. The vastly different relation to Christ of the different parts of creation, is no objection to this union in Him: it affects, as Beng. on Rom. viii. 19, "pro suo quodque genus captu." The Church, of which the Apostle here mainly treats, is subordinated to Him in the highest degree of conscious and joyful union: those who are not His spiritually, in mere subjugation, yet consciously; the inferior tribes of creation, unconsciously: but objectively, all are summed up in Him);

11.] in Him (emphatic repetition, to connect more closely with Him the following relative clause), in whom we (Christians, all, both Jews and Gentiles; who are resolved below into ἡμεῖς and ὑμεῖς: see on ver. 12) were also (besides having, by His purpose, the revelation of His will, ver. 9.

Not 'we also,' καὶ ἡμεῖς, as vulg. "in quo etiam nos . . .," nor as E. V. 'in whom also') taken for His inheritance (κληρόω, in its ordinary meaning, 'to appoint by lot,'—then 'to appoint' generally: κληρουμαι, mid. 'to get, or possess any thing by such appointment.' The aorist passive, if ever taken in a middle sense, cannot be thus understood here, on account of εἰς τὸ εἶναι following. Confining ourselves therefore to the strict passive sense, we have three meanings apparently open to us: (1) 'we were appointed by lot.' So Chrys., Thl., vulg. [sorte vocati sumus], Erasm. [sorte electi sumus]. Chrys. supposes this apparently fortuitous choice to be corrected by προορ. κ.τ.λ. following: 'we were allotted, yet not by chance:' others justify it, as Estius, 'quia in ipsis electis nulla est causa cur eligantur præ aliis.' But to this Meyer properly opposes the fact, that we are never by St. Paul said to be chosen by any such θεία τύχη, but only by the gracious purpose of God: cf. Plato, Legg. vi. p. 759 c: κληροῦν οὕτω τῇ θείᾳ τύχῃ ἀποδιδόντα. (2) 'we were made partakers of the inheritance,' i. e. of the Kingdom of God, as Israel of Canaan,—Acts xxvi. 18: Col. i. 12. This is adopted by Harl., and Mey., and many others. But it seems without authority from usage: the instance which Mey. quotes from Pind., Ol. viii. 19, κληροῦν τινι, not bearing this rendering. And besides, the context is against it: ἐκληρώθημεν being followed, as Stier observes, not by εἰς τὸ ἔχειν ἡμ., but by εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἡμ., and thus pointing at something which 'we' are to become, not to possess. Another reason, see below. (3) 'we were made an (God's) inheritance.' This (Grot., Beng., Olsh., De W., Stier, Ellic., al.) seems to me the only rendering by which philology and the context are alike satisfied. We thus take the ordinary meaning of κληρόω, to assign as a κλῆρος: and the prevalent idea of Israel in the O. T. is as a people whom the Lord chose for His inheritance; cf. Deut. iv. 20, ὑμᾶς ἔλαβεν ὁ θεὸς . . . . εἶναι αὐτῷ λαὸν ἔγκληρον: ib. ix. 29; xxxii. 9; 3 Kings viii. 51, al. Flatt cites from Philo (qu. ref. ?), ᾧ προσκεκλήρωνται, διότι τοῦ σύμπαντος ἀνθρώπων γένους ἀπενεμήθη οἷα τις ἀπαρχὴ τῷ ποιητῇ κ. πατρί. Olsh. calls this 'the realization in time of the ἐκλογὴ ἐν χριστῷ spoken of before,' viz. by God taking to Himself a people out of all nations for an inheritance —first in type and germ in the O. T., then fully and spiritually in the N. T. This interpretation will be further substantiated by the note on ver. 12 below), having been predestined (why mention this again? Harl. maintains that it here applies to the Jews only, and refers to their selection [according to him to possess the inheritance] by God: but this cannot be, because as remarked above, ἡμᾶς, which first brings up the difference, does not occur yet. The true answer to the question lies in this,—that here first the Apostle comes to the idea of the universal Church, the whole Israel of God, and therefore here brings forward again that fore-ordination which he had indeed hinted at generally in ver. 5, but which properly belonged to Israel, and is accordingly predicated of the Israel of the Church) according to (in pursuance of) the purpose (repeated again [see above] from ver. 9: cf. also ch. iii. 11) of Him who works (energizes; but especially in and among material previously given, as here, in His material creation, and in the spirits of all flesh, also His creation) all things (not to be restricted, as Grot., to the matter here in hand, but universally predicated) according to the counsel of His will (the βουλή here answers to the εὐδοκία ver. 5, —the definite shape which the will assumes when decided to action—implying in this case the union of sovereign will with infinite wisdom), 12.] in order that we (here first expressed, as distinguished from ὑμεῖς, ver. 13: see below) should be to the praise of His glory (see on ver. 6 and ver. 14 below), namely, we who have before hoped in the Christ (we Jewish-Christians, who, before the Christ came, looked forward to His coming, waiting for the consolation of Israel: cf. especially Acts xxviii. 20, ἕνεκεν γὰρ τῆς ἐλπίδος τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ τὴν ἅλυσιν ταύτην περίκειμαι—and xxvi. 6, 7. The objection, that so few thus looked, is fully met by the largeness of St. Paul's own expression in this last passage. But this whole interpretation requires defending against opponents. First, the verse is variously punctuated. Harl., and Olsh. even more decidedly, read it εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἡμᾶς, εἰς ἔπαινον δόξ. αὐ., τοὺς προηλπ. ἐν τ. χρ. But to this it may be objected, (1) that εἰς ἔπ. δόξης αὐ., occurring as it does again at the end of the whole passage as the final aim of all, cannot with any probability be here merely parenthetical: (2) that above, ver. 6, and below, ver. 14, it, as well as the predestination, has reference to the fulness of the Gospel, not to incomplete prefatory hope in Christ [this would be no objection to De W.'s view: see below]: (3) that thus we should require some demonstrative expression preceding, to mark out these ἡμᾶς, such as ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐκληρώθημεν ἡμεῖς οἱ προορισθέντες. The objections which Harl. brings against the ordinary construction are implicitly answered in this exposition. They rest mainly on the mistake of referring ἐκληρώθ. προορισθέντες to the Jewish Christians: see above. De W. denies all reference to Jews and Gentiles,—(1) from the analogy of words compounded with προ- [προ-ακούειν Col. i. 5, προλέγειν Gal. v. 21; 1 Thess. iii. 4, προγράφειν Rom. xv. 4, προεπαγγέλλεσθαι Rom. i. 2], which he says indicate always priority as to the thing spoken of [in his idea here merely, 'hope previous to the fulfilment of that hope,' i. e. προ- has no meaning, for all hope must be this], not in comparison with other persons: but (a) this is not true—cf. προελθόντες Acts xx. 13, προέχεσθαι, προηγεῖσθαι, προτιθέναι, προάγειν, προπορεύεσθαι,—and (b) if it were, it does not touch our interpretation—hoped before [Christ's coming]:—(2) from ver. 13 saying nothing peculiar to Gentile Christians [but see there]: (3) from καὶ ὑμᾶς, in ch. ii. 1, and Col. i. 21, not meaning Gentile Christians, but being merely addressed to the readers generally. But in both these places it is so, merely because other things or persons have just been treated of: whereas here he would understand this ἡμᾶς as including the ὑμεῖς, thus depriving it of the force which it has there).

13.] What is the construction? Have we but one sentence, ἐν ᾧ . . . . ἐσφραγίσθητε, the two participial clauses being parallel, and both belonging to the verb? so the ff., Beng., De W., Ellic., [by whom the view is well defended and explained,] &c. But this seems to me impossible, from the arrangement. It would require the omission of the second ἐν ᾧ, or the placing of the καὶ ὑμεῖς after ἀκούσαντες. As the sentence now stands, the second ἐν ᾧ καὶ must begin a new sentence, and surely cannot be the mere rhetorical repetition of the first. This being so, we must understand some verb to complete ἐν ᾧ καὶ ὑμεῖς. Nothing can be more usual or more simple than to supply ἐστέ: nothing commoner than ἐν χριστῷ εἶναι: nothing better suited to the context than, after putting forward the Jewish believers, to turn to the Gentiles, 'Ye also have your part in Christ—our prominence does not exclude you.' Some supply ἠλπίκατε (Erasm.-ver., Calv., Est., al.), some ἐκληρώθητε (Erasm.-par., Harl., Olsh., al.); but the other is far simpler; and I cannot see how it deserves the charge which Ellicott brings against it, of being "a statement singularly frigid and out of harmony with the linked and ever-rising character of the context." It is quite accounted for as above, as forming a link in the context, whose character is well thus described. In whom are ye also (ye Gentile believers) since ye heard (from the time when ..... Their hearing was the terminus a quo) the word of the truth (the word whose character and contents are the truth of God: "quasi extra ipsum nulla esset proprie veritas," Calv.: see reff. This word is the instrument of the new birth, James i. 18. See Col. i. 5, and, above all, John xvii. 17), (viz.) the Gospel of your salvation (the Gospel whose contents, whose good tidings are your salvation: not a genitive of apposition, as Harl.,—cf. the expressions εὐαγγ. τῆς χάριτος τ. θεοῦ, Acts xx. 24,—τῆς εἰρήνης, ch. vi. 15,—τ. βασιλείας, Matt. ix. 35,—Ἰησοῦ χριστοῦ, Mark i. 1); in whom (belongs to Christ, as the former ἐν ᾧ—not to λόγον nor to εὐαγγέλιον,—nor is ἐν ᾧ to be taken with πιστεύσαντες, see below: but with ἐσφραγίσθητε—in whom ye not only are, but were sealed. The ἐν ᾧ καὶ ..... ἐσφραγίσθητε answers exactly to ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐκληρώθημεν above; πιστεύσαντες not being by this construction rendered superfluous [Mey.]; see below) also (belongs to πιστεύσαντες ἐσφραγίσθητε, not to either word alone) on your believing (terminus a quo, as ἀκούσαντες above. Not to be taken with ἐν ᾧ [as = εἰς ὅν, an usage unknown to St. Paul], for see Acts xix. 2, εἰ πνεῦμα ἅγ. ἐλάβετε πιστεύσαντες;—'did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed?'—and Rom. xiii. 11, νῦν ... ἐγγύτερον ἡμῶν ἡ σωτηρία ἢ ὅτε ἐπιστεύσαμεν: see also 1 Cor. iii. 5; xv. 2, 11; Heb. iv. 3. This use of the aorist marks the time when the act of belief first took place—and it must naturally therefore stand absolutely) ye were sealed (the fact followed on baptism, which was administered on belief in Christ. See the key-passage, Acts xix. 1—6. πιστεύσαντες is, and is not, contemporaneous with ἐσφραγίσθητε: it is not, inasmuch as in strict accuracy, faith preceded baptism, and baptism preceded the gift of the Spirit: but it is, inasmuch as on looking back over a man's course, the period of the commencement of his faith includes all its accidents and accompaniments. See Ellic.'s note. The figure of sealing is so simple and obvious, that it is perhaps mere antiquarian pedantry, with Schöttgen, Grot., and Wetst., to seek for an explanation of it in Gentile practices of branding with the names of their deities, or even in circumcision itself. The sealing was objective, making manifest to others [ὅστε εἶναι δῆλον, ὅτι θεοῦ ἐστε λάχος κ. κλῆρος, Thl.; so Chr., al.]: see John iii. 33; Rev. vii. 3,—but also subjective, an approval and substantiation of their faith [τὴν βεβαίωσιν ἐδέξασθε, Theod. Mops.], see Rom. viii. 16; 2 Cor. i. 22; 1 John iii. 24 b) by the spirit of the promise (i. e. who was ἡ ἐπαγγελία τοῦ πατρός, Luke xxiv. 49; Acts i. 4; Gal. iii. 14, 22; and I therefore insert the article. This, and not the other alternative, that the Spirit confirms God's promises to us, is the true rendering: He was the promise of the O. T. as well as of the N. T.: as Chr.: δύο εἰσὶν ἐπαγγελίαι, μία μὲν διὰ τῶν προφητῶν, ἑτέρα δὲ ἀπὸ τοῦ υἱοῦ. To unite together both alternatives as Stier does, weakens the force of the reference of ἐπαγγελίας back to God, so necessary to the context. The fact, that the Spirit is to us the Spirit of promise, is abundantly expressed in the following clause), the Holy One (I have preferred giving the ἁγίῳ separately, feeling with Meyer that there is an emphatic pathos in it which

It is used by the Greek orators, and by the earlier Latin writers, especially Plautus and Terence. A. Gellius [xvii. 2] speaks of it as a word considered in his time [A.D. 120—50] to be vulgar, and superseded by 'arra,' which is the substitute for it in later Latinity. It is remarkable that the same word עֵרָבוֹן is used in the same sense in Hebrew, Gen. xxxviii. 17, 18, from עָרַב, to mix or exchange, and thence to pledge, as Jer. xxx. 21; Neh. v. 3. It was therefore probably derived by the Greeks from the language of Phenician traders, as tariff, cargo, are derived, in the English and other modern languages, from Spanish traders." Stanley, on 2 Cor. i. 22. And so here—the Spirit is the ἀπαρχή, Rom. viii. 23,—the μέρος τοῦ παντός, as Chrys., or πρόδομα, as Hesych.: the pledge and assurer to us of τὰ ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ χαρισθέντα ἡμῖν, 1 Cor. ii. 12, which eye hath not seen, &c.) of our inheritance (here the first person comes in again, and not without reason. The inheritance [see above on ἐκληρώθημεν, which involved the converse idea] belongs to both Jew and Gentile—to all who are the children of Abraham by faith, Gal. iii. 28, 29), for ('in order to,'—not 'until,' as E. V.; nor in ch. iv. 30: nor does εἰς belong to ὅ ἐστιν . . ., but to ἐσφραγίσθητε. These two final clauses express the great purpose of all—not any mere intermediate matter—nor can the Holy Spirit be said to be any such intermediate gift) the full redemption (ἀπολ. is often used by the Apostle in this sense, c. g. ch. iv. 30; Rom. viii. 23, of the full and exhaustive accomplishment of that which the word imports) of His purchased possession (the sense of περιποίησις has been much disputed, and many ungrammatical and illogical renderings of the words given. A full discussion may be seen in Harless's note. The senses to be avoided are, (1) the nonsensical antiptosis, that ἀπολ. τ. περιπ. = περιποίησιν τῆς ἀπολυτρώσεως: (2) the equally absurd hendiadys, taking τ. περιποιήσεως for τὴν περιποιηθεῖσαν, which fits neither the true sense of εἰς, nor the context: (3) the taking περιποιήσεως as active in meaning —'redemptio qua contingat certa vitæ possessio.' Bucer. But this it could not convey to the Apostle's readers, unless constructed with some substantive to indicate such a meaning, as in 1 Thess. v. 9, where see note. A variety of this is proposed by Grot.—'rescuing,' i. e. salvation—and defended by Heb. x. 39, where περιποίησις ψυχῆς is opposed to ἀπώλεια. But besides that there the genitive ψυχῆς fixes the meaning,—the article τῆς here. in my view, is an insuperable objection. (4) the taking περιπ. in a passive sense, as res acquisita—making it therefore = κληρονομία, and giving to ἀπολύτρωσις the sense of entire bestowal, which it cannot have. It remains then, that we seek some technical meaning of περιποίησις, since the obvious etymological ones fail. And such a meaning is found by considering its uses in the O. T. It, and its cognate word περίειμι, are found applied to the people of God, in the sense of a people whom He preserves for Himself as His possession. So Exod. xix. 5, ἔσεσθέ μοι λαὸς περιούσιος ἀπὸ πάντων τῶν ἐθνῶν, Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2; xxvi. 18;—Ps. cxxxiv. 4, τὸν Ἰακὼβ ἐξελέξατο ὁ κύριος, Ἰσραὴλ εἰς περιουσιασμὸν ἑαυτῷ,—Isa. xliii. 21, λαόν μου ὃν περιεποιησάμην τὰς ἀρετάς μου διηγεῖσθαι,—Mal. iii. 17, ἔσονταί μοι, λέγει κύριος παντοκρ., εἰς ἡμέραν, ἣν ἐγὼ ποιῶ, εἰς περιποίησιν, κ. αἱρετιῶ αὐτοὺς . . . . κ.τ.λ. In ref. 2 Chron. we have the wider meaning of a remnant generally. The above sense as applied to the people of the Lord, was adopted by the N. T. writers: e. g. St. Paul, Acts xx. 28, τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τ. θεοῦ, ἣν περιεποιήσατο διὰ τ. αἵματος τ. ἰδίου,—St. Peter, 1 Pet. ii. 9, ὑμεῖς . . . . λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν. And such seems to be the meaning here: though no other case can be alleged in which the word stands so absolutely. We must suppose, that it would explain itself to the readers, from their familiarity with O. T. expressions, or with the Apostle's own use of it. This view is taken by the Syr., Œc., Erasm., Calv., Grot., and most Commentators, also by De Wette, Harless, Olsh., Meyer, Stier, Ellic. Stier endeavours, as so often, to unite the meanings regarding God, and ourselves,—for that we in being God's possession, reserved for survivorship to others, do, in the root of the word, thus survive, are thus saved: and undoubtedly this is so, but is not the leading idea) for the praise of His glory (as before, ver. 6: but as Stier well remarks, χάριτος does not appear here, grace having done its work. αὐτοῦ is the Father: cf. ver. 17, ὁ πατὴρ τῆς δόξης. This, the thorough and final redemption of the Church which He hath acquired to Himself, is the greatest triumph of His glory: as Grot. well says, 'Plus aliquanto est in voce περιποιήσεως quam in voce κλήρου quam antea habuimus. κλῆρος, sors, jus proprium perpetuumque significat: περιποίησις, acquisitio, et hoc, et modum acquirendi gravem et laboriosum. Solemus autem plurimi ea facere quæ magno nobis constant'). See the typico-historical connexion of this wonderful passage with the patriarchal, legal, and prophetic periods, unfolded in Stier, i. pp. 129—136. I would not be understood to subscribe to all there advanced: but though his parallelism sometimes borders on the fanciful, the connexion is too striking to be altogether set aside by the real student of Scripture.

In fact, 2 Cor. iii. 7—iv. 6, is the key to this sublime expression), would give (the account of the optative after ἵνα, when a present [παύομαι] has preceded, is very simple. It is used when the purpose is not that of the writer as he is writing, but is described as that of himself or some one else at another time. Thus Herod. ii. 93, καταπλώσουσι ἐς θάλασσαν, κ. ἀναπλώσαντες ὀπίσω τῆς αὐτῆς ἀντέχονται, ... ἵνα δὴ μὴ ἁμάρτωσι τῆς ὁδοῦ διὰ τὸν ῥόον. See Klotz, Devar. p. 622) to you the Spirit (certainly it would not be right to take πνεῦμα here as solely the Holy Spirit, nor as solely the spirit of man: rather is it the complex idea, of the spirit of man indwelt by the Spirit of God, so that as such, it is His special gift, see below) of wisdom (not, which gives wisdom, but which possesses it as its character—q. d. to which appertains wisdom) and of revelation (i. e. that revelation which belongs to all Christians: see 1 Cor. ii. 10 ff.: not the χαρίσματα of the early Church, as Olsh.,—nor could the Apostle be alluding to any thing so trivial and fleeting, see 1 Cor. xiii. xiv. To those who are taught of God's Spirit, ever more and more of His glories in Christ are revealed, see John xvi. 14, 15) in (belongs to δῴῃ: as the element and sphere of the working of this gift of the Spirit) the full knowledge (for the distinction between γνῶσις and ἐπίγνωσις, see 1 Cor. xiii. 12) of Him (Chr., Thl., Olsh., al., strangely connect ἐν ἐπιγνώσει αὐτοῦ with the following sentence, πεφωτισμ. κ.τ.λ. The whole parallelism is against this, in which πνεῦμ. σοφ. κ. ἀποκ. is ‖ πεφωτ. τ. ὀφθ. τ. κ. ὑμ. and ἐν ἐπιγνώσ. αὐτοῦ is ‖ εἰς τὸ εἰδέναι κ.τ.λ.;—and the object being to exalt the gifts of the Spirit, ἐν ἐπ. αὐτ. would hardly come first in the sentence, and thus monopolize the emphasis. See also on a similar proposal, ver. 4, end. αὐτοῦ [not αὑτοῦ] refers to the Father,—not to Christ, as Beza, Calv., al.; cf. αὐτοῦ four times in vv. 18, 19: Christ first becomes thus designated in ver. 20), having the eyes of your heart enlightened (the construction is as in Soph. Electr. 479, ὄπωπά μοι θράσος ἀδυνάτων κλύουσαν ἀρτίως ἀνειφάτων,—Æsch. Choëph. 396, πέπαλται δ' αὐτέ μοι φίλον κέαρ τόνδε κλύουσαν οἶκτον: see also Acts xxvi. 3,—Kühner ii. p. 381: so that πεφωτισμένους belongs to ὑμῖν, and τοὺς ὀφθαλμούς is the accusative of reference. So Beza, Beng., Koppe, Meyer, Ellic.: and such is the simpler and more forcible construction. But Grot., Rück., Harl., Olsh., De W., Stier, all., take περ. τ. ὀφθ. together, and govern it by δῴη, to which the article before ὀφθ. is no objection [as Beng.], but the logic of the passage is. The enlightening as regards [or of] the eyes of the heart, is a condition, subordinate to the πνεῦμα σοφ. κ. ἀποκ., not another gift, correlative with it. Besides which, the sentence, even after all the grammatical vindications of Harl., al.,—δῴη ὑμῖν . . . . περφωτισμένους τοὺς ὀφθ. τῆς καρδίας ὑμῶν, is clumsy and unpaulne in the last degree. On περφωτισμ., cf. Matt. iv. 16: ch. iii. 9 [v. 14]: Harl. gives an elaborate analysis, as usual, of the meaning, and remarks well that φωτίζω has the double meaning of 'belehren und beleben'—'enlightening and enlivening.' He cites from Greg. Naz.: φῶς ἐς λαμπρότης ψυχῶν κ. λόγῳ κ. βίῳ καθαιρομένων. εἰ γὰρ σκότος ἡ ἄγνοια κ. ἡ ἁμαρτία, φῶς ἂν εἴη ἡ γνῶσις κ. ὁ βίος ὁ ἔνθεος. The expression τ. ὀφθ. τῆς καρδίας is somewhat unusual. The καρδία of Scripture is, as Harl., the Mittelpunkt des Lebens, the very core and centre of life, where the intelligence has its post of observation, where the stores of experience are laid up, and the thoughts have their fountain. Similarly the Homeric κραδίη, see Damm. Lex.: the Latin 'cor'—cf. Cic. Tusc. i. 9,—'aliis cor ipsum animus videtur, ex quo excordes, vecordes, concordesque dicuntur.' Thus the ὀφθ. τῆς καρδίας would be those pointed at in Matt. vi. 22, 23,—that inner eye of the heart, through which light is poured in on its own purposes and motives, and it looks out on, and perceives, and judges things spiritual: the eye, as in nature, being both receptive and contemplative of the light), that you may know (purpose of the περφωτισμ., not of the πνεῦμ. σοφ. κ. ἀποκ. This which is now to be described, to the end of the chapter, is involved in the πν. σοφ. κ. ἀποκ., not its object: but it is the object of the enlightening, which will endue us with the knowledge) what (the dispute among the Commentators, whether τίς implies quality or quantity, seems hardly worth entering into. The fulness of the simple meaning, 'what,' embraces all categories under which the things mentioned can be contemplated. In the passage to which both sides appeal, ch. iii. 18, τί τὸ πλάτος κ.τ.λ. of course implies, 'how great is the breadth, &c.:' but it implies this by the simple meaning 'what is the breadth, &c.,' not by making τί = quantum, quantity being already involved in the substantives) is the hope (again, it is mere trifling to enquire whether ἐλπίς is the hope [subjective] or the thing hoped for [objective], in this case. For the τίς involves in itself both these. If I know WHAT the hope is, I know both its essence and its accidents. Undoubtedly such an objective sense of ἐλπίς does occur,—see on Col. i. 5; but certainly the meaning here is far wider than in that passage. As well might the subjective sense of Col. i. 23, be alleged on that side) of (belonging to, see on ch. iv. 4) His calling (i. e. the calling wherewith He called us. All the matters mentioned, κλῆσις, κληρονομία, δύναμις, are αὐτοῦ, His,—but not all in the same sense: see below. On κλῆσις, see notes, Rom. viii. 28—30), what the riches of the glory of His inheritance ("what a rich, sublime cumulation, setting forth in like terms the weightiness of the matters described;—and not to be weakened [verwässert] by any resolution of the genitives into adjectives." Mey. See Col. i. 27) in (in the case of, as exemplified in; not so weak as 'among,'—nor merely 'in,' so as to refer to its subjective realization in them) the saints (much dispute has arisen on the construction of ἐν τ. ἁγ. Koppe and Winer [Gram. § 19. 2. b, edn. 3: not appy in edn. 6], with whom Meyer and De Wette agree, connect it with ἐστίν understood, so as to mean 'what the richness of, &c. is among the saints.' To mention no other objection to this awkward construction, the context and sense are decisive against it. As Stier well says, Paul does not pray for their eyes to be enlightened, to see what great and rich things are already among Christians.' No: nor is it easy to conceive how any intelligent reader of the Epistle could ever maintain such a rendering. The other construction is, to take ἐν τ. ἁγ. as belonging either to πλοῦτος, or to δόξης, or to κληρονομίας, as if it had been ὁ (or τῆς) ἐν τοῖς ἁγ. And this is the only one allowed by the context: cf. vv. 19, 20, where εἰς ἡμᾶς, ἐν χριστῷ, form objects of reference precisely similar. Again there is manifestly a distinction between οἱ ἅγιοι here, and ἡμεῖς οἱ πιστεύοντες in the next verse: the former being the perfected, the latter the militant saints. And this decides for the joining ἐν τ. ἁγ. to κληρονομίας αὐτοῦ, —'His inheritance in, whose example and fulness, and embodying is in the saints.' The objection to this is supposed to be the want of the article before ἐν, which is urged by Meyer [see also Ellicott's note here], because αὐτοῦ has intervened, thereby preventing κληρ. ἐν τ. ἁγ. being considered as one idea. But surely this is not so. If, before αὐτοῦ was inserted, ἡ κληρ. ἐν τ. ἁγίοις was sufficiently one to prevent the necessity of a specification of the genus κληρονομία that it was the κληρ. which was ἐν τ. ἁγ. [for such is the force of the inserted article], how can this logical fact be altered by the insertion of Him, whose κληρ. it is,—who originated and bestowed it,—and who is therefore necessarily prior to the κληρονομία, not intervening between it and its example? I therefore join it to κληρ., and so Rück., Harless, Olsh., Stier, al. This latter, as usual, combines the senses of κληρ. αὐτοῦ, including the inheritance which God has in His people, and that which they have in Him. His whole note is well worth attention), 19.] and what the surpassing (a word only pauline in N. This power is exerted to usward, which expression of the E. V. I retain as giving better the prominence to us in the fact of its direction, than the more usual but tamer 'toward us.' (as γνωρίσας above, ver. 9) Him from the dead (the resurrection of Christ was not a mere bodily act, an earnest of our bodily resurrection, but was a spiritual act, the raising of His humanity [which is ours], consisting of body and soul, from infirmity to glory, from the curse to the final triumph. In that He died, HE DIED UNTO SIN once; but in that He liveth, HE LIVETH UNTO GOD. And so ἡμεῖς οἱ πιστεύοντες, knit to Him, have died unto sin and live unto God. It is necessary to the understanding of the following, thoroughly to appreciate this—or we shall be in danger of regarding, with the shallower expositors, Christ's resurrection as merely a pledge of our bodily resurrection, or as a mere figure representing our spiritual resurrection,—not as involving the resurrection of the Church in both senses); and setting Him at His right hand (see especially Mark xvi. 19) in the heavenly places (see on ver. 3: and Matt. vi. 9, note. But the fact of the universal idea, of God's dwelling being in heaven, being only a symbolism common to all men, must not for a moment induce us to let go the verity of Christ's bodily existence, or to explain away the glories of His resurrection into mere spiritualities. As Stephen saw Him, so He veritably is: in human form, locally existent) over above (not, as in my former editions, 'far above.' Ellicott says, "The intensive force which Chrys. and Thl. find in this word, ἵνα τὸ ἀκρότατον ὕψος δηλώσῃ, and which has recently been adopted by Stier and Eadie, is very doubtful: as is also the assertion [Eadie] that this prevails in the majority of passages in the LXX: cf. Ezek. i. 26; viii. 2; x. 19; xi. 22; xliii. 15; and even Deut. xxvi. 19; xxviii. 1. Such distinct instances as Ezek. xliii. 15, and in the N. T., Heb. ix. 5, the similarly unemphatic use of the antitheton ὑποκάτω, John i. 51, Luke viii. 16, and the tendencies of Alexandrian and later Greek to form duplicated compounds, make it highly probable that ὑπεράνω, both here and ch. iv. 10, implies little more than simple local elevation. So too Syr. and apparently all the ancient versions") all government (cf. Matt. xxviii. 18) and power and might and lordship (see similar combinations in reff. The most reasonable account of the four words seems to be this: ὑπ. πάσ. ἀρχῆς gives the highest and fullest expression of exaltation: κ. ἐξουσίας is added as filling out ἀρχῆς in detail: ἐξουσία being not only government, but every kind of official power, primary and delegated: cf. Matt. viii. 9; x. 1; xxi. 23 ff.; Luke xx. 20; xxiii. 7. Then in the second pair, δύναμις is mere might, the raw material, so to speak, of power: κυριότης is that pre-eminence or lordship, which δύναμις establishes for itself. So that in the first pair we descend from the higher and concentrated to the lower and diffused: in the second we ascend from the lower and diffused to the higher and concentrated. The following shews that in this enumeration not only earthly, nor only heavenly authorities are meant to be included, but both together,—so as to make it perfectly general. That the evil spirits are included, is therefore manifest: see also ch. vi. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 24—26) and every name that is named (further generalization: indicating not merely titles of honour [cf. ὀνομαζομ.], nor persons, but, as Stier, a transition from the ἀρχαί, &c. to πάντα below: answering to οὔτε τις κτίσις ἑτέρα, cf. Rom. viii. 39. And this transition passes into still wider meaning in the following words) not only in this present state, but also in that which is to come (= ἐνεστῶτα and μέλλοντα of Rom. viii. 38—not only time present and to come, but the present [earthly] condition of things, and the future [heavenly] one. And forasmuch as that heavenly state which is for us future, is now, to those in it, present, it is by the easiest transition denoted by the μέλλων αἰών: cf. Luke xx. 35, and especially Heb. ii. 5, τὴν οἰκουμένην τ. μέλλουσαν. So that the meanings seem combined,—'every name now named in earth and heaven:' and, 'every name which we name,—not only now, but hereafter.' And in this last view Thdrt.: προστέθεικεν, ὅτι καὶ εἴ τινας τούτων ἀγνοοῦμεν, μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα γνωσόμεθα ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι βίῳ. Chrys.: ἆρα ἐστὶ δυνάμεών τινων ὀνόματα ἡμῖν ἄσημα κ. οὐ γνωριζόμενα. Grot., 'quæ noscemus in altero sæculo:' Beng., 'quamvis non omnes nominare possumus.' So we know that Christ is above all, though we are not able to name all His subjects'), 22.] and subjected all things under His feet (from the Messianic Ps. viii.; not without an allusion also in καθίσαι, &c. above to Ps. cx. 1: not merely cited, as Thdrt., καὶ τ. προφητικὴν ἐκήγαγε μαρτυρίαν, but interwoven into the context, πάντα being a summing up of all mentioned before), and gave ('presented;' keep the literal sense: not 'appointed;' see below) Him (emphatic, from its position: Him, thus exalted, thus glorified, the Father not only raised to this supereminence, but gave Him to His redeemed as their Head, &c.) as Head over all things to the Church (not as Chrys.,—in either of his alternatives: ἢ τὸν ὄντα ὑπὲρ πάντα τὰ ὁρώμενα κ. τὰ νοούμενα χριστόν [which would be τὴν κεφ., or τὸν ὑπὲρ πάντα], ἢ ὑπὲρ πάντα τὰ ἀγαθὰ τοῦτο πεποίηκε, τὸ τὸν υἱὸν δοῦναι κεφαλήν,—which is beside the context, in which no comparison is made between the gift of Christ and other blessings: nor as Beng., 'Ecclesia, super omnia, super imperia, &c.,' quorum caput (?) Christus est, potest dicere, Christus est caput meum: ego sum corpus ejus,'—for this sense cannot possibly be extracted out of the words themselves ὑπὲρ πάντα: nor as Baumgarten, ὑπὲρ πάντα = μάλιστα πάντων, præcipue, potius quam cæteris,—for, not to mention other objections, πάντα must surely be the same in meaning as πάντα before: nor can πάντα be masculine, as Jer., Anselm, al., and Wahl: nor, as Calv., 'quia simul plena rerum omnium potestas et administratio illi sit commissa:' nor, with Harl., does πάντα find its limitation within the Church, so as not to apply to other things without it: nor is ὑπὲρ πάντα to be taken with κεφ., summum caput, as Olsh., all.: nor as Meyer, Stier, and Ellicott [edn. 1: in edn. 2, he interprets nearly as below], is another κεφαλήν to be supplied before τῇ ἐκκλ., 'gave Him, as Head over all things, as Head to the Church:' nor is the dative a dat. commodi, as De W.: but the meaning is thus to be gained, from what follows: Christ is Head over all things: the Church is the Body of Christ, and as such is the fulness of Him who fills all with all: the Head of such a Body, is Head over all things; therefore when God gives Christ as Head to the church, He gives Him as Head over all things to the church, from the necessity of the case. Thus what follows is epexegetical of this), which same (Church, 'quæ quidem;' hardly 'ut quæ,' "in virtue of her being," as Meyer) is His BODY (not in a figure merely: it is veritably His Body: not that which in our glorified humanity He personally bears, but that in which He, as the Christ of God, is manifested and glorified by spiritual organization. He is its Head; from Him comes its life; in Him, it is exalted: in it, He is lived forth and witnessed to; He possesses nothing for Himself,—neither His communion with the Father, nor His fulness of the Spirit, nor His glorified humanity,—but all for His Church, which is in the innermost reality, Himself; His flesh and His bones—and therefore) the fulness (πλήρ. is in apposition with τὸ σῶμα αὐτ., and is a fresh description of ἡ ἐκκλησία. It would pass my limits, even to notice summarily what has been written on πλήρωμα. I will endeavour to give an account of the word itself. Like other derivatives in -μα from the perfect passive, it would appear primarily to designate either (1) concrete, that thing on which the action denoted by the verb has passed: e. g. ποίημα, the thing made, πρᾶγμα, the thing done, σπέρμα, the thing sown, πλήρωμα, the thing filled: or (2) abstract, that occurrence whereby the action denoted has been exemplified: e. g. τρῶμα, the effect of τιτρώσκειν, not the thing wounded, but the wound inflicted: so κλάσμα, ἐρίθημα, and the like; πλήρωμα, the fulness. From this latter, the transition is very easy to the meaning the thing whereby the effect is produced, as where πλήρωμα is used for the crew of a ship [see also Matt. ix. 16 ‖; Mark vi. 43; 1 Cor. x. 26; Gal. iv. 4; ver. 10], ζεῦγμα for a bridge or yoke, &c. Hence arises the so-called active sense of such nouns, which is not in fact an active sense at all, but a logical transference from the effect to that which exemplifies the effect. Here, the simple and primary meaning is by far the best,—'the thing filled,'—"the filled up receptacle" [cf. κατοικητήριον, ch. ii. 22], as Eadie expresses it [see also Ellicott], the meaning being, that the church, being the Body of Christ, is dwelt in and filled by God: it is His πλήρωμα in an especial manner—His fulness abides in it, and is exemplified by it. The nearest approach to any one word in English which may express it, is made by fulness, though it, as well as πλ., requires explaining, as importing not the inherent plenitude of God Himself, but that communicated plenitude of gifts and graces wherein He infuses Himself into His Church. I would refer those who wish to enter more fully into this matter, to the long and laboured notes of Harless, and Stier: and to Fritzsche on Rom. vol. ii. pp. 469 ff.) of Him who filleth (it is doubted whether πληρουμένου is passive, or middle in an active sense. Those who take πλήρωμα above, actively, "the filling up," generally [Harless is an exception] defend the passive sense here, "of Him who is [being] filled, &c." So Chrys.: πλήρωμα, φησίν· οἷον κεφαλὴ πληροῦται παρὰ τοῦ σώματος .... διὰ πάντων οὖν πληροῦται τὸ σῶμα αὐτοῦ. τότε πληροῦται ἡ κεφαλή, τότε τέλειον σῶμα γίνεται, ὅταν ὁμοῦ πάντες ὦμεν συνημμένοι κ. συγκεκολλημένοι. Jer.: "Sicut adimpletur imperator, si quotidie ejus augeatur exercitus, et fant novæ provinciæ, et populorum multitudo succrescat, ita et Christus, in eo, quod sibi credunt omnia, ipse adimpletur in omnibus;" and Estius: "Qui secundum omnia, sive quoad omnia in omnibus sui corporis membris adimpletur. Nisi enim essent hic quidem pes ejus, ille vero manus, alius autem aliud membrum ..... non perficeretur Christus secundum rationem capitis." But to this it is difficult to assign any satisfactory sense, especially on account of τὰ πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν. It certainly cannot be said that Christ awaits His completion, in any such meaning as this, by the completion of His Church. And it is not probable that if such had been the meaning, τὰ πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν would have thus barely and emphatically preceded the participle which itself conveyed so new and startling an idea. We should have had some such arrangement as this—τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ καὶ αὐτοῦ τὰ πάντα [κ.] ἐν πᾶσιν πληρουμένου. If now we take πληρουμένου in an active reflective sense, both meaning and arrangement will be satisfactory—'the fulness [receptacle, filled and possessed] of Him who filleth' τὰ πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν. But are we justified in thus taking it? It seems so, from Xen. Hell. vi. 2. 14, ὁ στρατηγὸς μᾶλα ὀξέως τὰς ναῦς ἐπληροῦτο κ. τοὺς τριηράρχους ἠνάγκαζε. See likewise Plato, Gorg. § 106; Xen. Hell. v. 4. 56; vi. 2. 35: Demosth. p. 1208. 14: Plut. Alcib. 35: Pollux i. 99: in all of which the 1 aor. middle is thus used. Having then this authority as far as grammatical usage is concerned, we are further inclined to this rendering by ch. iv. 10, where it is said of Christ, ὁ ἀναβὰς ὑπεράνω πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν, ἵνα πληρώσῃ τὰ πάντα, and the Apostle proceeds to enumerate the various gifts bestowed by Him on His Church. See further in note there) all things (the whole universe: not to be restricted in meaning. The Church is the special receptacle and abiding-place—the πλήρωμα κατ' ἐξοχήν, of Him who fills all things) with all things (i. e. who is the bestower of all, wherever found. ἐν πᾶσιν has been rendered 'every where' [B.-Crus.]: 'in every way' [De W.]: 'in every case' [Harl.]: and al.: but the Apostle's own usage is our best guide,—πληροῦσθε ἐν πνεύματι, ch. v. 18, and other reff., and directs us to the in- strumental or elemental meaning—the thing with, or by, or in which as an element, the filling takes place. So that the expression will mean, with all, not only gifts, not only blessings, but things: who fills all creation with whatever it possesses—who is the Author and Giver of all things. The reference is, I think, to the Father, not to Christ. The latter has been imagined [see especially Ellicott], principally from strictly parallelizing the two clauses,—τὸ σῶμα | αὐτοῦ ||, τὸ πλήρωμα | τοῦ τ. π. ἐν π. πληρουμένου ||. But this is by no means conclusive: the second definitive clause may assert more than the first;—may be, not subordinate to the first, but inclusive of it. In ch. iv. 10, where Christ's filling all things is spoken of, we have the active voice, denoting the bare objective fact: whereas here the reciprocal middle implies a filling for Himself, which can hardly be predicated of any but the Father, for whom are all things, even the Son himself).

II. 1—22.] (See on ch. i. 3.) COURSE AND PROGRESS OF THE CHURCH THROUGH THE SON; consisting mainly in the receiving of believers in the new man Christ Jesus—setting forth on one side the death and ruin in which they were;—on the other, the way to life opened to them by the finished work of Christ. This throughout the chapter, which is composed (as ch. i.) of two parts—the first, more doctrinal and assertive (vv. 1—10), the second more hortative and reminiscent (vv. 11—22). In both, the separate cases of Gentiles and Jews, and the present union in Christ, are treated of. And herein

A. 1—10.] THE POWER OF THE FATHER IN QUICKENING US, BOTH GENTILES AND JEWS, IN AND WITH CHRIST (1—6);—HIS PURPOSE IN MANIFESTING THIS POWER (7);—INFERENCE RESPECTING THE METHOD OF OUR SALVATION (8—10).

1, 2.] Actual state of the Gentiles—dead in trespasses and sins, living under the power of the devil. 1.] You also (καί is much more than merely copulative. It selects and puts into prominence ὑμᾶς, from among the recipients of God's grace implied in vv. 19—23 of the former chapter. See below), who were ("ὄντας clearly marks the state in which they were at the time when God quickened them: this in ver. 5 is brought prominently forward by the καί: here however καί is joined with and gives prominence to ὑμᾶς. A simple indication, then, of their state, without any temporal or causal adjunct, 'when,' 'whereas,' &c., seems in the present case most satisfactory, as less calling away the attention from the more emphatic ὑμᾶς." Ellicott, edn. 1) dead (certainly not, as Meyer, 'subject to [physical] death:' the whole of the subsequent mercy of God in His quickening them is spiritual, and therefore of necessity the death also. That it involves physical death, is most true; but as I have often had occasion to remark [see e. g. on John xi. 25, 26], this latter is so subordinate to spiritual death, as often hardly to come into account in Scripture) in (not exactly as in Col. ii. 13, νεκροὺς ὄντας ἐν τοῖς παραπτώμασιν, where the element is more in view, whereas here it is the causal dative—we might render, were the expression good in serious writing, 'dead of your trespasses,' as we say 'he lies dead of cholera.' I use 'in' as giving nearly the same causal sense: we say, indiscriminately, 'sick of a fever,' and 'sick in a fever') [your] trespasses and sins (it seems difficult to establish universally any distinction such as has been attempted, e. g. by Tittm. Synon. p. 47,—"licet non satis vera Hieronymi distinctio videatur, qui παράπτωμα primum ad peccatum lapsum esse dicit, ἁμαρτίαν, quum ad ipsum facinus perventum est; tamen in v. παράπτωμα proprie inest notio peccati quod temere commissum est, i. e. a nolente facere injuriam; sed in ἁμαρτία et ἀμάρτημα cogitatur facinus quod, qui fecit, facere voluit, sive imprudens erraverit, recte se facere existimans, sive impetu animi et libidine obreptus fecerit. . . . Levius est παράπτωμα quam ἁμαρτία, si ἁμαρτία de singulo peccato dicitur." Where however, as here, the two occur together, it may be accepted as correct. If we take merely that of Ellicott, al., that "παραπτώματα are the particular, special acts of sin,—ἁμαρτίαι the more general and abstract, viz. all forms, phases, and movements of sin, whether entertained in thought or consummated in act," we shall not provide for the whole case: for ἁμαρτίαι are unquestionably used for special acts [= ἁμαρτήματα]: and we want a distinction which shall embrace this case. Another question concerns the construction of this accusative clause. Some [Beng., Lachm., Harl.] consider it as a continuation of ch. i. 23, and place a comma only at πληρουμένου. But [see our division of the sense] the sentence evidently finishes with πληρουμένου, and a new subject is here taken up. The simplest view seems to be the usual one, that the Apostle began with the accusative, intending to govern it by συνεζωοποίησεν τῷ χριστῷ, but was led away by the relative clauses, ἐν αἷς ποτὲ . . . . , ἐν οἷς καὶ ἡμεῖς . . . . , and himself takes up the dropped thread of the construction by ὁ δὲ θεὸς . . . . , ver. 4. So Erasm.: "hyperbati longioris ambitum ipse correxit Apostolus dicens 'Deus autem qui dives est' . . ." At all events, the clause should be left, in translation, pendent, as it stands, and not filled in (conjecturally).

2.] in which (ἁμαρτίαις, the last substantive, but applying in fact to both) ye once walked (we hardly need, as Eadie, al., go back every time to the figure in περιπατεῖν—the word has become with the Apostle so common in its figurative sense. See Fritzsche's note, Rom. vol. iii. p. 140) according to (after the leading of, conformably to) the course (so E. V.: the very best word, as so often. The meaning of αἰών here is compounded of its temporal and its ethical sense: it is not exactly 'lifetime,' 'duration,' nor again 'fashion,' 'spirit,' but some common term which will admit of being both temporally and ethically characterized,—'career' or 'course.' Beware 1) of taking αἰῶνα and κόσμου as synonymous, and the expression as a pleonasm ["utrumque nominat, seculum et mundum, cum sufficeret alterum dixisse," Estius], 2) of imagining, as Michaelis and Baur, that the expression is a gnostic one, the æon being the devil: for, as Meyer remarks, the ordinary sense of αἰών gives a good meaning, and one characteristic of St. Paul. See Gal. i. 4, for a use of αἰών—somewhat similar, but more confined to the temporal meaning) of this world (St. Paul generally uses ὁ κόσμος, but has ὁ κ. οὗτος in 1 Cor. iii. 19; v. 10; vii. 31. It designates the present system of things, as alien from God, and lying in the evil one), according to the ruler of the power of the air (the devil—the θεὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου, 2 Cor. iv. 4, is clearly meant: but it is difficult exactly to dissect the phrase, and give each word its proper meaning. ἐξουσία appears to be used here as ὁμηλικίη in Homer, ἡλικία, ἑταιρία, δουλεία, ὑπηρεσία, συμμαχία, and the like, to represent the aggregate of those in power: as we say, 'the government.' So that all such renderings as 'princeps potentissimus' are to be at once dismissed. So also is every explanation which would ascribe to the Apostle a polemical, or distantly allusive tendency, in an expression which he manifestly uses as one of passage merely, and carrying its own familiar sense to his readers. This against Michaelis, and all who have imagined an allusion to the gnostic ideas — and Wetst., who says, "Paulus ita loquitur ex principiis philosophiæ Pythagoreæ, quibus illi ad quos scribit imbuti erant." Not much better are those who refer the expression to Rabbinical ideas for its source. The different opinions and authorities [which would far exceed the limits of a general commentary] may be seen cited and treated in Harless, Stier, and Eadie. I am disposed to seek my interpretation from a much more obvious source: viz. the persuasion and common parlance of mankind, founded on analogy with well-known facts. [Ellic., edn. 2, disapproves this, but without sufficiently attending to my explanation which follows, which, as in so many cases where he imagines a difference between our interpretations, is practically the same as his own.] We are tempted by evil spirits, who have access to us, and suggest thoughts and desires to our minds. We are surrounded by the air, which is the vehicle of speech and of all suggestions to our senses. Tried continually as we are by these temptations, what so natural, as to assign to their ministers a dwelling in, and power over that element which is the vehicle of them to us? And thus our Lord, in the parable of the sower, when He would represent the devil coming and taking away the seed out of the heart, figures him by τὰ πετεινὰ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ. The Apostle then, in using this expression, would be appealing to the common feeling of his readers, not to any recondite or questionable system of dæmonology. That traces are found in such systems, of a belief agreeing with this, is merely a proof that they have embodied the same general feeling, and may be used in illustration, not as the ground, of the Apostle's saying. All attempts to represent ἀήρ as meaning 'darkness,' or 'spirit,' are futile, and beside the purpose. The word occurs (see reff.) six more times in the N. T. and nowhere in any but its ordinary meaning), of the spirit (τῆς ἐξουσίας being used as designating [see above] the personal aggregate of those evil ones who have this power, τοῦ πνεύματος, in apposition with it, represents their aggregate character, as an influence on the human mind, a spirit of ungodliness and disobedience,—the πνεῦμα τοῦ κόσμου of 1 Cor. ii. 12,—the aggregate of the πνεύματα πλάνα of 1 Tim. iv. 1. So that [against Harless] the meaning of πνεύματος, though properly and strictly objective, almost passes into the subjective, when it is spoken of as ἐνεργοῦντος ἐν κ.τ.λ. And this will account for the otherwise harsh conjunction of ἄρχοντα τοῦ πνεύματος. As he (the devil) is the ruler of τὰ πνεύματα, whose aggregate τὸ πνεῦμα is,—so he is the ἄρχων of the thoughts and ways of the ungodly,—of that πνεῦμα which works in them. The genitive, πνεύματος, must not be taken, as by many Commentators and by Rückert, as in apposition with ἄρχοντα, by the Apostle's negligence of construction. No such assumption should ever be made without necessity; and there is surely none here) which is now (i. e. 'still:' contrast to ποτέ,—to you, who have escaped from his government: no allusion need be thought of to the interval before the παρουσία being that of the hottest conflict between the principles [2 Thess. ii. 7. Rev. xii. 12], as De W.) working in the sons of (the expression is a Hebraism, but is strictly reproduced in the fact: that of which they are sons, is the source and spring of their lives, not merely an accidental quality belonging to them) disobedience (the vulg. renders it diffidentia, but unfortunately, as also Luther Unglaube; for both here and in ch. v. 6, it is practical conduct which is spoken of. Doubtless unbelief is the root of disobedience: but it is not here expressed, only implied. In Deut. ix. 23, ἠπειθήσατε τῷ ῥήματι κυρίου τ. θεοῦ ὑμῶν, and the allusion to it in Heb. iv. 6, οἱ πρότερον εὐαγγελισθέντες οὐκ εἰσῆλθον δι' ἀπείθειαν, we have the disobedience in its root—here, in its fruits—cf. ver. 3, ποιοῦντες τὰ θελήματα κ.τ.λ.): 3.] among whom (the υἱοὶ τ. ἀπειθείας: not merely local, but 'numbered among whom,'—ὧν καὶ αὐτοὶ ὄντες, as Rückert: not 'in which,' viz. παραπτώμασιν, as Syr., Jer., Grot., Bengel, al., and Stier, who would divide off ἁμαρτίαι, allotting them to the Gentiles, and to ver. 2,—and παραπτώματα, assigning them to the Jews, and to ver. 3. See further on this below: but meantime, besides its very clumsy treatment of the ἁμαρτ. and παραπτ. which both belong to ὑμεῖς in ver. 1, it ascribes to the Apostle an unusual and unnatural precision in distinguishing the two words which he had used without any such note of distinction, such as τε—καί) we also all (WHO? The usage of ἡμεῖς πάντες by St. Paul must decide. It occurs Rom. iv. 16, ὅς ἐστιν πατὴρ πάντων ἡμῶν, undeniably for Jews and Gentiles included [for the slight difference arising from πάντων being first, and therefore emphatic, need not be insisted on]: viii. 32, ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν πάντων παρέδωκεν αὐτόν, where the universal reference is as undeniable: 1 Cor. xii. 13, where it is still more marked: ἡμεῖς πάντες . . . . εἴτε Ἰουδαῖοι εἴτε Ἕλληνες, εἴτε δοῦλοι εἴτε ἐλεύθεροι: 2 Cor. iii. 18, equally undoubted. It can hardly then be that here he should have departed from his universal usage, and placed an unmeaning πάντες after ἡμεῖς merely to signify, 'we Jews, every one of us.' I therefore infer that by ἡμεῖς πάντες, he means, we all, Jews and Gentiles alike; all, who are now Christians) lived our life (reff. especially 2 Cor.) once, in (as in ref. 1 Pet., of the element, in which: in 2 Cor. i. 12, the same double use of ἐν, of the place, and the element, is found) the desires of our flesh (of our unrenewed selves, under the dominion of the body and the carnal soul. See a contrast, Gal. v. 16), doing the wishes (the instances in which τὸ θέλημα manifested itself: see reff.) of our flesh and of our thoughts (the plural use is remarkable. There appears to be a reference to Num. xv. 39, οὐ διαστραφήσεσθε ὀπίσω τῶν διανοιῶν ὑμῶν. —the instrument for its results. Thus 'thoughts' will be our nearest word—those phases of mind which may or may not affect the will, but which then in our natural state we allowed to lead us by the desires they excited), and were (the change of construction has been remarked by the best Commentators as intentional, not of negligence,—"to give emphasis to the weighty clause that follows, and to disconnect it from any possible relation to present time, 'we were children of wrath by nature,—it was once our state and condition, it is now so no longer.'" Ellicott. And Eadie remarks: "Had he written καὶ ὄντες, as following out the idea of ποιοῦντες, there might have been a plea against the view of innate depravity [see below]—'fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind, and being,' or 'so being, children of wrath.' But the Apostle says, καὶ ἦμεθα—'and we were,' at a point of time prior to that indicated in ποιοῦντες") children (not = υἱοί, but implying closer relation. The effect of the expression is to set those of whom it is predicated, beneath, in subjection to, as it were, the products of, ὀργή. So in the passages adduced by Harl.;—Deut. xxv. 2, אִם־בֶּן הַכּוֹת, 'if he be the son of stripes,' i. e. not as LXX and E. V. ἄξιος πληγῶν, but actually beaten:—1 Sam. xx. 31, בֶּן־מָוֶת הוּא, 'he is the son of death,'—i. e. as we express it, 'he is a dead man,' anticipating the effect of that which seems to be certain) by nature (the meaning of φύσει is disputed. Some of the ancients [Cyr., Œc., Thl.], and Grot. took it as = ὄντως, ἀληθῶς, which meaning it never bears; see on Gal. iv. 8. Others [Holzhausen, Hofm.] would join it with ὀργῆς, —'anger, which arises from the ungodly natural life:' but as Mey. remarks, even granting this use of φύσις, this would require τῆς τῇ φύσει ὀργῆς or τῆς ἐκ τῆς φύσ. ὀργῆς. It can then only mean, 'by nature.' And what does this imply? Harl., in loc., seems to have given the distinctive sense well: "φύσις, in its fundamental idea, is that which has grown as distinguished from that which has been effected [das Geworbene in Gegenſatz zum Gemachten], i. e. it is that which according to our judgment has the ground of its existence in individual development, not in accessory influence of another. Accordingly, φύσις, in its concrete idea, as the sum total of all growth, is 'rerum natura:' and in its abstract philosophical idea, φύσις is the contrast to θέσις. The φύσις of an individual thing denotes the peculiarity of its being, which is the result of its being, as opposed to every accessory quality: hence φύσει εἶναι or ποιεῖν τι means, 'sua sponte facere, esse aliquid' and 'natura esse aliquid:' to be and do any thing by virtue of a state [εἶναι] or an inclination [ποιεῖν], not acquired, but inherent: ἐξ-οιδα καὶ φύσει σε μὴ πεφυκότα | τοιαῦτα φωνεῖν, μηδὲ τεχνᾶσθαι κακά, Soph. Philoct. 80." If this be correct, the expression will amount to an assertion on the part of the Apostle of the doctrine of original sin. There is from its secondary position [cf. Plutarch de frat. am. p. 37, in Harl., ὀργάνων φύσει τοιούτων ἔτυχεν] no emphasis on φύσει: but its doctrinal force as referring to a fundamental truth otherwise known, is not thereby lessened. And it is not for Meyer to argue against this by assuming original sin not to be a pauline doctrine. If the Apostle asserts it here, this place must stand on its own merits, not be wrested to suit an apparent preconceived meaning of other passages. But the truth is, he cites those other passages in a sense quite alien from their real one. It would be easy to shew that every one of them [Rom. i. 18; ii. 8, 9; v. 12; vii. 9; xi. 21. Gal. ii. 15] is consistent with the doctrine here implied. The student will do well to read the long notes in Harl., De W., Stier, and Eadie) of wrath (WHOSE wrath, is evident: the meaning being, we were all concluded under and born in sin, and so actual objects of that wrath of God which is His mind against sin. ὀργή must not be taken as = τιμωρία, κόλασις, as Chrys., Thdrt., Basil, Thl., al.: this would in fact make the expression mean, actually punished: see above on τέκνα;—just as it now means, the

V. necessarily, by 'hath quickened' following; but to the verb below. ἡμᾶς are all Christians; = ἡμεῖς πάντες in the last verse) even when we were dead (the καί belongs to, and intensifies, the state predicated by ὄντας νεκρούς; and is therefore placed before the participle. It is not to be taken as a mere resumption of ver. 1 [Rück., al.], nor as the copula only [Meyer]. His objection to the above rendering, that a quickening to life can happen only in and from a state of death, and therefore no emphasis on such a state is required, is entirely removed by noticing that the emphasis is not on the mere fact ἐζωοποίησεν,—but on συνεζ. τῷ χριστῷ, with all its glorious consequences) in our (τοῖς, the π. which we committed) trespasses (see on ver. 1), vivified (not 'hath vivified'—a definite act in time, not an abiding consequence is spoken of) us together with Christ (the reading ἐν τ. χρ. [see var. readd.] seems to have arisen either from repetition of the -εν in συνεζωοποίησεν, or from conformation to ver. 6. It is clearly not allowable to render χριστῷ, in Christ, as Beza,—without the preposition. It is governed by the συν-, and implies not exactly as Chrys., ἐζωοποίησε κἀκεῖνον καὶ ἡμᾶς,—but that Christ was THE RESURRECTION and the Life, and we follow in and because of Him. The disputes about the meaning of ἐζωοποίησεν have arisen from not bearing in mind the relation in N. T. language between natural and spiritual death. We have often had occasion to observe that spiritual death in the N. T. includes in it and bears with it natural death as a consequence, to such an extent that this latter is often not thought of as worth mentioning: see especially John xi. 25, 26, which is the key-text for all passages regarding life in Christ. So here—God vivified us together with Christ: in the one act and fact of His resurrection He raised all His people—to spiritual life, and in that to victory over death, both spiritual, and therefore necessarily physical also. To dispute therefore whether such an expression as this is past [spiritual], or future [physical], is to forget that the whole includes its parts. Our spiritual life is the primary subject of the Apostle's thought: but this includes in itself our share in the resurrection and exaltation [ver. 6] of Christ. The three aorists, συνεζωοποίησεν, συνήγειρεν, συνεκάθισεν, are all proleptical as regards the actuation in each man, but equally describe a past and accomplished act on God's part when He raised up Christ)—by grace ye are saved (this insertion in the midst of the mention of such great unmerited mercies to us sinners, is meant emphatically to call the reader's attention to so cogent a proof of that which the Apostle ever preached as the great foundation truth of the Gospel. Notice the perf. 'are saved,' not σώζεσθε, 'are being saved,' because we have passed from death unto life: salvation is to the Christian not a future but a past thing, realized in the present by faith)—and raised us together with Him (the Resurrection of Christ being the next event consequent on His vivification in the tomb) and seated us together with Him (the Ascension being the completion of the Resurrection. So that all three verbs refer strictly to the same work wrought on Christ, and in Christ on all His mystical Body, the Church) in the heavenly places (see on ch. i. 3, 20. "Obiter observa, non dixisse Apostolum: 'et consedere fecit ad dexteram suam,' sicut superiori capite de Christo dixerat: sedere enim ad dexteram Patris Christo proprium est; nec cuiquam alteri communicatur: tametsi in throno Christi dicantur sessuri qui vicerint, Apoc. iii. in fine." Estius: and so Bengel) in Christ Jesus (as again specifying the element in which, as united and included in which, we have these blessings which have been enumerated—ἐν χρ. as in ch. i. 3, does not [Eadie] belong to τ. ἐπουρ. but to the verb, as an additional qualification, and recalling to the fact of our union in Him as the medium of our resurrection and glorification. The disputes as to whether these are to be taken as present or future, actual or potential, literal or spiritual, will easily be disposed of by those who have apprehended the truth of the believer's union in and with Christ. All these we have, in fact and reality [see Phil. iii. 20], in their highest, and therefore in all lower senses, in Him: they were ours, when they were His: but for their fulness in possession we are waiting till He come, when we shall be like and with Him),

7.] that He might shew forth (see Rom. ix. 23: and for ἐνδείξηται, reff. The middle voice gives the reference which the English sentence itself implies, that the exhibition is for His own purpose, for His own glory [see ch. i. 6, 12, 14] —see note on Col. ii. 15. This meaning of præ se ferre is illustrated by Liddell and Scott sub voce: or far better by Palm and Rost, Lex. Beware of the rendering 'might give a specimen of' [Rückert, Eadie], which the word will not bear either here or in reff.) in the ages which are hereafter to come (what are they? the future periods of the Church's earthly career,—or the ages of the glorified Church hereafter? The answer must be given by comparing this with the very similar expression in Col. i. 26, 27, ... τὸ μυστήριον τὸ ἀποκεκρυμμένον ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων κ. ἀπὸ τῶν γενεῶν, νυνὶ δὲ ἐφανερώθη τοῖς ἁγίοις αὐτοῦ, οἷς ἠθέλησεν ὁ θεὸς γνωρίσαι τίς ὁ πλοῦτος τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ κ.τ.λ. Here it is manifest (1) that the αἰῶνες from which the mystery was hidden are the past ages of this world; (2) that those to whom, as here, God will make known the riches of His glory, are His saints, i. e. His church on earth. Therefore I conceive we are compelled to interpret analogously: viz. to understand the αἰῶνες ἐπερχόμενοι of the coming ages of the church, and the persons involved in them to be the future members of the church. Thus the meaning will be nearly as in ch. i. 12. The supposed reference to the future state of glory seems not to agree with αἰῶνες, nor with ἐπερχόμενοι:—nor with the fact that the second coming and future kingdom of Christ are hardly ever alluded to in this Epistle) the exceeding riches of His grace in (of the material of which this display of His grace will consist, the department in which it will find its exercise) goodness (see especially Rom. ii. 4) towards us in (not 'through,' as E. V.)

ὁ θεὸς τὰ ἐν κόσμῳ πάντα προητοίμασεν: Wisd. ix. 8, μίμημα σκηνῆς ἁγίας ἣν προητοίμασας ἀπ' ἀρχῆς. The sentiment is the same as that in John v. 36, τὰ ἔργα ἃ ἔδωκέν μοι ὁ πατὴρ ἵνα τελειώσω αὐτά. To recur to the similitude used above, we might say of the trees,—they were created for fruits which God before prepared that they should bear them: i. e. defined and assigned to each tree its own, in form, and flavour, and time of bearing. So in the course of God's providence, our good works are marked out for and assigned to each one of us. See the doctrine of pre-existence in God explained in Delitzsch's biblische Psychologie, p. 23 ff. Stier's view, after Bengel, is that the verb προητ. is neuter, having no accusative after it,—'for which God made preparation, &c.:' but this usage of the compound verb wants example) that we should walk in them. Thus the truth of the maxim "bona opera non præcedunt justificandum, sed sequuntur justificatum" (see Harl.) is shewn. The sentiment is strictly pauline (against De W. and Baur), —in the spirit of Rom. xii., Gal. v. 22, 25, &c.

That this is the sense, is evident from ver. 13: see below. The words χωρ. χρ. are not a defining clause to ἦτε ἀπηλλοτρ., as Lachmann points them, and De W. and Eadie render: 'that ye were, being without Christ, &c.' The genitive may be explained either 1) as one of the quality, as in μέλεος ἥβης, εὐδαίμων μοίρας,—or as 2) one of privation = negative of possession, ξένος being resolved into οὐ μέτοχος. This latter is perhaps the best. The emphatic position of ἐλπίδα makes this the more necessary) and without God (this is the best rendering, as it leaves ἄθεος in its latitude of meaning. It may be taken either 1) actively, 'denying God,' 'atheist,' 2) in a neuter sense [see Ellic.]—'ignorant of God' [ἔρημοι θεογνωσίας, Thdrt.: see Gal. iv. 8; 1 Thess. iv. 5, where the Gentiles are described as οὐκ εἰδότες τ. θεόν], or 3) passively, 'forsaken of God' [so Soph. This latter meaning is best here, on account of the passive character of the other descriptive clauses) in the world (contrast to the πολιτεία τοῦ Ἰσρ. "He subjoins to the godless 'How,' the godless 'Where,'" Mey. Olsh. understands, 'in this wicked world, in which we have so much need of divine guidance,' which is hardly in the simple words: Rück., 'in God's world,' contrast to ἄθεοι. These words must not be separated, as some, from ἄθεοι). 13.] But now (contrast to ἐν τῷ καιρῷ ἐκείνῳ) in Christ (not merely ἐν χριστῷ as you were χωρὶς χριστοῦ, but more—in a personal Messiah, whom you know as) Jesus (there is hardly a reference to the meaning of Jesus —much rather to its personal import—q. d. The passive sense of the passive form ἐγενήθητε is well kept where the context justifies it, but must not always be pressed: see Ellic.'s note on ch. iii. 7) near (it was a common Jewish way of speaking, to designate the Gentiles as 'far off.' So Bereshith rabba, in Schöttg., Hor. Heb. in locum, 'Quicunque gentilem appropinquare facit, eumque ad religionem Judaicam perducit, idem est ac si creasset ipsum.' See also reff. I prefer 'in' to 'by,' as wider, and better representing the Apostle's idea. ver. 11, and mark the repetitions, χριστοῦ —χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ—τοῦ χριστοῦ, which this αὐτός takes up) is our peace (not by metonymy for εἰρηνοποιός, but in the widest and most literal sense, our peace. He did not make our peace and then retire, leaving us to enjoy that peace,—but is Himself its medium and its substance; His making both one was no external reconciliation, but the taking both, their common nature, on and into Himself,—see ver. 15. Bear in mind the multitude of prophetic passages which connect peace with Him, Isa. ix. 5, 6; lii. 7; liii. 5; lvii. 19; Micah v. 5; Hag. ii. 9; Zech. ix. 10: also Luke ii. 14; John xiv. 27; xx. 19, 21, 26. And notice that already the complex idea of the whole verse, that of uniting both Jews and Gentiles in one reconciliation to God, begins to appear: for He is our Peace, not only as reconciling Jew to Gentile, not as bringing the far-off Gentile near to the Jew, but as reconciling both, united, to God; as bringing the far-off Gentile, and the near Jew, both into peace with God. For want of observing this the sense has been much obscured: see below) who made (specification, how He is our peace. Better 'made,' than 'hath made:' the latter is true, but it is the historic fact which is here brought out) both (Jews and Gentiles; not 'man and God,' as Stier: cf. vv. 15, 16. Neuter, as abstract,—both things, both elements) one, and (epexegetic—'namely, in that he') threw down the middle wall of the fence (i. e. the middle wall which belonged to—was a necessary part of the carrying out of—the φραγμός. The primary allusion seems to be, to the rending of the veil at the crucifixion: not that that veil separated Jew and Gentile, but that it, the chief symbol of separation from God, included in its removal the admission to Him of that one body into which Christ made Jew and Gentile. This complex idea is before the Apostle throughout the sentence: and necessarily; for the reconciliation which Christ effected between Jew and Gentile was in fact only a subordinate step of the great reconciliation of both to God, which He effected by His sacrifice in the flesh,—and in speaking of one he speaks of the other also. The φραγμός, from what has been said above, is more general in sense than the μεσότοιχον; is in fact the whole arrangement, of which that was but an instrument—the separation itself, consequent on a system of separation: it = therefore the whole legal system, ceremonial and moral, which made the whole separation,—of Jew from Gentile,—and in the background, of both from God), the enmity (not, of Jew and Gentile: so strong a term is not justified as applying to their separation, nor does such a reference satisfy ver. 16,—see there;—but, the enmity in which both were involved against God, see Rom. viii. 7. τὴν ἔχθ. is in apposition with τὸ μεσότ. This enmity was the real cause of separation from God, and in being so, was the inclusive, mediate cause of the separation between Jew and Gentile. Christ, by abolishing the first, abolished the other also (see below) in His flesh (to be joined not with καταργήσας, as most Commentators, which is very harsh, breaking the parallelism, and making the instrumental predication precede the verb, which is not the character of this passage;—but with λύσας. Christ destroyed the μεσ., i. e. the ἔχθρα. in, or by, His flesh; see on ver. 16, where the same idea is nearly repeated. It was in His crucified flesh, which was ἐν ὁμοιώματι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας, that He slew this enmity. The rendering, 'the enmity which was in His flesh,' would certainly in this case require the specifying article τήν, besides being very questionable in sense), — having done away the law of decretory commandments (this law was the φραγμός,—the great exponent of the ἔχθρα. Its specific nature was that it consisted in commandments, decretorily or dogmatically expressed; — in ἐντολαῖ-ἐν-δόγμασιν. So that we do not require τὸν ἐν δόγ. or τῶν ἐν δόγ. This law, moral and ceremonial, its decalogue, its ordinances, its rites, was entirely done away in and by the death of Christ. See Col. ii. 13—15, notes. And the end of that κατάργησις was) that He might create the two (Jew and Gentile) in Him (it is somewhat difficult to decide between ἑαυτῷ and αὐτῷ. On the one hand, αὐτῷ is the harder reading: on the other, we have the constant confusion of αὐτ., αὑτ., and ἑαυτ., complicating the question. Whichever be read, the reference clearly must be to Christ, which, with' αὐτῷ, is, to say the least, a harsh recurrence to the αὐτός of ver. 14) into one new man (observe, not that He might reconcile the two to each other only, nor is the Apostle speaking merely of any such reconciliation: but that He might incorporate the two, reconciled in Him to God, into one new man,—the old man to which both belonged, the enemy of God, having been slain in His flesh on the Cross. Observe, too, ONE new man: we are all in God's sight but one in Christ, as we are but one in Adam), making peace (not, between Jew and Gentile: He is ἡ εἰρήνη ἡμῶν, of us all: see below on ver. 17), and (parallel with the former purpose: not 'second purpose' [Ellic., De W.], which yet must thus be the first. The καί is in fact just as in ver. 14) might reconcile again (most likely this is implied in the ἀπο. We have it only in Col. i. 20, 21, where the same sense, of reinstating in the divine favour, seems to be intended) both of us in one body (not His own human body, as Chrys. [who however seems to waver,—cf. ἕως ἂν μένωμεν ἐν τῷ σώματι τοῦ χριστοῦ,—between this and His mystical body], al.—but the Church, cf. the same expression Col. iii. 15) to God (if this had not been here expressed, the whole reference of the sentence would have been thought to be to the uniting Jews and Gentiles. That it is expressed, now shews that throughout, that union has been thought of only as a subordinate step in a greater reconciliation) by means of the cross (the cross regarded as the symbol of that which was done on and by it), having slain the enmity (ἔχθρα has been taken here to mean the enmity between Jew and Gentile. But see on ver. 15: and let us ask here, was this the enmity which Christ slew at His death? Was this the ἔχθρα, the slaying of which brought in the ἀποκατάλλαξις, as this verse implies? Does such a meaning of ἔχθρα at all satisfy the solemnity of the sentence, or of the next two verses? I cannot think so: and must maintain ἔχθρα here [and if here, then in ver. 15 also] to be that between man and God, which Christ did slay on the cross, and which being brought to an end, the separation between Jew and Gentile, which was a result of it, was done away. Ellicott, who maintained the above opinion in his 1st edn., now agrees with that here insisted on) on it (on the cross: compare Col. ii. 15, notes: not in His body: see above): and having come, He preached (how? when? Obviously after his death, because by that death the peace was wrought. We seek in vain for any such announcement made by Him in person after his resurrection. But we find a key to the expression in John xiv. 18, οὐκ ἀφήσω ὑμᾶς ὀρφανούς· ἔρχομαι πρὸς ὑμᾶς: see also ver. 28. And this coming was, by his Spirit poured out on the Church. There is an expression of St. Paul's, singularly parallel with this, and of itself strongly corroborative of the genuineness of our Epistle, in Acts xxvi. 23, εἰ παθητὸς ὁ χριστός, εἰ πρῶτος ἐξ ἀναστάσεως νεκρῶν φῶς μέλλει καταγγέλλειν τῷ τε λαῷ κ. τοῖς ἔθνεσιν. This coming therefore is by His Spirit [see on ver. 18], and ministers, and ordinances in the Church) peace to you who were far off, and peace to those (not "to us," for fear of still upholding the distinction where he wishes to merge it altogether) that were nigh (this εἰρήνη is plainly then not mere mutual reconciliation, but that far greater peace which was effected by Christ's death, peace with God, which necessitated the union of the far off and the near in one body in Him. This is shewn especially by the repetition of εἰρήνην. See Isa. lvii. 19. Then follows the empowering reason, why He should preach peace to us both: and it is this ver. 18 especially which I maintain cannot be satisfied on the ordinary hypothesis of mere reconciliation between Jew and Gentile being the subject in the former verses. Here clearly the union [not reconciliation, nor is enmity predicated of them] of Jew and Gentile is subordinated to the blessed fact of an access TO GOD having been provided for both through Christ by the Spirit); for (not epexegetic of εἰρήνην, 'viz. that ....,' as Baumg.-Crus.) through Him we have our access (I prefer this intransitive meaning to that maintained by Ellic., al., 'introduction,'—some [Mey.] say, by Christ [1 Pet. iii. 18] as our προσαγωγεύς [admissionalis, a word of Oriental courts], —not as differing much from it in meaning, but as better representing, both here and in Rom. v. 2, and ch. iii. 12, the repetition, the present liberty of approach, which ἔχομεν implies, but which 'introduction' does not give), both of us, in (united in, 1 Cor. xii. 13) one Spirit (not 'one frame of mind' [Anselm, Koppe, al.]: the whole structure of the sentence, as compared with any similar one, such as 2 Cor. xiii. 13, will shew what spirit is meant, viz. the Holy Spirit of God, already alluded to in ver. 17; see above. As a parallel, cf. 1 Cor. xii. 13) to the Father. 19.] So then (ἄρα οὖν is said by Hermann [Viger, art. 292] not to be classical Greek. It is frequent in St. Paul, but confined to him: see reff. Cf. on Gal. vi. 10) ye no longer are strangers and sojourners (see ref. Acts, where certainly this is the sense. "πάροικος is here simply the same as the classic μέτοικος [a form which does not occur in the N. T., and only once, Jer. xx. 3, in the LXX], and was probably its Alexandrian equivalent. It is used frequently in the LXX,—in eleven passages as a translation of גֵּר, and in nine of תּוֹשָׁב." Ellicott. 'Sojourners,' as dwelling among the Jews, but not numbered with them. Bengel opposes ξένοι to 'cives' and πάροικοι to 'domestici,'—and so Harless: but this seems too artificial), but are fellow-citizens with the saints (συμπολίτης is blamed by Phrynichus [ed. Lob. p. 172: see Lobeck's note] and the Atticists as a later word. But it occurs in Eur. Heraclid. 821, and the compound verb συμπολιτεύω is found in pure Attic writers: see Palm and Rost's Lex. πολῖται would not here express the meaning of comrades, co-citizens, of the saints. οἱ ἅγιοι are not angels, nor Jews, nor Christians then alive merely, but the saints of God in the widest sense,—all members of the mystical body of Christ,—the commonwealth of the spiritual Israel) and of the household (οἰκεῖοι, not as Harl., 'stones of which the house is built,' which is an unnatural anticipation here, where all is a political figure, of the material figure in the next verse: but 'members of God's family,' in the usual sense of the word) of God,— having been built (we cannot express the ἐπ-: the 'superædificati' of the Vulg. gives it: we have the substantive 'superstructure,' but no verb corresponding. There is, though Harl. [see above] denies it, a transition from one image, a political and social, to another, a material) upon the foundation (dative as resting upon: in 1 Cor. iii. 12, where we have εἴ τις ἐποικοδομεῖ ἐπὶ τὸν θεμέλιον ....., the idea of bringing and laying upon is prominent, and therefore the case of motion is used. Between the genitive and dative of rest with ἐπί there is the distinction, that the genitive implies more partial overhanging, looser connexion,—the dative, a connexion of close fitting attachment. So in Xen. we have, ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς τὰ ὅπλα ἔφερον, partial, 'over,'—οἱ θρᾷκες ἀλωπεκίδας ἐπὶ ταῖς κεφαλαῖς φοροῦσι, close, 'on:' see Donaldson's Greek Gr. § 483) of the Apostles and Prophets (how is this genitive to be understood? Is it a genitive of apposition, so that the Apostles and Prophets themselves are the foundation? This has been supposed by numerous Commentators, from Chrys. to De Wette. But, not to mention the very many other objections which have been well and often urged against this view, this one is to my mind decisive, —that it entirely destroys the imagery of the passage. The temple, into which these Gentiles were built, is the mystical body of the Son, in which the Father dwells by the Spirit, ver. 22. The Apostles and Prophets [see below], yea, Jesus Christ Himself, as the great inclusive Head Corner Stone [see again below], are also built into this temple. [That He includes likewise the foundation, and IS the foundation, is true, and must be remembered, but is not prominent here.] Clearly then the Apostles and Prophets cannot be the foundation, being here spoken of as parts of the building, together with these Gentiles, and with Jesus Christ Himself. But again, does the genitive mean, the foundation which the Apostles and Prophets have laid? So also very many, from Ambrst., to Rück., Harl., Mey., Stier, Ellic., both edd. As clearly,—not thus. To introduce them here as agents, is as inconsistent as the other. No agents are here spoken of, but merely the fact of the great building in its several parts being built up together. The only remaining interpretation then is, to regard the genitive as simply possessive: 'the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets,' = 'the Apostles' and Prophets' foundation'—that upon which they as well as yourselves are built. This exegesis, which I find ascribed to Bucer only (in De W.), seems to me beyond question the right one. See more below. But (2) who are προφῆται? They have commonly been taken, without enquiry, as the O. T. Prophets. And certainly, the sense, with some little straining, would admit of this view. They may be said to be built upon Christ, as belonging to that widest acceptation of His mystical body, in which it includes all the saints, O. T. as well as N. T. But there are several objections: first, formal: the order of the words has been urged against this view, in that προφ. should have come first. I should not be inclined to lay much weight on this; the Apostles might naturally be spoken of first, as nearest, and the Prophets second—'the Apostles, yea and of the Prophets also.' A more serious formal objection is, the omission of the article before προφ., thereby casting τῶν ἀποστόλων κ. προφητῶν together as belonging to the same class. But weightier objections are behind. In ch. iii. 5, we have ὃ ἑτέραις γενεαῖς οὐκ ἐγνωρίσθη τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων, ὡς νῦν ἀπεκαλύφθη τοῖς ἁγίοις ἀποστόλοις αὐτοῦ κ. προφήταις ἐν πνεύματι, where unquestionably the προφῆται are N. T. Prophets; and again ch. iv. 11, καὶ αὐτὸς ἔδωκεν τοὺς μὲν ἀποστόλους, τοὺς δὲ προφήτας. And it is difficult to conceive that the Apostle should have used the two words conjoined here, in a different sense. Even stronger is the consideration arising from the whole sense of the passage. All here is strictly Christian,—post-Judaic,—consequent on Christ's death, and triumph, and His coming preaching peace by the Spirit to the united family of man. So that we must decide for προφ. being N. T. Prophets: those who ranked next to the Apostles in the government of the church: see Acts xi. 27, note. They were not in every case distinct from the Apostles: the apostleship probably always including the gift of prophecy: so that all the Apostles themselves might likewise have been προφῆται), Christ Jesus Himself (the αὐτοῦ exalts the dignity of the temple, in that not only it has among its stones Apostles and prophets, but the Lord Himself is built into it. The attempt of Bengel, al., to render αὐτοῦ, 'its,' and refer it to θεμελίῳ, will be seen, by what has been said, to be foreign to Bengel's idea, that on our rendering, it must be αὐτοῦ τοῦ, is refuted by such passages as καὶ αὐτὸς Δαυείδ, Luke xx. 42) being the Head corner stone (see, besides reff., Ps. cxvii. 22; Jer. xxviii. (li.) 26; Matt. xxi. 42; Acts iv. 11. The reference here is clearly to that Headstone of the Corner, which is not only the most conspicuous but the most important in the building: "qui, in extremo angulo [fundamenti, but qu. ?] positus, duos parietes ex diverso venientes conjungit et continet," Est. Builders set up such a stone, or build such a pillar of brick, before getting up their walls, to rule and square them by. I must again repeat, that the fact of Jesus Christ being Himself the foundation, however it underlies the whole, is not to be brought in as interfering with this portion of the figure), 21.] in whom (ὁ τὸ πᾶν συνέχων ἐστὶν ὁ χριστός, Chr.: not only so, but He is in reality the inclusive Head of the building: it all ἐν αὐτῷ συνίστηκεν, is squared and ruled by its unity to and in Him) all the building (more properly πᾶσα ἡ οἰκοδ.: and to a classical Greek ear, any other rendering of πᾶσα οἰκ. than 'every building,' seems preposterous enough. But 'every building' here is quite out of place, inasmuch as the Apostle is clearly speaking of but one vast building, the mystical Body of Christ: and πᾶσα οἰκ. cannot have Meyer's sense 'every congregation thus built in:' nor would it be much better to take refuge in the proper sense of οἰκοδομή, and render 'all building,' i. e. 'every process of building,' for then we should be at a loss when we come to αὔξει below. Are we then to render ungrammatically, and force words to that which they cannot mean? Certainly not: but we seem to have some light cast here by such an expression as πρωτότοκος πάσης κτίσεως, Col. i. 15, which though it may be evaded by rendering 'of every creature,' yet is not denied by most Commentators to be intended to bear this sense 'of all creation:' cf. also ib. ver. 23, ἐν πάσῃ κτίσει τῇ ὑπ' οὐρανόν. The account to be given of such later usages is, that gradually other words besides proper names became regarded as able to dispense with the article after πᾶς, so that as they said first πᾶσα Ἱεροσόλυμα [Matt. ii. 3], and then πᾶς οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ [Acts ii. 36], so they came at length to say πᾶσα κτίσις [as we ourselves 'all creation,' for 'all the creation'] and πᾶσα οἰκοδομή, when speaking of one universal and notorious building. Ellic. adds to the examples, πᾶσα γῆ, Thucyd. ii. 43, πᾶσα ἐπιστολή, Ignat. Eph. § 12, p. 656.

οἰκοδομή itself is a late form, censured by Phryn. [Lob. p. 421] and the Atticists) being framed exactly together (the verb [= συναρμόζω] sufficiently explains itself, being only found in these two places [ref.]. Wetst. quotes ἡρμολόγησε τάφον from Anthol. iii. 32. 4, and Palm and Rost refer for ἁρμολογέω to Philip of Thessalonica, Ep. 78) is growing (there seems no reason why the proper sense of the present should not be retained. Both participle and verb imply that the fitting together and the growing are still going on: and the only way which we in English have to mark this so as to avoid the chance of mistake, is by the auxiliary verb substantive, and the participle. The bare present, 'groweth,' is in danger of being mistaken for the abstract quality, and the temporal development is thus lost sight of: whereas the other, in giving prominence to that temporal development, also necessarily implies the 'normal, perpetual, unconditioned nature of the organic increase' [Ellic.]) to (so 'crescere in cumulum,' Claudian in Piscator) an holy temple in the Lord (i. e. according to apostolic usage, and the sense of the whole passage, 'in Christ.' The ἐν ᾧ—ἐν κυρίῳ, —ἐν ᾧ,—like the frequent repetitions of the name χριστός in vv. 12, 13, are used by the Apostle to lay all stress on the fact that Christ is the inclusive Head of all the building, the element in which it has its being and its growth. ἐν κυρίῳ with ναὸν ἅγιον, as more accordant with the Apostle's style than if it were joined with αὔξει [αὔξει ἐν κυρ. εἰς ναὸν ἅγ.], or with ἅγιον [εἰς ναὸν ἐν κυρίῳ ἅγ.]. The increase spoken of will issue in its being a holy temple in Christ), 22.] in whom (not 'in which,' viz. the temple—it is characteristic [see above] of this part of the epistle to string together these relative expressions, all referring to the same) ye also (not, as Eadie, 'even you:' there is no depreciation here, but an exaltation, of the Gentiles, as living stones of the great building) are being built in together (with one another, or with those before mentioned. An imperative sense ['Ephesios hortatur ut crescant in fide Christi magis et magis postquam in ea semel fuerunt fundati,' Calv.] is not for a moment to be thought of: the whole passage is descriptive, not hortatory) for (Griesb. parenthesizes with two commas, ἐν ᾧ . . . . συνοικοδομεῖσθε, and takes this εἰς as parallel with the former εἰς. But this unnecessarily involves the sentence, which is simple enough as it stands) an habitation of God (the only true temple of God, in which He dwells, being the Body of Christ, in all the glorious acceptation of that term) in the Spirit (it is even now, in the state of imperfection, by the Spirit, dwelling in the hearts of believers, that God has His habitation in the Church: and then, when the growth and increase of that Church shall be completed, it will be still in and by the Holy Spirit fully penetrating and possessing the whole glorified Church, that the Father will dwell in it for ever. Thus we have the true temple of the Father, built in the Son, inhabited in the Spirit: the offices of the Three blessed Persons being distinctly pointed out: God, THE FATHER, in all His fulness, dwells in, fills the Church: that Church is constituted an holy Temple to Him in THE SON,—is inhabited by Him in the ever-present indwelling of the HOLY SPIRIT. The attempt to soften away ἐν πνεύματι into πνευματικῶς [ναὸς πνευματικός, Chrys., and so Thl., Œc., al., and even Olsh.] is against the whole sense of the passage, in which not the present spiritual state of believers, but their ultimate glorious completion [εἰς] is spoken of. See reff.).

III. 1—21.] AIM AND END OF THE CHURCH IN THE SPIRIT. And herein, the revelation to it of the mystery of Christ, through those ministers who wrought in the Spirit: primarily, as regarded the Ephesians, through himself. Thus first, of HIS OFFICE AS APOSTLE OF THE GENTILES (1—13): secondly, under the form of a prayer for them, THE AIM AND END OF THAT OFFICE AS RESPECTED THE CHURCH: its becoming strong in the power of the Spirit (14—19). Then (20, 21) doxology, concluding this first division of the Epistle. 1—13.] (See above.) On this account (in order to explain this, something must be said on the construction. (a) Chrys. says:—εἴτε τοῦ χριστοῦ τὴν κηδεμονίαν τὴν πολλὴν ἐκβαίνει λοιπὸν κ. ἐπὶ τὴν ἑαυτοῦ, μικρὰν μὲν οὖσαν κ. σφόδρα οὐδὲν πρὸς ἐκείνην, ἱκανὴν δὲ καὶ ταύτην ἐπισπάσασθαι. διὰ τοῦτο καὶ ἐγὼ δέδεμαι, φησίν. This supplying of εἰμί after ὁ δέσμιος, and making the latter the predicate, is the rendering of Syr., and adopted by very many. It has against it, 1) that thus τούτου χάριν and ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν become tautological: 2) that thus ver. 2 and the following are unconnected with the preceding, serving for no explanation of it ['legationis, non vinculorum rationem explicat,' Castalio in Harl.]: 3) that the article ὁ with the predicate δέσμιος gives it undue prominence, and exalts the Apostle in a way which would be very unnatural to him,—'sum captivus ille Christi,' as Glass.,—and inconsistent with εἴ γε ἠκούσατε, &c. following. (b) Erasm.-Schmidt, Hammond, Michael., Winer [and so E. V.] regard the sentence, broken at ἐθνῶν, as resumed at ch. iv. 1. Against this is the decisive consideration, that ch. iii. is no parenthesis, but an integral and complete portion of the Epistle, finished moreover with the doxology vv. 20, 21, and altogether distinct in subject and character from ch. iv. (c) Œc. says [and so Estius and Grot.]: ἀνταπόδοσίς ἐστι τούτου χάριν, οἷον τούτου χ. ἐμοὶ τῷ ἐλ. π. ἐγ. ἐδόθ. κ.τ.λ. (ver. 8) σκόπει δὲ ὅτι ἀρξάμενος τῆς περιόδου κατὰ τὸ ὀρθὸν σχῆμα ἐν τῇ ἀποδόσει ἐπλαγίωσε, σχηματίσας τ. ἀνταπόδοσιν πρὸς τὸν περιβολῶν τόπον. But as Harl. remarks, this deprives τούτου χάριν of meaning: for it was not because they were built in, &c., that this grace was given to him: and, besides, thus the leading thought of the antapodosis in ver. 8 is clumsily forestalled in vv. 6, 7. (d) The idea that ver. 13 resumes the sentence [Camerar., Cramer, al.] is refuted by the insufficiency of such a secondary sentiment as that in ver. 13 to justify the long parenthesis full of such solemn matter, as that vv. 2—12; and by the improbability that the Apostle would resume τούτου χάριν by διά, with τούτου χάριν occurring again in the next verse, and not rather have expressed this latter in that case by καί. (e) It remains that with Thdrt. [on ver. 1, βούλεται μὲν εἰπεῖν· ὅτι ταύτην ὑμῶν τὴν κλῆσιν εἰδὼς κ.τ.λ. δέομαι κ. ἱκετεύω τὸν τῶν ὅλων θεόν, βεβαιῶσαι ὑμᾶς τῇ πίστει κ.τ.λ., then on ver. 14, ταῦτα πάντα ἐν μέσῳ τεθεικὼς ἀναλαμβάνει τὸν περὶ προσευχῆς λόγον], Luth., Piscr., Corn.-a-lap., Schöttg., Beng., Rück., Harl., De W., Stier, Ellic., al., we consider ver. 14 as taking up the sense, with its repetition of τούτου χάριν, and the weighty prayer which it introduces, and which forms a worthy justification for so long and solemn a parenthesis. τούτου χάριν will then mean, 'seeing ye are so built in,' —stand in such a relation to God's purposes in the church) I Paul (he mentions himself here, as introducing to them the agent in the Spirit's work who was nearest to themselves, and setting forth that work as the carrying on of his enlightenment on their behalf, and the subject of his earnest prayer for them: see argument to this chapter above), the prisoner (but now without any prominence, or the very slightest: cf. The matter of fact was so:—his preaching to Gentiles aroused the jealousy of the Jews, and led to his imprisonment. But he rather thinks of it as a result of his great office and himself as a sacrifice for those whom it was his intent to benefit),—if, that is (εἴ γε, 'assuming that:' see note on 2 Cor. v. 3. The Ephesians had heard all this, and St. Paul was now delicately reminding them of it. Olshausen says, "It is certainly peculiar, that Paul here calls the Apostles, and consequently himself among them, 'holy Apostles.' It is going too far when De W. finds in this a sign of an unapostolic origin of the Epistle: but still the expression remains an unusual one. I account for it to myself thus,—that Paul here conceives of the Apostles and Prophets, as a corporation (cf. ch. iv. 11), and as such, in their official character, he gives them the predicate ἅγιος, as he names believers, conceived as a whole, ἅγιοι or ἡγιασμένοι, but never an individual") Apostles and Prophets (as in ch. ii. 20, the N. being a word found only here [Harl., Stier], occurs in Eur., Iph. Taur. 1149, πολυποίκιλα φάρεα: in a fragment of Eubulus, Ath. xv. 7, p. 679, στέφανον πολυποίκιλον ἀνθέων, and twice in the Orphic hymns, in this figurative sense: πολυποίκιλος τελετή, v. 11; π. λόγος, lx. 4) wisdom of God (how is the wisdom of God πολυποίκιλος? It is all one in sublime unity of truth and purpose: but cannot be apprehended by finite minds in this its unity, and therefore is by Him variously portioned out to each finite race and finite capacity of individuals—so that the Church is a mirror of God's wisdom, —chromatic, so to speak, with the rainbow colours of that light which in itself is one and undivided. Perhaps there was in the Apostle's mind, when he chose this word, an allusion to the πτέρυγες περιστερᾶς περιηργυρωμέναι καὶ τὰ μετάφρενα ἐν χλωρότητι χρυσίου, the adornment of the ransomed church, in Ps. lxvii. 13. See Heb. i. 1; 1 Pet. iv. 10),

11.] according to (depends on γνωρισθῇ—this imparting of the knowledge of God's manifold wisdom was in accordance with, &c.) the (not, 'a:' after a preposition, especially when a limiting genitive, as here, follows, the omission of the article can hardly be regarded as affecting the sense) purpose of (the) ages (the genitive is apparently one of time, as when we say, 'it has been an opinion of years:' the duration all that time giving the αἰῶνες a kind of possession. If so, the sense is best given in English by 'eternal' as in E. V.), which (πρόθεσιν) He made (constituted, ordained. So Calv., Beza, Harl., Rück. On the other hand, Thdrt., Grot., Koppe, Olsh., Mey., De W., Stier, Ellic., would apply it to the carrying out, executing, in its historical realization. I can hardly think that so indefinite a word as ποιέω would have been used to express so very definite an idea, now introduced for the first time, but believe the Apostle would have used some word like ἐπετέλεσεν. Further, we should thus rather expect the perfect; whereas the aorist seems to refer back the act spoken of to the origination of the design. Both senses of ποιέω are abundantly justified: see, for our sense, Mark xv. 1; Isa. xxix. 15: for the other, ch. ii. 3; Matt. xxi. 31; John vi. 38; 1 Thess. v. 24 al.) in Jesus our Lord the Christ (or, 'in the Christ, [namely] Jesus our Lord.' The former is official, the latter personal. It was in his Christ that He made the purpose: and that Christ is Jesus our Lord. The words do not necessarily refer ἐποίησεν to the carrying out of the design. They bind together God's eternal purpose and our present state of access to Him by redemption in Christ, and so close the train of thought of the last eleven verses, by bringing us again home to the sense of our own blessedness in Christ. That he says, ἐν τ. χριστῷ Ἰησ., does not, as Olsh. and Stier, imply that the act spoken of must necessarily be subsequent to the Incarnation: see ch. i. 3, 4: it is the complex personal appellation of the Son of God, taken from, and familiar to us by His incarnation, but applied to Him in His pre-existence also),

12.] in whom (for the connexion, see note on last verse: in whom, as their element and condition) we have our boldness (not 'freedom of speech' merely, nor boldness in prayer: παρρησία is used in a far wider sense than these, as will appear by the reff.: viz., that of the state of mind which gives liberty of speech, cheerful boldness, 'freimuthigkeit,' Palm and Rost.'s lex.) and [our] access (see note on ch. ii. 18: here the intransitive sense is even more necessary, from the union with παρρησίαν. We may confidently say, that so important an objective truth as our introduction to God by Christ would never have been thus coupled to a mere subjective quality in ourselves. Both must be subjective if one is: the second less purely so than the first—but both referring to our own feelings and privileges) in confidence (τουτέστι, μετὰ τοῦ θαῤῥεῖν, Chrys. Meyer remarks what a noble example St. Paul himself has given of this πεποίθησις in Rom. viii. 38 f. πεποίθησις is a word of late Greek; see Lobeck's Phrynichus, p. 294) through the faith connexion of πατήρ and πατριά here expressed. Had the sentence been, 'the Creator, after whom every creature in heaven and earth is named,' all would be plain to the English reader. But we must not thus render; for it is not in virtue of God's creative power that the Apostle here prays to Him, but in virtue of His adoptive love in Christ. It is best therefore to keep the simple sense of the words, and leave it to exegesis to convey the idea. πατριά is the family, or in a wider sense the gens, named so from its all having one πατήρ. Some [Est., Grot., Wetst., al.] have supposed St. Paul to allude to the rabbinical expression, 'the family of earth and the family of heaven:' but as Harl. observes, in this case he would have said π. ἡ πατρ., ἡ ἐν οὐρ. κ. ἡ ἐπὶ γ. Others [Vulg., Jer., Thdrt.,—ὅτι ἀληθῶς ὑπάρχει πατήρ, ὃς οὐ παρ' ἄλλου τοῦτο λαβὼν ἔχει, ἀλλ' αὐτὸς τοῖς ἄλλοις μεταδέδωκε τοῦτο,—Corn.-a-lap.] have attempted to give πατριά the sense of paternitas, which it can certainly never have. But it is not so easy to say, to what the reference is, or why the idea is here introduced. The former of these will be found very fully discussed in Stier, pp. 487—99: and the latter more shortly treated. The Apostle seems, regarding God as the Father of us His adopted children in Christ, to go forth into the fact, that He, in this His relation to us, is in reality the great original and prototype of the paternal relation, wherever found. And this he does, by observing that every πατριά, compaternity, body of persons, having a common father, is thus named [in Greek], from that father, —and so every earthly [and heavenly] family reflects in its name [and constitution] the being and sourceship of the great Father Himself. But then, what are πατριαί in heaven? Some have treated the idea of paternity there as absurd: but is it not necessarily involved in any explanation of this passage? He Himself is the Father of spirits, Heb. xii. 9, the Father of lights, James i. 17:—may there not be fathers in the heavenly Israel, as in the earthly? May not the holy Angels be bound up in spiritual πατριαί, though they marry not nor are given in marriage? Observe, we must not miss the sense of ὀνομάζεται, nor render, nor understand it, as meaning 'is constituted.' This is the fact, but not brought out here), 16.] that (see on ἵνα after words of beseeching, &c., note, 1 Cor. xiv. 13. The purpose and purport of the prayer are blended in it) He may give you, according to the riches of His glory (specifies δῷ, not what follows: give you, in full proportion to the abundance of His own glory—His own infinite perfections), to be strengthened with might (the dative has been taken in several ways: 1) adverbially, 'mightily,' as βίᾳ εἰς οἰκίαν παριέναι, Xen. Cyr. i. 2. 2,—to which Meyer objects, that thus δύναμις would be strength on the side of the bestower rather than of the receiver, whereas the contrast with ἐγκακεῖν (?) requires the converse. This hardly seems sufficient to disprove the sense: 2) dative of the form or shape in which the κρατ. was to take place (Harl., al.), as in χρήμασι δυνατοὶ εἶναι, Xen. Mem. ii. 7. 7,—to which Meyer replies that thus the κραταιωθῆναι would only apply to one department of the spiritual life, instead of to all. But this again seems to me not valid: for 'might,' 'power,' is not one faculty, but a qualification of all faculties. Rather I should say that such a meaning would involve a tautology—'strengthened in strength.' 3) the instrumental dative is maintained by Mey., De W., al., and this view seems the best: 'with [His] might,' imparted to you) by His Spirit (as the instiller and imparter of that might) into (not merely 'in,' but 'to and into,' as Ellic.: importing "the direction and destination of the prayed for gift of infused strength." κραταιοῖ, κατοικίζων εἰς τὸν χωροῦντα ἕως ἀνθρωπον τὸν χριστόν, Schol. in Cramer's Catena. But those cases are not parallel, as in every one of them the prefixed words carry especial emphasis, which here they cannot do. We must therefore regard the clause as an instance of the irregular nominative [see ch. iv. 2; Col. ii. 2, and reff. there] adopted to form an easy transition to that which follows. Meyer strongly objects to this, that the participles are perfect, not present, which would be thus logically required. But surely this last is a mistake. It is upon the completion, not upon the progress, of their rooting and grounding in love, that the next clause depends. So Orig., Chrys., all., and Harl., De W., and Ellic.) rooted and grounded (both images, that of a tree, and that of a building, are supposed to have been before the Apostle's mind. τῷ σταυρῷ ἐπιδεικνύμενος, οὕτως εἶπεν. Severianus, in Cramer's Catena. Similarly Origen, ib., Jer., Aug., Anselm, Aquin., Est. ('longitudo temporum est, latitudo locorum, altitudo gloriæ, profunditas discretionis'). Numerous other explanations, geometrical, architectural, and spiritual, may be seen in Corn.-a-lap., Pole's Synops., and Eadie. The latter, as also Bengel and Stier, see an allusion to the Church as the temple of God—Chandler and Macknight to the temple of Diana at Ephesus. Both are in the highest degree improbable. Nor can we quite say that the object of the sentence is the love of Christ [Calv., Mey., Ellicott, al.]: for that is introduced in a subordinate clause by and by [see on τε below]: rather, with De W., that the genitive after these nouns is left indefinite—that you may be fully able to comprehend every dimension—scil., of all that God has revealed or done in and for us [= τὸ μυστήριον τ. θεοῦ, Col. ii. 2]—though this is not a genitive to be supplied, but lying in the background entirely) and (τε introduces not a parallel, but a subordinate clause. See Kühner, ii. § 540. γνῶναι . . . γνώσεως are chosen as a paradox, γνώσεως being taken in the sense of 'mere,' 'bare' knowledge [ref.], and γνῶναι in the pregnant sense of that knowledge which is rooted and grounded in love, Phil. i. 9) Love of Christ (subjective genitive; Christ's Love to us—see Rom. v. 5 note, and viii. 35—39—not 'our love to Christ.' Nor must we interpret with Harl. [and Olsh.], "to know the Love of Christ more and more as an unsearchable love." It is not this attribute of Christ's Love, but the Love itself, which he prays that they may know), that ye may be filled even to all the fulness of God (πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα τῆς θεότητος abides in Christ, Col. ii. 9. Christ then abiding in your hearts, ye, being raised up to the comprehension of the vastness of God's mercy in Him and of His Love, will be filled, even as God is full—each in your degree, but all to your utmost capacity, with divine wisdom and might and love. Such seems much the best rendering: and so Chrys. [altern.], ὥστε πληροῦσθαι πάσης ἀρετῆς ἧς πλήρης ἐστὶν ὁ θεός. τοῦ θ. then is the possessive genitive. The other interpretation taking θεοῦ as a genitive of origin, and πλήρωμα for πλῆθος, 'ut omnibus Dei donis abundetis,' Est., is not consistent with εἰς [see above], nor with the force of the passage, which having risen in sublimity with every clause, would hardly end so tamely).

"It is noticeable that ὑπέρ occurs nearly thrice as many times in St. Paul's Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews as in the rest of the N. T., and that, with a few exceptions [Mark vii. 37. If the καί be omitted, beware of rendering 'in the Church which is in Christ Jesus,' which would not only require the article [cf. Gal. i. 22, ταῖς ἐκκλ. τῆς Ἰουδαίας ταῖς ἐν χριστῷ], but would make ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ superfluous. As the text stands, we need not say that ἐν χρ. Ἰησ. is a second independent clause: it belongs to ἐν τῇ ἐκκ. as inclusive of it, though not as descriptive of ἐκκλ.: 'in the Church and [thus] in Christ Jesus') to all the generations of the age of the ages (probably as Grot., 'augendi causa duas locutiones Hebraicas miscuit Apostolus, quarum prior est ἀπὸ γενεᾶς εἰς γενεάν, לְדֹר וָדֹר, Ps. x. 6, altera ἕως τοῦ αἰῶνος עַד עוֹלָם, Isa. xlv. 17.' Probably the account of the meaning is, that the age of ages [eternity] is conceived as containing ages, just as our 'age' contains years: and then those ages are thought of as made up, like ours, of generations. Like the similar expression, αἰῶνες τῶν αἰώνων, it is used, by a transfer of what we know in time, to express, imperfectly, and indeed improperly, the idea of Eternity).

the ἐν which follows) all (see on ch. i. 8) lowliness (read by all means Trench's essay on ταπεινοφροσύνη and πραότης, in his N. T. Synonymes [xlii.]. I can only extract one sentence here, to put the reader on his guard: "Chrys. is in fact bringing in pride again under the disguise of humility, when he characterizes it as a making of ourselves small when we are great [ταπεινοφροσύνη τοῦτό ἐστιν, ὅταν τις μέγας ὤν, ἑαυτὸν ταπεινοῖ: and he repeats this often: see Suicer, Thes. s. v.]: it is rather the esteeming ourselves small, inasmuch as we are so: the thinking truly, and because truly, lowlily of ourselves") and meekness (before God, accepting His dealings in humility, and before men, as God's instruments, 2 Sam. xvi. 11: resting therefore on ταπεινοφρ. as its foundation. See Trench, as above), with long-suffering (μακροθυμία consists in not taking swift vengeance, but leaving to an offender a place for repentance. From this, its proper meaning, it is easily further generalized to forbearance under all circumstances of provocation. Some, as Est., Harl., Olsh., al., join these words with ἀνεχόμενοι. But thus (1) we should have an emphatic tautology — for how could the ἀνέχεσθαι be otherwise than μετὰ μακροθυμίας? and (2) the parallelism, μετὰ πάσης ταπ. κ. πραΰτ., μετ. μακρ., — would be destroyed. Still less should we, with Thdrt., Œc., and Bengel, make all one sentence from μετὰ πάσ. to ἀγάπ.: for thus [Mey.] we should lose the gradual transition from the general ἀξίως περιπ. τ. κλ. to the special ἀνεχ. ἀλλ.), — forbearing (see reff. and Rom. ii. 4; on the nom. part., see ch. iii. 18) one another in love (it is very unnatural, as Lachm. and Olsh. have done, to join ἐν ἀγ. with σπουδάζοντες, making thereby an exceedingly clumsy clause of the following), earnestly striving (reff.) to maintain the unity of the Spirit (that unity, in which God's Holy Spirit in the Church τοὺς γένει κ. τρόποις διαφόροις διεστηκότας ἑνοῖ, as Chr.: not animorum inter vos conjunctionem, as Est., — and so Ambr., Anselm, Erasm., Calv., al. The genitive is in fact a possessive — the Spirit's unity, that unity which the Spirit brings about, ἣν τὸ πν. ἔδωκεν ἡμῖν, Thl.) in (united together by: within) the bond of peace (again Lachm. joins the qualifying clause to the following sentence: here again most unnaturally, both as regards what has preceded, and the general truths which are afterwards enounced: see below. The σύνδ. is εἰρήνη, not that which brings about εἰρήνη, 'vinculum quo pax retinetur, id est, amor.' Beng. So Thl., Rück., Harl., Stier. Col. iii. 14, which is quoted to support this meaning, is not applicable, because love there is expressly named, whereas here it certainly would not occur to any reader, especially after ἐν ἀγάπῃ has just occurred. The genitive of apposition is the simplest — peace binds together the Church as a condition and symbol of that inner unity which is only wrought by the indwelling Spirit of God). 4.] Lachm., joining ἓν σῶμα κ.τ.λ. as far as ἐν πᾶσιν, with what has gone before, makes these words hortatory: 'as one Body and one Spirit, even as, &c.' Certainly the reference to ἡ κλῆσις ὑμῶν seems to tell for this. But, on the other hand, it is very unlikely that the Apostle should thus use ἓν σῶμα and ἓν πνεῦμα, and then go on in the same strain, but with a different reference. I therefore prefer the common punctuation and rendering. (There is) (better than 'ye are,' which will not apply to the following parallel clauses. The assertion of the unity of the Church, and of our Lord in all His operations and ordinances, springs immediately out of the last exhortation, as following it up to its great primal ground in the verities of God. To suppose it connected by a γάρ understood [Eadie] is to destroy the force and vividness with which the great central truth is at once introduced without preface) one Body (reff.: viz. Christ's mystical Body. τί δ' ἔστιν, ἓν σῶμα; οἱ πανταχοῦ τῆς οἰκουμένης πιστοί, καὶ ὄντες κ. γενόμενοι κ. ἐσόμενοι. πάλιν καὶ οἱ πρὸ τῆς τοῦ χριστοῦ παρουσίας εὐηρεστηκότες, ἓν σῶμά εἰσι. Chrys.

The other sacrament, being a matured act of subsequent participation, a function of the incorporate, not a seal of incorporation [a symbol of union, not of unity: so Ellicott], is not here adduced. In 1 Cor. x. 17, where an act was in question which was a clear breach of union, it forms the rallying-point), 6.] one God (the unity is here consummated in its central Object: 'hoc est præcipuum, quia inde manant reliqua omnia,' Calv. But we must not miss the distinct witness to the doctrine of the Holy Trinity in these verses:—going upwards, we have 1st, the One Spirit dwelling in the one body:—2nd, the One Lord appropriated by faith and professed in baptism:—3rd, One God and Father supreme, in whom all find their end and object) and Father of all (masculine: 'of all within the Church,' for so is clearly the primary meaning, where he is speaking distinctly of the Church:—of all (Mey.) who have the υἱοθεσία. But it can hardly be doubted, that there is a further reference—to the universal Fathership of all men—which indeed the Church only inherits in its fulness, others having fallen out of it by sin,—but which nevertheless is just as absolutely true), who is over all (men, primarily; and from the following,—men only, in this place. He is over all, in his sovereignty as the FATHER), and through all (men: in the co-extensiveness of Redemption by the Son with the whole nature of man: see on ver. 10 below, and ch. ii. 20, 21) and in all (men: by the indwelling of the Spirit, see ch. ii. 22. So that I cannot but recognize, in these three carefully chosen expressions, a distinct allusion again to the Three Persons of the blessed Trinity. All these are the work of the Father:—it is He who in direct sovereignty is over all —He who is glorified in the filling of all things by the Son:—He who is revealed by the witness of the indwelling Spirit. Many Commentators deny such a reference. Almost all agree in ἐν πᾶσιν representing the indwelling of the Spirit: the διὰ πάντων has been the principal stumbling-block: and is variously interpreted:—by some, of God's Providence,—τουτέστιν, ὁ προνοῶν καὶ διοικῶν, Chrys., al.: by others, of His pervading presence by the Spirit,—'Spiritu sanctificationis diffusus est per omnia ecclesiæ membra,' Calv.: by others, to the creation by the Son, 'per quem omnia facta sunt' [Aquin. in Ellic.]: but this seems to be a conversion of διὰ πάντων into δι' οὗ πάντες, as indeed Olsh. expressly does, 'als Werkzeug, durch das die ging.' Irenæus, v. 18. 2, p. 315, gives the meaning thus, adopting the Trinitarian reference, but taking the πάντων both times as neuter, and reading ἐν πᾶσιν ἡμῖν: 'super omnia quidem Pater, et ipse est caput Christi: per omnia autem verbum, et ipse est caput ecclesiæ: in omnibus autem nobis Spiritus, et ipse est aqua viva,' &c.). 7.] But (the contrast is between ἐν πᾶσιν and ἑνὶ ἑκάστῳ—the general, and the particular. And the connexion is—as a motive to keep the unity of the Spirit—'none is overlooked:—each has his part in the distribution of the gifts of the One Spirit, which part he is bound to use for the well-being of the whole') to each one of us was given (by Christ, at the time of His exaltation—when He bestowed gifts on men) [the] grace (which was then bestowed: the unspeakable gift,—or, if the art. be omitted, grace, absolutely,—was distributed to each κατά &c.) according to the measure of (subjective genitive: the amount of: cf. Rom. xii. 3, ἑκάστῳ ὡς ὁ θεὸς ἐμέρισεν μέτρον πίστεως) the gift of Christ ('Christ's gift;'—the gift bestowed by Christ, 2 Cor. ix. 15: not, 'the gift which Christ received,'—for He is the subject and centre here—so Calv.,—'porro Christum facit auctorem, quia sicut a Patre fecit initium, ita in ipsum vult nos et nostra omnia colligere.' Still less must we with Stier, suppose both senses of the genitive included). 8.] Wherefore ('quæ cum ita sint:' viz.—the gift bestowed by Christ on different men according to measure) He (viz. God, whose word the Scriptures are. See reff. and notes: not merely 'it,' εἰ δεῖ τι, as De W. al.: nor, ἡ γραφή: had it been the subject, it must have been expressed, as in Rom. iv. 3; ix. 17 al.) says (viz. in Ps. lxviii. 18, see below: not, in some Christian hymn, as Flatt and Storr,—which would not agree with λέγει, nor with the treatment of the citation, which is plainly regarded as carrying the weight of Scripture. With the question as to the occasion and intent of that Psalm, we are not here concerned. It is a song of triumph, as ver. 1 [cf. Num. x. 35] shews, at some bringing up of the ark to the hill of Zion. ¶ It is therefore a Messianic Psalm. Every part of that ark, every stone of that hill, was full of spiritual meaning. Every note struck on the lyres of the sweet singers of Israel, is but part of a chord, deep and world-wide, sounding from the golden harps of redemption. The partial triumphs of David and Solomon only prefigured as in a prophetic mirror the universal and eternal triumph of the Incarnate Son of God. Those who do not understand this, have yet their first lesson in the O. T. to learn. With this caution let us approach the difficulties of the citation in detail) He ascended up on high (viz. Christ, at His Ascension: not 'having ascended:' the aorist participle denotes an action not preceding, but parallel to, that expressed in the finite verb which it accompanies: see Bernhardy, Synt. p. 383. The ascending in the Psalm is that of God, whose presence was symbolized by the ark, to Zion. The Apostle changes the words from the 2nd person to the 3rd; the address asserting a fact, which fact he cites), he led captive a captivity (i. e. 'those who suffer captivity:' a troop of captives: such is the constant usage of the abstract αἰχμαλωσία for the concrete in LXX: cf. reff.: and it is never put for captivatores, 'those who cause captivity,' as some would interpret it. ever it was: in the interpretation, they were God's enemies, Satan and his hosts, as Chr., ποίαν αἰχμαλωσίαν φησί; τὴν τοῦ διαβόλου. αἰχμάλωτον τὸν τύραννον ἔλαβε, τὸν διάβολον καὶ τὸν θάνατον καὶ τὴν ἁμαρτίαν), he gave gifts to mankind (Heb.: לָקַחְתָּ מַתָּנוֹת בָּאָדָם, — LXX, ἔλαβες δόματα ἐν ἀνθρώπῳ [-ποις F]. The original meaning is obscure. There seems to be no necessity to argue for a sense of ἔλαβες—'thou receivedst in order to give;' as the qualifying ἐν ἀνθρώποις will shew for what purpose, in what capacity, the receipt took place. But certainly such a sense of לָקַח seems to be substantiated: see Eadie's note here, and his examples, viz. Gen. xv. 9; xviii. 5 [where the sense is very marked, E. V. 'I will fetch'],—xxvii. 13 [ib. 'fetch me them'], xlii. 16,—Exod. xxvii. 20 ['that they bring thee'],—1 Kings xvii. 10 ['fetch me,' λαβὲ δή μοι], al. Then, what is בָּאָדָם? First, אָדָם is clearly used in a collective sense: we have Jer. xxxii. 20, יִשְׂרָאֵל וְאָדָם, 'Israel and the rest of mankind,' see also Isa. xliii. 4 al. In Prov. xxiii. 28, we have בָּאָדָם used for 'inter homines,' which is evidently its simplest meaning. If then we render here, 'hast taken gifts among men,' hast, as a victor, surrounded by thy victorious hosts, brought gifts home, spoils of the enemy,—the result of such reception of gifts would be naturally stated as the distribution of them among such hosts, and the people,—as indeed ver. 12 of the Psalm has already stated. And so the Chaldee paraphrast [and Syr. and Arabic vss.: but their testimony, as Christian, is little worth] understood the words, interpreting the passage of Moses [which does not invalidate his testimony: against Harl.]: 'thou hast given gifts to the sons of men.' The literature of the passage may be seen in De W. and Meyer: and more at length in Stier, Eadie, and Harless. To give even a synopsis of it here would far exceed our limits). 9.] Further explanation of this text. But that He ascended (τὸ ἀν. does not here mean, 'the word' ἀνέβη, which does not occur in the text cited), what is it (does it imply) except that he also (as well) descended to the lower parts of the earth (the argument seems to be this: the Ascension here spoken of was not a first exaltation, but a return to heaven of one who dwelt in heaven—οὐδεὶς ἀναβέβηκεν εἰς τὸν οὐρανόν, εἰ μὴ ὁ ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ καταβάς, ὁ υἱὸς τ. ἀνθρώπου ὁ ὢν ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ, John iii. 13, which is in fact the key to these verses. The ascent implied a previous descent. This is the leading thought. But it is doubted how far the words κατώτερα μέρη τῆς γῆς carry that descent, whether to earth merely, so that τῆς γῆς is the genitive of apposition,—or to Hades, so that it is genitive of possession. Usage will not determine—for 1) it is uncertain whether the Apostle meant any allusion to the corresponding Hebrew expression: 2) that expression is used both for Hades, Ps. lxiii. 9, and for earth [θεμέλια, LXX], Isa. xliv. 23 [and for the womb, Ps. cxxxix. 15]. Nor can it be said [as Harl., Mey.] that the descent into hell would be irrelevant here—or that our Lord ascended not from Hades but from the earth: for, the fact of descent being the primary thought, we have only to ask as above, how far that descent is carried in the Apostle's mind. The greater the descent, the greater the ascent: and if the αἰχμαλωσία consisted of Satan and his powers, the warfare in which they were taken captive would most naturally be contemplated in all its extent, as reaching to their habitation itself:—'this ascent, what does it imply but a descent, and that even to the lower parts of the earth from which the spoils of victory were fetched?' And this meaning seems to be upheld by the ἵνα πληρώσῃ τὰ πάντα which follows, as well as by the contrast furnished by ὑπεράνω πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν. This interpretation is upheld by most of the ancients, Iren., Tert., Jer., Pelag., Ambrst.; also by Erasm., Est., Calov., Bengel, Rück., Olsh., Stier, Baur [uses it as a proof of the gnostic origin of the Epistle], Ellicott, al.: that of the Incarnation merely, descent on earth, Heb. vii. 26, ὑψηλότερος τῶν οὐρανῶν γενόμενος: and ib. iv. 14, διεληλυθότα τοὺς οὐρανούς. It is natural that one who, like St. Paul, had been brought up in the Jewish habits of thought, should still use their methods of speaking, according to which the heaven is expressed in the plural, 'the heavens.' And from such an usage, πάντες οἱ οὐρανοί would naturally flow. See, on the idea of a threefold, or sevenfold division of the heavens, the note on 2 Cor. xii. 2. Ellicott quotes from Bishop Pearson,—'whatsoever heaven is higher than all the rest which are called heavens, into that place did he ascend.' Notice the subjunctive after the aorist participle, giving the present and enduring sense to the verb: used, when "res ita comparata est, ut actione præterita tamen eventus nondum expletus sit, sed etiam nunc duret: .... Eur. Med. 215, Κορίνθιαι γυναῖκες, ἐξῆλθον δόμων, μή μοί τι μέμψησθ'." Klotz, Devar. ii. 618), that He may fill (not as Anselm, al., 'fulfil') all things (the whole universe: see ch. i. 23, note: with His presence, His sovereignty, His working by the Spirit: not, with His glorified Body, as some have thought. "Christ is perfect God, and perfect and glorified man: as the former He is present every where, as the latter He can be present any where." Ellicott).

11.] Resumption of the subject—the diversity of gifts, all bestowed by Him, as a motive to unity. And HE (emphatic; 'it is He, that') gave (not for ἔθετο, any more than in ch. i. 22:—the gifts which He gave to His Church are now enumerated. "The idea is, that the men who filled the office, no less than the office itself, were a divine gift." Eadie) some as Apostles (see 1 Cor. xii. 28, and note; and a good enumeration of the essentials of an Apostle, in Eadie's note here), some as prophets (see on 1 Cor. xii. 10: and cf. ch. ii. 20; iii. 5, notes), some as evangelists (not in the narrower sense of the word, writers of gospels, but in the wider sense, of itinerant preachers, usually sent on a special mission: οἱ μὴ περιϊόντες πανταχοῦ, ἀλλ' εὐαγγελιζόμενοι μόνον, ὡς Πρίσκιλλα κ. Ἀκύλας. Chr. See note on Acts xxi. 8), some as pastors and teachers (from these latter not being distinguished from the pastors by the τοὺς δέ, it would seem that the two offices were held by the same persons. The figure in ποιμένες, if to be pressed, would imply that they were entrusted with some special flock, which they tended, καθήμενοι καὶ περὶ ἕνα τόπον ἠσχολημένοι, as Chr.; and then the διδασκαλία would necessarily form a chief part of their work. If this view be correct, this last class includes all the stationary officers of particular Churches), in order to (ultimate aim of these offices, see below) the perfecting of the saints,—for (immediate object, see below) (the) work of (the) ministry (of διάκονοι in God's Church. The articles give completeness in English, but do not affect the sense),—for building up of the body of Christ (the relation of these three clauses has been disputed. Chr., al., regard them as parallel: ἕκαστος οἰκοδομεῖ, ἕκαστος καταρτίζει, ἕκαστος διακονεῖ: but this is to confound the distinct prepositions, πρός and εἰς, after the unsupported notion that St. Paul uses prepositions almost indifferently. Others, as De W., regard εἰς ... εἰς as dependent on πρός, and thus are obliged to give to διακονία a wider sense [genus omnium functionum in ecclesia] than it will bear. The best way certainly seems to be, with Mey. and Ellic., to regard πρός as the ultimate end, εἰς as the immediate use, as in Rom. xv. 2, ἕκαστος ἡμῶν τῷ πλησίον ἀρεσκέτω εἰς τὸ ἀγαθὸν πρὸς οἰκοδομήν), until (marks the duration of the offices of the ministry) we (being thus καταρτισμένοι by virtue of the ἔργον διακονίας and the οἰκοδομή) arrive (see reff.: no sense of 'meeting,' but simply of 'attaining.' Ellicott well remarks, that we must be careful of applying to later Greek the canons of the grammarians respecting the omission of ἄν, as giving an air of less uncertainty to subjunctives in such constructions as this; and he adds, "the use of the subjunctive [the mood of conditioned but objective possibility], not future [as Chrys.], shews that the καταντᾶν is represented, not only as the eventual, but as the expected and contemplated result of the ἔδωκεν"), all of us (Christians, Jews as well as Gentiles: first person, because he himself was among the number. The article brings out the πάντες, as belonging to one class), at the unity of the faith ("How so? have not all Christians the same faith? .... No doubt they have, as regards its substance, but not as regards clearness and purity; because the object of faith may be diversely known, and knowledge has ever such a powerful influence on faith. Therefore he adds to this unity of faith καὶ τῆς ἐπιγνώσεως κ.τ.λ.: true and full unity of faith is then found, when all thoroughly know Christ, the object of faith, alike, and that in His highest dignity as the Son of God." De Wette) and of the knowledge (further result of the faith, ch. iii. 17, 19; 2 Pet. i. 5) of the Son of God (this objective genitive belongs to both τῆς πίστεως and τῆς ἐπιγνώσεως), at a perfect man (an awkwardness is given by the coupling of an abstract [εἰς ἑνότητα] to a concrete [εἰς ἄνδρα τέλειον]. The singular not only denotes unity [Beza], but refers to the summation of us all in the one perfect Man Christ Jesus. The maturity of the ἀνὴρ τέλειος is contrasted with the νηπιότης which follows. Among curiosities of exegesis may be adduced that which Aug. mentions, de Civ. Dei xxii. 17, vol. vii. p. 778: "Nonnulli, propter hoc quod dictum est, Eph. iv. 13, nec in sexu fœmineo resurrecturas fœminas credunt, sed in virili omnes aiunt") to the measure of the stature (or, 'age?' this is doubtful. The similitude in ἄνδρα τέλειον seems to be derived from age: that in ver. 16, from stature. The fact seems to be, that ἡλικία is a comprehensive word, including both ideas—answering to the German 'Erwachsenheit,' but having no corresponding word in our language. We have μέτρον ἥβης in Hom. Il. λ. 225. Od. λ. 317, σ. 217. The expression itself occurs in Lucian, Imag. 7 [Wetst.], τῆς ἡλικίας δὲ τὸ μέτρον, ἡλίκον ἂν γένοιτο: κατὰ τὴν ἐν Κνίδῳ ἐκείνην μάλιστα . . . μεμετρήσθω,—and Philostratus, vit. Sophist. p. 543, τὸ δὲ μέτρον τῆς ἡλικίας ταῖς μὲν ἄλλαις ἐπιστήμαις γήρως ἀρχή. Clearly, none of these passages settles the question. In Homer, the meaning is 'the measure of youth,'—the size and ripeness of youth: in Lucian, as decidedly 'the measure of the stature,' as in Philostr., 'the ripeness of manly age.' The balance must here be inclined by the prevalence of the image of growth and extension, which can hardly be denied as pervading the passage) of the fulness of Christ (see note on ch. i. 23; iii. 19. χρ. is a genitive subjective:—the fulness which Christ has: 'Christ's fulness.' Cf. Gal. iv. 19),—that (apparently another, and subordinate, aim of the bestowal of gifts on the church is here adduced. For we cannot go forward from the finished growth of ver. 13, and say that its object is ἵνα μηκ. ὦμεν νήπιοι, but must go back again to the growth itself and its purpose; that purpose being mainly the terminal one of ver. 13, and subordinately the intermediate one of our ver. 14. See Meyer's note) we be no more (having been so once: τὸ μηκέτι δείκνυσι πάλαι τοῦτο πεπόνθατας. Chr.) children, tossed (like waves: see James i. 6: Jos. Ellic. This is better than instrumental, which, as we have just had παντὶ ἀνέμῳ, would be a repetition) the sleight ('dice-playing,' from κύβος. The word, as well as κυβεύω, was naturally and constantly used to signify 'entrapping by deceit:' κυβείαν τὴν πανουργίαν καλεῖ· πεποίηται δὲ ἀπὸ κύβων τὸ ὄνομα· ἴδιον δὲ τῶν κυβευόντων, τὸ τῇδε κἀκεῖσε μεταφέρειν τὰς ψήφους, καὶ πανούργως τοῦτο ποιεῖν. The word was borrowed by the Rabbinical writers, and used in this sense: see Schöttg. h. l.) of men (as contrasted with τοῦ χριστοῦ, ver. 13), in craftiness (reff.) furthering (tending or working towards: or perhaps, but not so well,—after, according to, gemäß) the system (see reff. and especially ch. vi. 11, note, and Chr.'s explanation) of error (not, deceit, though in fact the sense is so: πλάνη, even in the passages generally alleged for this active meaning, is best taken as 'error.' The genitive πλάνης is subjective—the plans are those which error adopts. τῆς πλ., as τῆς διδασκαλίας: see above), 15.] but (opposition to the whole last verse; introducing as it does, not only ἀληθεύοντες ἐν ἀγάπῃ, but the αὐξήσωμεν below) being followers of truth (ἀληθεύειν cannot here mean merely to speak the truth, as the whole matter dealt with is more general; the particular follows, ver. 25. The verb has the widest meaning of being ἀληθής—and [as Stier remarks] not without a certain sense of effort, 'sectari veritatem.' The Vulg. gives it well, but perhaps with too exclusively practical a bearing, 'veritatem facientes:' Bengel, 'verantes:' the old English versions, 'followe the truth,' which gives too much the objective sense to truth. It is almost impossible to express it satisfactorily in English. I have somewhat modified this last rendering, restoring the general sense of 'truth.' The objection to 'followers of truth' is that it may be mistaken for 'searchers after truth'—but I can find no expression which does not lie open to equal objection) in love (must be joined with ἀληθεύοντες, not with αὐξήσωμεν. For 1) the mere participle with δέ would stand most feebly and awkwardly at the beginning of the sentence: and 2) we have already observed the habit of the Apostle to be, to subjoin, not to prefix, his qualifying clauses. ἐν ἀγάπῃ is added, as the element in which the Christian ἀληθεύειν must take place: it is not and cannot be an ἀληθεύειν at all hazards—a 'fiat justitia, ruat cœlum' truthfulness: but must be conditioned by love: a true-seeking and true-being with loving caution and kind allowance—not breaking up, but cementing, brotherly love by walking in truth) may grow up into (increase towards the measure of the stature of;—to the perfect man in Him. these examples, there is no occasion, with De W. and Ellic., to suppose that the Apostle places χρ. at the end to give force to ἐξ οὗ which follows. But it seems hardly controvertible that ἁφή does signify 'joint' [συναφή] in the parallel Col. ii. 19; it is there [see note] joined with συνδεσμῶν so closely, as necessarily to fall into the same class of anatomical arrangements, and cannot mean αἴσθησις. Also in Damoxenus in Athenæus, iii. 102 E, we have it in this sense—καὶ συμπλεκομένης οὐχὶ συμφώνους ἁφάς. Indeed the meaning Berührung, 'point d'appui,' would naturally lead to that of joint) of the (article just as παντὶ ἁφῇ τῆς διδασκ. above: see note there) supply (the joints are the points of union where the supply passes to the different members, and by means of which the body derives the supply by which it grows. Ellic.),—according to vital working in the measure of each individual part,—carries on (remark the intensive middle ποιεῖται, denoting that the αὔξησις is not carried on ab extra, but by functional energy within the body itself) the growth of the body (I thus render, preferring to join as well διὰ π. ἁφ. τ. ἐπιχ. κατ' ἐν. κ.τ.λ. with τ. αὔξ. ποιεῖται rather than with the preceding participles, 1) to avoid the very long awkward clause encumbered with qualifications, πᾶν τὸ σῶμα σ. κ. σ. διὰ πᾶσ. ἁφ. τῆς ἐπιχ. κατ' ἐνέργ. ἐν μέτρ. ἑν. ἑκ. μέρους: 2) because the repetition of τοῦ σώματος is much more natural in a cumbrous apodosis, than in a simple apodosis after a cumbrous protasis: 3) for perspicuity: the whole instrumentality and modality here described belonging to the growth [ἐπιχορ., ἐνέργ., ἐν μέτρῳ], and not merely to the compaction of the body. τοῦ σώματος is repeated, rather than ἑαυτοῦ used, perhaps for solemnity, perhaps [which is more likely] to call back the attention to the subject σῶμα after so long a description of its means and measure of growth) for the building up of itself in love (Meyer would join ἐν ἀγ. with τ. αὔξ. τ. σώμ. ποι. as suiting better ver. 15. This is hardly necessary, and encumbers still further the already sufficiently qualified αὔξ. ποιεῖται. Love is just as much the element in which the edification, as that in which the growth, takes place).

This is shewn by the fact that the μηκέτι περιπατ. here is only the negative side of, and therefore subordinate to, the ἀξίως περιπ. of ver. 1. Vv. 4—16 form a digression arising out of τ. ἑνότητα τ. πν. in ver. 3. Still this must not be too strictly pressed: the digression is all in the course of the argument, and μηκέτι here is not without reference to μηκέτι in ver. 14. The fervid style of St. Paul will never divide sharply into separate logical portions—each runs into and overlaps the other) I say (see Rom. xii. 3. There is no need to understand δεῖν before the infinitive which follows. The μηκ. ὑμ. περιπατεῖν is the object of λέγω expressed in the infinitive, just as regularly as in βούλομαί σε λέγειν. That an imperative sense is involved, lies in the context) and testify (see reff.: cf. Plat. Phileb. p. 47 D, ταῦτα δὲ τότε μὲν οὐκ ἐμαρτυράμεθα, νῦν δὲ λέγομεν: Thuc. vi. 80; viii. 53, Duk.) in the Lord (element; not 'formula jurandi,' see 1 Thess. iv. 1, note), that ye no longer ('as once:' implied also by καί below) walk as also (besides yourselves: though the Ephesians did not walk so now, their returning to such a course is made the logical hypothesis) the Gentiles (ye being now distinguished from them by being members of God's church, though once Gentiles according to the flesh. Perhaps from this not being seen, λοιπά was inserted) walk in (element) vanity (see Rom. i. 21: they ἐματαιώθησαν in their downward course from God. But we must not restrict the word to idolatry: it betokens the waste of the whole rational powers on worthless objects. See also on Rom. viii. 20) of their mind (their rational part), being (beware of referring ὄντες to ἀπηλλ. with Eadie. Besides its breaking the force of the sentence, I doubt if such an arrangement is ever found) darkened (see again Rom. i. 21, and the contrast brought out 1 Thess. v. 4, 5, and ch. v. 8) in (the dative gives the sphere or element in which. The difference between it and the accusative of reference [τὴν διάνοιαν ἐσκοτισμένους, Jos. Antt. ix. 4. 3] is perhaps this, that the dative is more subjective—The man is dark:—wherein? in his διάνοια: the accusative more objective—Darkness is on the man:—in him, whereon? on his διάνοια) their understanding (perceptive faculty: intellectual discernment: see note, ch. ii. 3), alienated (reff.: objective result of the subjective 'being darkened') from the life of God (not 'modus vivendi quem Deus instituit,' as the ancients [Thdrt., Thl., and Grot., al.], for ζωή in N. T. never has this meaning [see the two clearly distinguished in Gal. v. 25], but always life, as opposed to death. Thus 'the life of God' will mean, as Beza beautifully says, 'vita illa qua Deus vivit in suis:' for, as Beng., 'vita spiritalis acceditur in credentibus ex ipsa Dei vita.' Stier makes an important remark: "The Apostle is here treating, not so much of the life of God in Christ which is regenerated in believers, as of the original state of man, when God was his Life and Light, before the irruption of darkness into human nature") on account of the ignorance (of God: see ref. 1 Pet.) which is in them (not, by nature: cf. Rom. i. 21—28: they did not choose to retain God in their knowledge, and this loss of the knowledge of Him alienated them from the divine Life), on account of (second clause, subordinate to ἀπηλλ.: not subordinate to and rendering a reason for τὴν ἄγν. τ. οὖσαν, as Meyer, which would be awkward, and loss like St. Paul) the hardening ('πώρωσις est obduratio, callus. The sense 'blindness' is said by Fritzsche, on Rom. xi. 7, to be invented by the grammarians. Thdrt. says πάρωσιν τὴν ἰσχάτην ἀναλγησίαν λέγει· καὶ γὰρ αἱ τῷ σώματι ἐγγινόμεναι παρώσεις οὐδεμίαν αἴσθησιν ἔχουσι διὰ τὸ παντελῶς νενεκρῶσθαι) of their heart, 19.] who as (οἵτινες, see ch. i. 23 note) being past feeling (ὅπερ ἐπὶ τῶν ἀπὸ πάθους τινὸς μέρη πολλάκις τοῦ σώματος νενεκρωμένων οἷς οὐ μόνον ἅλγος οὐδὲν ἐκεῖθεν ἐγγίνεται, ἀλλ' οὐδὲ ἡ τοῦ μέρους ἀφαίρεσις αἴσθησιν ἐμποιεῖ. Theod. Mops. in Stier. From the 'desperatio' of the Vulg. Syr., seems to have come the reading ἀπηλπικότες, see var. readd. The obduration described may spring in ordinary life from despair:—so Cicero, Ep. fam. ii. 16, in Bengel, 'diuturna desperatione rerum obduruisse animum ad dolorem novum,'—and Polyb. ix. 40. 9, ἀπαλγοῦντες ταῖς ἐλπίσι [where see Ernesti's note], but may also result from other reasons. Certainly despair has nothing to do with the matter here, but rather the carrying on of the πάρωσις to positive ἀπάλγησις by the increasing habit of sin) gave up themselves (" ἑαυτ., with terrific emphasis. It accorded here with the hortatory object of the Apostle to bring into prominence that which happened on the side of their own free will. It is otherwise in Rom. i. 24, παρέδωκεν αὐτοὺς ὁ θεός: and the two treatments of the fact are not inconsistent, but parallel, each having its vindication and its full truth in the pragmatism of the context." Meyer) to wantonness (see Gal. v. 19 note) in order to (conscious aim, not merely incidental result of the παραδοῦναι —see below) the working (yes and more—the being ἐργάται—the working as at a trade or business—but we have no one word for it: cf. Chrys., ὁρᾷς πῶς αὐτοὺς ἀποστερεῖ συγγνώμης ἐργασίαν ἀκαθαρσίας εἰπών; οὐ παρακεσόντες, φησίν, ἡμαρτον, ἀλλ' εἰργάζοντο αὐτὰ τὰ δεινά, κ. μελέτῃ τῷ πράγματι ἐκέχρηντο) of impurity of every kind (see Rom. i. 24—27. Ellic. remarks, "As St. Paul nearly invariably places πᾶς before, and not as here after the abstract [anarthrous] substantive, it seems proper to specify it [that circumstance] in translation") in greediness (such is the meaning, and not 'with greediness,' i. e. greedily, as E. V., Chr. [appy], Thdrt., Œc., Erasm., Calv., Est., al., nor 'cœtatim, quasi agatur de lucro, ita ut alius alium superare contendat,' as Beza, nor as Harl. 'in gluttony' [which meaning his citation from Chrys. does not bear out]. πλεονεξίᾳ, the desire of having more, is obviously a wider vice than mere covetousness, though this latter is generally its prominent form. It is self-seeking, or greed: in whatever direction this central evil tendency finds its employment. So that it may include in itself as an element, as here, lustful sins, though it can never actually mean 'lasciviousness.' In 1 Cor. v. 10 it [πλεονέκταις] is disjoined from πόρνοις by ἢ, and joined by καὶ to ἅρπαξιν — clearly therefore meaning covetous persons. See also ch. v. 3, and Col. iii. 5: and compare Ellicott's note here). 20.] But YOU (emphatic) did not thus (οὐκ ἐπὶ τούτοις, Chr.—not on these conditions, nor with such prospects. Beza suggests that a stop might be put at οὕτως—'ye are not thus: ye learned,' &c.: but the sense is altogether marred by it) learn Christ (Christ personal—not to be explained away into ὀρθῶς βιοῦν, as Chr., or any thing else: cf. 1 Cor. i. 23, ἡμεῖς κηρύσσομεν χριστόν: Phil. i. 15—18; Col. ii. 6. CHRIST Himself is the subject of all Christian preaching and all Christian learning — τὸ γνῶναι αὐτόν [Phil. iii. 10] is the great lesson of the Christian life, which these Ephesians began to learn at their conversion: see next verse), if, that is (see ch. iii. 2 note, and 2 Cor. v. 3. Him that ye heard (if ye really heard at your conversion the voice of the Shepherd Himself calling you as his sheep —τὰ πρόβατα τὰ ἐμὰ τῆς φωνῆς μου ἀκούει, John x. 27, see also John v. 25) and in Him that ye were taught (if it was in vital union with Him, as members of Him, that ye after your conversion received my teaching. Both these clauses are contained in ἐμάθετε τὸν χρ.,—the first hearing of the voice of the Son of God, and growing in the knowledge of Him when awakened from spiritual death), as is truth in Jesus (the rendering and connexion of this clause have been much disputed. I will remark, 1) that it seems by its form to be subordinate to ἐν αὐτῷ ἐδιδάχθητε, and the καθώς to express the quality of the διδαχή: 2) that in this case we have ἐστιν ἀλήθεια ἐν τῷ Ἰησ. answering to ἐν αὐτῷ ἐδιδάχθητε. 3) To take the easier members first, ἐν τῷ Ἰησοῦ is a closer personal specification of ἐν αὐτῷ—in Jesus—that one name recalling their union in both in His Person, and, which is important here, in His example also: 4) καθώς ἐστιν ἀλήθεια expands ἐδιδάχθητε—if the nature of the teaching which you received was according to that which is truth [in Him]. So that the meaning will amount to this—if ye were taught in Him according to that which is truth in Jesus;—if you received into yourselves, when you listened to the teaching of the Gospel, that which is true [respecting you—and Him] in your union with and life in Jesus, the Son of God manifest in the flesh. See Ellicott's note), 22.] namely (the infinitive depends on ἐδιδάχθητε [not on λέγω, ver. 17, as Bengel and Stier], and carries therefore [not in itself, but as thus dependent] an imperative force—see on ver. 17) that ye put off (cf. ἐνδύσασθαι ver. 24: aorist, because the act of putting off is one and decisive, so also of ἐνδύσασθαι below: but ἀνανεοῦσθαι, because the renewal is a gradual process. Beware of rendering, with Eadie and Peile, 'that ye have put off,' which is inconsistent with the context [cf. ver. 25], and not justified by ὑμᾶς being expressed. This latter is done merely to resume the subject after the parenthetical ver. 21), as regards your former conversation (explains the reference of ἀποθέσθαι: q. d. [for you were clothed with it in your former conversation]: and must not, as by (Ec., Jer., Grot., Est., al., be joined with τὸν παλ. ἄνθρ.: on ἀναστρ., see note, Gal. i. 13), the old man (your former unconverted selves, see note on Rom. vi. 6) which is ("almost, 'as it is, &c.,' the participle having a slight causal force, and serving to superadd a further motive." Ellic.) being corrupted (inasmuch as the whole clause is subjectively spoken of the παλ. ἄνθρ., it is better to take φθ. [as usually] of inward 'waxing corrupt,' as in reff. [especially Jude], than of destination to perdition, as Mey., which would be introducing an outward objective element) according to (in conformity with; as might be expected under the guidance of) the lusts of deceit (ἡ ἀπάτη is personified —the lusts which are the servants, the instruments of deceit: cf. ἐκ χειλέων ἀπάτης μου, Judith ix. 10. Beware of the unsatisfactory hendiadys, 'deceitful lusts,' E. V., which destroys the whole force and beauty of the contrast below to ὁσιότητι τῆς ἀληθείας), 23.] and undergo renewal (both should be marked,—the gradual process implied in the present, and the passive character of the verb. Of this latter there can be no doubt: the middle ἀνανεοῦσθαι having always an active force: so we have ἀνανεοῦσθαι τ. συμμαχίαν, Polyb: xxiii. 1. 5: see many more examples in the Lex. Polybianum, and in Harl.'s note here: and we have even, in Antonin. iv. 3 [Harl.], ἀνανέου σεαυτόν. Stier's arguments in favour of the middle sense seem to me to be misplaced. ἐνδύσασθαι is middle, but that refers to a direct definite reflexive act; whereas the process here insisted on is one carried on by the Spirit of God, not by themselves. And it is not to the purpose to ask, as Stier does, 'How can the Apostle say and testify by way of exhortation, that they should be renewed as they ought to walk?' for we have perpetually this seeming paradox, of God's work encouraged or checked by man's co-operation or counteraction. is not [as Olsh.] beside the purpose here, but important. The reference in καινός [novus] to the objective is prominent, in νέος [recens] to the subjective. The καινός is used as opposed to the former self; the νέος, as regards the new nature and growth in it: cf. Col. iii. 10, τὸν νέον, τὸν ἀνακαινούμενον. Thus in Rom. xii. 2 it would not be said μεταμορφ. τῇ ἀνακαινώσει τ. νοός, because it is not by nor in the ἀνακαίνωσις, but by or in the ἀνακαίνωσις, that the μεταμορφ. takes place. Whereas here, where a process of growing up in the state of ἀνακαίνωσις is in question, ἀνανεοῦσθαι is properly used. ἀνακαινοῦσθαι is more 'renewal from the age of the old man;' ἀνανεοῦσθαι, 'renewal in the youth of the new man.' See Tittmann, Syn. p. 60 ff.) by (though [see more below] the expression τῷ πν. τοῦ νοὸς ὑμ. stands contrasted with ἐν ματαιότητι τοῦ νοὸς αὐτῶν, ver. 17, yet the omission of ἐν here serves to mark that not merely the sphere in which, but the agency by which, is now adduced) the Spirit of *your (emphatic) mind (the expression is unusual, and can only be understood by reference to the N. T. meaning of πνεῦμα, as applied to men. First, it is clearly here not exclusively nor properly 'the Holy Spirit of God,' because it is called τὸ πν. τοῦ νοὸς ὑμῶν. It is a πνεῦμα, in some sense belonging to, not merely indwelling in, ὑμεῖς. The fact is, that in the N. T. the πνεῦμα of man is only then used 'sensu proprio,' as worthy of its place and governing functions, when it is one Spirit with the Lord. We read of no πνεῦμα παλαιόν: the πνευματικός is necessarily a man dwelt in by the Spirit of God: the ψυχικός is the 'animal' man led by the ψυχή, and πνεῦμα μὴ ἔχων, Jude 19. Thus then the disciples of Christ are ἀνανεούμενοι, undergoing a process of renewal in the life of God, by the agency of the πνεῦμα of their minds, the restored and divinely-informed leading principle of their νοῦς, just as the children of the world are walking in the ματαιότης of their minds. νοῦς, see above, ver. 17), 24.] and put on (see on ἀποθέσθαι above) the new man (as opposed to παλαιόν; not meaning Christ, any further than as He is its great Head and prototype, see on κτισθ.), which was created (mark the aorist, as historical fact, once for all, in Christ. In each individual case, it is not created again, but put on: cf. Rom. xiii. 14) after God (= κατ' εἰκόνα τοῦ κτίσαντος αὐτόν, Col. iii. 10: also κατ' εἰκόνα θεοῦ ἐποίησεν αὐτόν, Gen. i. 27: so 1 Pet. i. 15, κατὰ τὸν καλέσαντα ὑμᾶς ἅγιον καὶ αὐτοὶ ἅγιοι κ.τ.λ. The doctrine of the restoration to us of the divine image in Christ, as here implied, is not to be overlooked. Müller, 'Lehre von der Sünde,' ii. p. 485 ff., denies any allusion to it here, but on insufficient grounds, as indeed he himself virtually allows. Not the bare fact of Gen. i. 27, but the great truth which that fact represents, is alluded to. The image of God in Christ is a far more glorious thing than Adam ever had, or could have had: but still the κατ' εἰκόνα θεοῦ, = κατὰ θεόν, is true of both: and, as Müller himself says, 'jenes iſt erſt die wahrhafte Erfullung von dieſem') in (element, or sphere, of the character of the new man) righteousness and holiness of truth (again, beware of 'true holiness,' E. V.—as destroying the whole antithesis and force of the words. The genitive, too, belongs to both substantives. ἡ ἀλήθεια, God's essence, John iii. 33; Rom. i. 25; iii. 7; xv. 8, opposed to ἡ ἀπάτη above. "δικαιοσύνη and ὁσιότης occur together, but in contrary order, in ref. Luke, and Wisd. ix. 3. The adjectives and adverbs are connected, 1 Thess. ii. 10: Tit. i. 8. δικαιοσύνη betokens a just relation among the powers of the soul within, and towards men and duties without. But ὁσιότης, as the Heb. חֶסֶד [Prov. ii. 21. Amos v. 10], betokens the integrity of the spiritual life, and the piety towards God of which that is the condition. Hence both expressions together complete the idea of moral perfection [Matt. v. 48]. As here the ethical side of the divine image is brought out, Col. iii. 10 brings out the intellectual. The new birth alone leads to ἐπίγνωσις: all knowledge which proceeds not from renewal of heart, is but outward appearance: and of this kind was that among the false Colossian teachers. On the other hand, in Wisd. ii. 23 [ὁ θεὸς ἔκτισεν τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐπ' ἀφθαρσίᾳ, καὶ εἰκόνα τῆς ἰδίας ἰδιότητος (ἀϊδιότ. F. [not A.]) ἐποίησεν αὐτόν] the physical side of the divine image is brought out." Olsh. Stier suggests that there is perhaps a slight contrast in δικαιοσύνη to πλεο-

'We allow ourselves the remark, hoping it may not be over-refining, that the Apostle instead of πρὸς τὸν πλησίον with the LXX, prefers following the Hebrew text and writing μετά, to express by anticipation our inner connexion with one another as ἀλλήλων μέλη.' Stier): for we are members of one another (Rom. xii. 5. The ἀλλήλων brings out the relation between man and man more strongly than if he had said, of one body: at the same time it serves to remind them that all mutual duties of Christians are grounded on their union to and in Christ, and not on mere ethical considerations). 26.] Be ye angry and sin not (citation: see ref. Psa.: and that from the LXX, not from the Hebrew, which [see Hupfeld on the Psalms in loc.] means 'tremble ['stand in awe,' E. V.] and sin not.' The first imperative, although jussive, is so in a weaker degree than the other: it is rather assumptive, than permissive. 'Be angry [if it must be so]:' as if he had said, 1 Cor. vii. 31, χρᾶσθε τῷ κόσμῳ τούτῳ [for that must be], καὶ μὴ καταχρᾶσθε. As Chr., εἴ τις ἐμπέσοι ποτὲ εἰς τὸ πάθος, ἀλλὰ μὴ εἰς τοσοῦτον. Thus Tholuck's question, Bergpred., p. 186, is answered:—"If Paul speaks of culpable anger, how can he distinguish sinning from being angry? If of allowable anger, how can he expect not to retain it over the night?"—the answer being, that he speaks of anger which is an infirmity, but by being cherished, may become a sin): let the sun not set upon (so Thuc. has, νὺξ ἐπεγένετο τῷ ἔργῳ) your irritation (i. e. set to your wrath with a brother [in every case: the omission of the art. gives the sense 'upon any παροργισμός'] a speedy limit, and indeed that one which nature prescribes—the solemn season when you part from that brother to meet again perhaps in eternity. The Commentators quote from Plut. de am. frat., p. 488 B, a custom of the Pythagoreans, εἴποτε προσαχθεῖεν εἰς λοιδορίας ὑπ' ὀργῆς, πρὶν ἢ τὸν ἥλιον δῦναι, τὰς δεξιὰς ἐμβάλλοντες ἀλλήλοις κ. ἀσπασάμενοι διελύοντο. παροργισμός is a late word, apparently not found beyond the N. T. and LXX: the verb -ίζω occurs ch. vi. 4, where see note. The παρ- implies, irritation on occasion given, as in παρορμάω, παροξύνω), 27.] nor again (there is a slight climax: see below. The renderings 'quid sit opus' [Erasm., Peile, al.], 'use of edifying' [Syr., Beza, E. V.], are manifestly wrong), that it may give grace (minister spiritual benefit: be a means of conveying through you the grace of God. For in what would issue the grieving of the Holy Spirit, if not in quenching His testimony and causing Him to depart from them? The caution of Thl., μὴ λύσῃς τὴν σφραγῖδα, is a direct inference Christ's sake, hast promised to forgive us." Family Prayers by Bishop Blomfield, p. 43]: nor 2) to render χαριζόμενοι and ἐχαρίσατο, with Erasmus, 'largientes' and 'largitus est,' a meaning clearly at variance with the context). V. 1, 2.] These verses are best taken as transitional, —the inference from the exhortation which has immediately preceded, and introduction to the dehortatory passage which follows. Certainly Stier seems right in viewing the περιπατεῖτε as resuming περιπατῆσαι ch. iv. 1, and indicating a beginning, rather than a close, of a paragraph. Be ye (γίνεσθε, see on last verse) therefore (seeing that God forgave you in Christ, see next verse) imitators of God (viz. in walking in love, see below), as children beloved (see next verse: and 1 John iv. 19, ἡμεῖς ἀγαπῶμεν, ὅτι αὐτὸς πρῶτος ἠγάπησεν ἡμᾶς) and (shew it by this, that ye) walk in love, as Christ also (this comes even nearer: from the love of the Father who gave His Son, to that of the Son, the Personal manifestation of that love in our humanity) loved (not, 'hath loved' as E. V.) you (the ὑμᾶς ... ὑμῶν is more a personal appeal: the ἡμᾶς ... ἡμῶν of the rec. is a general one, deduced from the universal relation of us all to Christ), and gave up Himself (absol.: not to be joined with τῷ θεῷ) for you (see note on Gal. iii. 13:—'on your behalf:' in fact, but not necessarily here implied, 'in your stead') an offering and a sacrifice (beware of προσφ. κ. θυσ. = θυσίαν προσφερομένην [Conyb.]: it is our duty, in rendering, to preserve the terms coupled, even though we may not be able precisely to say wherein they differ. The ordinary distinction, that προσφορά is an unbloody offering, θυσία a slain victim, cannot be maintained, see Heb. x. 5, 18; xi. 4. I believe the nearest approach to the truth will be made by regarding προσφ. as the more general word, including all kinds of offering,—θυσία as the more special one, usually involving the death of a victim. The great prominent idea here is the one sacrifice, which the Son of God made of Himself in his redeeming Love, in our nature—bringing it, in Himself, near to God – offering Himself as our representative Head: whether in perfect righteousness of life, or in sacrifice, properly so called, at his Death) to God (to be joined, as a dat. commodi, with πρ. κ. θυσ.: not with παρέδωκεν [as De W. and Mey.], from which it is too far removed: still less [as Stier, who would apply the clause τῷ θ. ... εὐωδίας, to us] with what follows) for an odour of sweet smell (the question so much discussed, whether these words can apply to a sin-offering strictly so called, is an irrelevant one here. It is not [see above] the death of Christ which is treated of, but the whole process of His redeeming Love. His death lies in the background as one, and the chief, of the acknowledged facts of that process: but it does not give the character to what is here predicated of Him. The allusion primarily is to ref. Gen., where after Noah had brought to God a sacrifice of every clean beast and bird, ὠσφράνθη κύριος ὁ θεὸς ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας,—and the promise followed, that He would no more destroy the earth for man's sake). 3—21.] Dehortation (for the most part) from works unbecoming the holiness of the life of children and imitators of God. 3.] But (not transitional merely: there is a contrast brought out by the very mention of πορνεία after what has just been said) fornication and all impurity or (see ch. iv. 19 note) covetousness (ib.), let it not be even named ('ne nomen quidem audiatur.' Col.]: cf. Plat. Gorg. p. 525 A, ὑπὸ ἀξουσίας κ. τρυφῆς κ. ὕβρεως κ. ἀκρατίας τῶν πράξεων ἀσυμμετρίας τε καὶ αἰσχρότητος γέμουσαν τὴν ψυχὴν εἶδεν) and foolish talking ('stultiloquium,' Vulg. Wetst. quotes from Antigonus de Mirabilibus, 126, τὰ μεγάλα κ. ἐπανεστηκότα μωρολογίας κ. ἀβολεσχίας. Trench well maintains, Syn. § 34, that in Christian ethics, it is more than mere 'random talk:' it is that talk of fools, which is folly and sin together: including not merely the πᾶν ῥῆμα ἀργόν of our Lord [Matt. xii. 36], but in good part also the πᾶς λόγος σαπρὸς of his Apostle [Eph. iv. 29]) or (disjunctive, marking off εὐτραπελία as πλεονεξία before) jesting (much interest attaches to this word, which will be found well discussed in Trench, as above. It had at first a good signification: Aristot. Eth. Nic. iv. 8, deals with the εὐτράπελος—οἱ ἐμμελῶς παίζοντες εὐτράπελοι προσαγορεύονται,—and describes him as the mean between the βωμολόχος and ἄγροικος. So too Plato, Rep. viii. p. 563 A,—οἱ δὲ γέροντες ξυγκαθιέντες τοῖς νέοις εὐτραπελίας τε κ. χαριεντισμοῦ ἐμπίπλανται, . . . ἵνα δὴ μὴ δοκῶσιν ἀηδεῖς εἶναι μηδὲ δεσποτικοί. But Trench remarks that there were indications of a bad sense of the word: e. g. Pind. Pyth. i. 178,—μὴ δολωθῇς, ὦ φίλε, κέρδεσιν εὐτραπέλοις, where he quotes from Dissen—'primum est de facilitate in motu, tum ad mores transfertur, et indicat hominem temporibus inservientem, diciturque tum de sermone urbano, lepido, faceto, imprimis cum levitatis et assentationis, simulationis notione.' I may add, as even more apposite here, Pyth. iv. 185, οὔτε ἔργον οὔτ' ἔπος εὐτράπελον κείνοισιν εἰπών. Aristotle himself, Rhet. ii. 12 end, defines it as πεπαιδευμένη ὕβρις. "The profligate old man in the 'miles gloriosus' of Plautus, iii. 1. 42—52, who at the same time prides himself, and with reason, on his wit, his elegance, and his refinement [cavillatus, lepidus, facetus], is exactly the εὐτράπελος: and remarkably enough, when we remember that εὐτραπελία being only expressly forbidden once in Scripture, is forbidden to Ephesians, we find him bringing out, that all this was to be expected from him, seeing that he was an Ephesian: 'Post Ephesi sum natus: non enim in Apulis, non Animulæ.'" Trench: whose further remarks should by all means be read), which are not becoming (the reading τὰ οὐκ ἀνήκοντα has perhaps come into the text from the τὰ μὴ καθήκοντα of Rom. i. 28, the οὐκ of the text being preserved through inadvertence. If, however, the participial clause be retained in the text, it may be grammatically justified by remembering that, where the various objects are specified which as matter of fact are οὐκ ἀνήκοντα, the objective negative particle οὐκ may be used: whereas in Rom. i. 28, where no such objects are specified, we have ποιεῖν τὰ μὴ καθήκοντα, 'si quæ essent indecora,' as Winer, § 59. 3: see Hartung, vol. ii. p. 131): but rather thanksgiving (not, as Jer., Calv., al., 'sermo qui gratiam apud audientes habet,' which the word cannot mean. It is a question, what verb is to be supplied: Beng. supposes ἀνήκει, which is perhaps most likely, as suiting the simplicity of the construction of these hortatory verses better than going back to ὀνομαζέσθω [De W., Mey., al.],—and as finding a parallel in ch. iv. 29, where the ellipsis is to be supplied from the sentence itself. There is a play perhaps on the similar sound of εὐτραπελία and εὐχαριστία, which may account for the latter not finding so complete a justification in the sense as we might expect: the connexion being apparently, 'your true cheerfulness and play of fancy will be found, not in buffoonery, but in the joy of a heart overflowing with a sense of God's mercies').

Col. iii. 5, which shews that even ὅς ἐστιν would apply to the πλεονέκτης only, not, as Stier, al., to the three: see Job xxxi. 24; Ps. lii. 7; Matt. vi. 24. Mey. remarks well, that it was very natural for St. Paul, whose forsaking of all things (2 Cor. vi. 10; xi. 27) so strongly contrasted with selfish greediness, to mark with the deepest reprobation the sin of πλεονεξία), hath not inheritance (the present implying more the fixedness of the exclusion, grounded on the eternal verities of that Kingdom,—than mere future certainty: see 1 Cor. xv. 25) in the Kingdom of Christ and God (not 'and of God' [κ. τοῦ θ.], as E. V. No distinction is to be made, χριστοῦ καὶ θεοῦ being in the closest union. Nor is any specification needed that the Kingdom of Christ is also the Kingdom of God, as would be made with the second article. This follows as matter of course: and thus the words bear no legitimate rendering, except on the substratum of our Lord's Divinity. But on the other hand, we cannot safely say here, that the same Person is intended by χριστοῦ κ. θεοῦ, merely on account of the omission of the article. For 1) any introduction of such a predication regarding Christ would here be manifestly out of place, not belonging to the context: 2) θεός is so frequently and unaccountably anarthrous, that it is not safe to ground any such inference from its use here). 6.] Let no one deceive you with vain (empty—not containing the kernel of truth, of which words are but the shell—words with no underlying facts. The word is a valuable middle term between unbelief and disobedience, implying their identity in a manner full of the highest instruction).

'the light of which I speak:' here it is light, as light, which is spoken of. The omission of the article may be merely from the rules of correlation, as Ellic.: but I much prefer here to treat it as significant); for (gives the reason of the introduction of the comparison in the context, connecting this with the moral details which have preceded) the fruit of the light (τοῦ, see above) is in (is borne within the sphere of, as its condition and element) all goodness and righteousness and truth (in all that is good [Gal. v. 22], right, and true. As Harl. observes, the opposites are κακία, ἀδικία, ψεῦδος): proving (to be joined with περιπατεῖτε as its modal predicate, ver. 9 having been parenthetical. ful works of darkness (see Gal. v. 19, 22; on which Jer., vol. vii. p. 505, says 'vitia in semetipsa finiuntur et pereunt, virtutes frugibus pullulant et redundant.' See also the distinction in John iii. 20, 21; v. 29, between τὰ φαῦλα πράσσειν and τὰ ἀγαθὰ or τὴν ἀλήθειαν ποιεῖν), but rather even reprove them (see reff., —in words: not only abstain from fellowship with them, but attack them and put them to shame). 13.] For (the connexion seems to be, 'reprove them—this they want, and this is more befitting you—for to have the least part in them, even in speaking of them, is shameful') the things done in secret by them, it is shameful even to speak of (so καί in Plat. Rep. v. p. 465 B, τά γε μὴν σμικρότατα τῶν κακῶν δι' ἀκριβείαν ὀκνῶ καὶ λέγειν, see Hartung ii. p. 136. Klotz, Devar. ii. p. 633 f.: the connexion being—'I mention not, and you need not speak of, these deeds of darkness, much less have any fellowship with them—your connexion with them must be only that which the act of ἔλεγξις necessitates'): 13.] but (opposition to τ. κρυφῇ γιν.) all things (not only, all the κρυφῇ γινόμενα, as Ellic. after Jer. al.: the Apostle is treating of the general detecting power of light, as is evident by the resumption of the πᾶν, in the next clause) being reproved, are made manifest by the light: for every thing which is made manifest is light (the meaning being, 'the light of your Christian life, which will be by your reproof shed upon these deeds of darkness, will bring them out of the category of darkness into light' [ἐπειδὰν φανερωθῇ, γίνεται φῶς, Chr.]. They themselves were thus 'once darkness,' but having been 'reproved' by God's Spirit, had become 'light in the Lord.' There is in reality no difficulty, nor any occasion for a long note here. The only matters to be insisted on are, 1) ὑπὸ τοῦ φωτός belongs to φανεροῦται, not to ἐλεγχόμενα: for it is not the fact of φανεροῦται that he is insisting on, but the fact that if they reproved the works of darkness, these would become no longer works of darkness, but would be ὑπὸ τοῦ φωτὸς φανερούμενα. And 2) φανερούμενον is passive, not middle, in which sense it is never used in N. T.; 'every thing which is made manifest, is no longer darkness, but light: and thus you will be, not compromised to these works of darkness, but making an inroad upon the territory of darkness with the ὅπλα τοῦ φωτός.' And thus the context leads on easily and naturally to the next verse. The objection to this [Eadie] that 'light does not always exercise this transforming influence, for the devil and all the wicked are themselves condemned by the light, without becoming themselves light,' is null, being founded on misapprehension of the φῶς ἐστιν. Objectively taken, it is universally true: every thing shone upon IS LIGHT. Whether this tend to condemnation or otherwise, depends just on whether the transforming influence takes place. The key-text to this, is John iii. 20, πᾶς γὰρ ὁ φαῦλα πράσσων μισεῖ τὸ φῶς, κ. οὐκ ἔρχεται πρὸς τὸ φῶς, ἵνα μὴ ἐλεγχθῇ τὰ ἔργα αὐτοῦ,—His works being thus brought into the light,—made light, and he being thus put to shame. Notice also φανερωθῇ in the next verse, which is the desire of him who ποιεῖ τὴν ἀλήθειαν. The E. V. is doubly wrong—1) in 'all things that are reproved' [τ. τὰ ἐλεγχόμενα]: 2) in 'whatsoever doth make manifest is light' [πᾶν τὸ φανεροῦν]: besides that such a proposition has absolutely no meaning in the context. The meaning is discussed at length in Harl., Eadie, who however fall into the error of rendering φανερούμενον active [not middle],—Stier, Ellicott,—and best of all, Meyer): 14.] wherefore (this being so—seeing that every thing that is made manifest becomes light,—is shone upon by the detecting light of Christ,—objectively,—it only remains that the man should be shone upon inwardly by the same Christ revealed in his awakened heart. We have then in Scripture an exhortation to that effect) He (viz. God, in the Scripture: see ch. iv. 8 note: all other supplies, such as 'the Spirit in the Christian' [Stier],—'the Christian speaking to the Heathen' [Flatt],—'one may say' [Bornemann], &c. are mere lame helps out of the difficulty:—as are all ideas of St. Paul having quoted a Christian hymn [some in Thdrt.], an apocryphal writing [some in Jer., Epiph., al.], a baptismal formula [Michaelis],—one of our Lord's unrecorded sayings [Rhenferd],—or that he means, 'thus saith the Lord' [some in Jer. al.], or alludes to the general tenor of Scripture [Wesley],—or does not quote at all [Barnes], &c. &c.) saith, Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall shine upon thee (where is this citation to be found? In the first place, by the introduction of ὁ χριστός, it is manifestly a paraphrase, not an exact citation. The Apostle cites, and had a perfect right to cite, the language of prophecy in the light of the fulfilment of prophecy: and that he is here doing so, the bare word 'Christ' shews us beyond dispute. I insist on this, that it may be plainly shewn to be no shift in a difficulty, no hypothesis among hypotheses,—but the necessary inference from the form of the citation. This being so,—of what passage of the O. T. is this a paraphrase? I answer, of Isa. lx. 1, 2. There, the church is set forth as being in a state of darkness and of death [cf. lix. 10], and is exhorted to awake, and become light, for that her light is come, and the glory of Jehovah has arisen upon her. Where need we go further for that of which we are in search? It is not true [as Stier], that there is 'no allusion to sleep or death' in the prophet: nor is it true again, that ἐπὶ σὲ φανήσεται κύριος κ. ἡ δόξα αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ σὲ ὀφθήσεται is not represented by ἐπιφαύσει σοι ὁ χριστός. The fact is, that Stier has altogether mistaken the context, in saying,—"The Apostle quotes here, not to justify the exhortation—'convict, that they may become light;'—but to exhort—'Become light, that ye may be able to convict [shine]:'" the refutation of which see above, on ver. 13). 15.] He now resumes the hortative strain, interrupted by the digression of vv. 12—14. Take heed then (there is not any immediate connexion with the last verse: but the οὖν resumes from the περιπατεῖτε in ver. 8, and that which followed it there) how ye walk strictly (the construction is exactly as in ref. 1 Cor., ἕκαστος δὲ βλεπέτω πῶς ἐποικοδομεῖ. 'Take heed, of what sort your ἀκριβῶς περιπατεῖν is:'—the implication being, 'take heed not only that your walk be exact, strict, but also of what sort that strictness is—not only that you have a rule, and keep to it, but that that rule be the best one.' So that a double exhortation is involved. See Ellic. here: and the Fritzschiorum Opuscula, pp. 208 f., note), (namely) not as unwise, but as wise (qualification of the ἀκριβῶς περιπατεῖτε, and expansion of the πῶς [μή, subj.]: no περιπατοῦντες need be supplied after μή, as Harl.), buying up for yourselves (the) opportunity (viz. of good, whenever occurring; let it not pass by, but as merchants carefully looking out for vantages, make it your own: see Col. iv. 5. The compound ἐξ- does not suggest the question 'from whom' it is to be bought, as Beng., Calv., al., nor imply mere completeness, as Mey., but rather refers to the 'collection out of' [see reff. Gal.], the buying up, as we say: culling your times of good out of a land where there are few such flowers. The middle gives the reflexive sense: cf. ref. Dan.), because the days (of your time,—in which you live) are evil (see above. ὁ ἐξαγοραζόμενος τὸν ἀλλότριον δοῦλον, ἐξαγοράζεται κ. κτᾶται αὐτόν. ἐπεὶ οὖν ὁ καιρὸς δουλεύει τοῖς πονηροῖς, ἐξαγοράσασθε αὐτόν, ὥστε καταχρήσασθαι αὐτῷ πρὸς εὐσέβειαν. Severianus, in Cramer's Catena). 17.] On this account (because ye have need so prudently to define your rule of life, and so carefully to watch for opportunities of good: not, because the ἡμέραι are πονηραί [Œc., Thl., De W., Olsh.], which would fritter down the context) be not (better than 'do not become,' which though more strictly the literal sense of μὴ γίνεσθε, puts the process of degeneracy too strongly in English) senseless (Tittmann, Syn. p. 143, has discussed the meaning of ἄφρων, 'qui mente non recte utitur'), but understand (συνιέναι, to know intelligently,—γινώσκειν merely to know as matter of fact, as the servant who knew his lord's will and did it not, Luke xii. 47) what is the will of the Lord. 18.] The connexion seems to be: after the general antithesis in ver. 17, μὴ ἄφρονες, ἀλλὰ συνίετε κ.τ.λ., he proceeds to give one prominent instance, in the same antithetical shape. And (καί is subordinate, introducing a particular after a general: so Herod. i. 73, τῶνδε εἵνεκα καὶ γῆς ἱμέρῳ . . . . see Hartung i. 145) be not intoxicated with wine, in which practice (not, ἐν οἴνῳ, but ἐν τῷ μεθύσκεσθαι οἴνῳ—the crime is not in God's gift, but in the abuse of it: and the very arrangement of the sentence, besides the spirit of it, implies the lawful use of wine—see 1 Tim. v. 23) is profligacy (ἀσωτία, not from ἀ—σῴζεσθαι,—as Clem. Alex. Pædag. ii. 1, p. 167 P. [ἀσώτους αὐτοὺς οἱ καλέσαντες πρῶτον εὖ μοι δοκοῦσιν αἰνίττεσθαι τὸ τέλος αὐτῶν, ἀσώστους αὐτοὺς κατὰ ἔκθλιψιν τοῦ σ στοιχείου γενομένους], al., but from ἀ-σῴζειν: ἀσωτία ἐστὶν ὑπερβολὴ περὶ χρήματα, Aristot. Eth. Nic. iv. 1. 3. But as spendthrifts are almost of necessity self-indulgent and reckless, the word comes to have the meaning of 'dissoluteness,' 'debauchery,' 'profligacy,'—see Eth. Nic. iv. 1. 36, Tittmann, p. 152, and Trench, N. T. Syn. § 16. Theodotion renders Isa. xxviii. 7 by ἐν τῇ μέθῃ ἠσωτεύθησαν ὑπερόγκως): but (contrast, see above) be filled (antith. to μεθύσκεσθε οἴνῳ;—not to μεθύσκεσθε alone, so that ἐν πνεύματι should be opposed to οἴνῳ: see below) with (ἐν, as ch. i. 23, but also 'in:' let this be the region in, and the ingredient with which you are filled) the Spirit (the ambiguity in the preposition is owing to the peculiar meaning of πνεῦμα as applied to the Christian:—viz. his own spirit, dwelt in and informed by the Holy Spirit of God, see note on ch. iv. 23. If this is so, if you are full of the Spirit, full in Spirit, there will be a joy indeed, but not that of ἀσωτία: one which will find its expression not in drunken songs, but in Christian hymns, and continual thankfulness), speaking to one another (ch. iv. 32; see also the ‖, Col. iii. 16. It is perhaps too much to find in this the practice of antiphonal chanting: but it is interesting to remember that in Pliny's letter the Christians are described as 'soliti stato die ante lucem convenire, carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem:' and that Nicephorus, Hist. xiii. 8 [cited by Eadie], says τὴν τῶν ἀντιφώνων συνήθειαν ἅπασιν ἀποστόλων ἡ ἐκκλησία παρέλαβε. Conyb. places a full stop at ἑαυτοῖς: but surely both style and sense are thus marred) in (this must be the rendering, whether the preposition is inserted or not) psalms (not to be confined, as Olsh. and Stier, to O. T. hymns; see 1 Cor. xiv. 26; James v. 13. The word properly signified those sacred songs which were performed with musical accompaniment [so Basil, Hom. in Ps. xxix. 1, vol. i. p. 124, ὁ ψαλμὸς λόγος ἐστὶ μουσικός, ὅταν εὐρύθμως κατὰ τοὺς ἁρμονικοὺς λόγους πρὸς τὸ ὄργανον προσ-

Christ —cf. Pliny's letter above),—giving thanks (another additional, not explanatory, clause) always for all things (see Phil. iv. 6: not only for blessings, but for every dispensation of God: Ellic. quotes from Thl.,—οὐχ ὑπὲρ τῶν ἀγαθῶν μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν λυπηρῶν, κ. ὃν ἴσμεν, κ. ὧν οὐκ ἴσμεν καὶ γὰρ διὰ πάντων εὐεργετούμεθα κἂν ἀγνοῶμεν) in the name (the element in which the εὐχαριστοῦντες must take place. "The name of the Lord is there, where He is named. How He is named, depends on the particular circumstances: it is one thing to be reproached [1 Pet. iv. 14], another to be saved [Acts iv. 12], another to be baptized [Acts x. 48], another to command [2 Thess. iii. 6], another to pray [John xiv. 13], another to give thanks [cf. Col. iii. 17] in the name of the Lord. . . . . The Apostle says, that all the Christian would do, he must do in the name of Christ [Col. iii. 17]." Harl.: the rest of the note is well worth consulting) of our Lord Jesus Christ to God and the Father (see on ch. i. 3),—being subject to one another (a fourth additional, not subordinate clause. λαλοῦντες,—ᾄδοντες κ. ψάλλοντες, — εὐχαριστοῦντες, — ὑποτασσόμενοι ἀλλήλοις: and then out of this last general injunction are unfolded all the particular applications to the relations of life, ver. 22—ch. vi. 9. It is not so easy to assign precisely its connexion with those which have preceded. It is hardly enough to say that as the first three name three special duties in regard to God, so this last a comprehensive moral duty in regard to man [Ellic.]: for the question of the connexion is still unanswered. I would rather regard it [as I see Eadie also does], as a thought suggested by the μὴ μεθ. κ.τ.λ. with which the sentence began—that as we are otherwise to be filled, otherwise to sing and rejoice, so also we are otherwise to behave—not blustering nor letting our voices rise in selfish vaunting, as such men do,—but subject to one another, &c.) in the fear of Christ ('rara phrasis,' Beng.: of Him, whose members we all are, so that any displacement in the Body is a forgetfulness of the reverence due to Him).

22.] Wives (supply, as rec. has inserted, ὑποτάσσεσθε, seeing that the subsequent address to husbands is in the 2nd person), to your own husbands (ἰδίοις, as we often use the word [e. g. 'He murdered his own father'], to intensify the recognition of the relationship and suggest its duties: see 1 Cor. vii. 2: also John v. 18), as to the Lord ('quasi Christo ipsimet, cujus locum et personam viri repræsentant.' Corn.-a-lap. in Ellic.: i. e. 'in obeying your husbands, obey the Lord:' not merely as in all things we are to have regard to Him, but because, as below expanded, the husband stands peculiarly in Christ's place. But he is not thus identified in power with Christ, nor the obedience, in its nature, with that which is owed to Him): for a husband (any husband, taken as an example: the same in sense would be expressed by ὁ ἀνήρ, the husband in each case, generic: sing. of οἱ ἄνδρες) is head of his wife, as also (καί, introducing identity of category) Christ is Head of the church (see for the sentiment, 1 Cor. xi. 3 note), (being, in His case—see below) Himself Saviour of the Body (i. e. 'in Christ's case the Headship is united with, nay gained by, His having SAVED the body in the process of Redemption: so that I am not alleging Christ's Headship as one entirely identical with that other, for He has a claim to it and office in it peculiar to Himself.' 'Vir autem non est servator uxoris, in eo Christus excellit: hinc sed sequitur.' Bengel. Stier remarks the apparent play on σωτήρ—σώματος, in reference to the supposed derivation of σῶμα from σάω (σώζω); and has noticed that in the only other place [except the pastoral Epistles] where St. Paul uses σωτήρ, Phil. iii. 20, 21, it is also in connexion with σῶμα): but (what I do say is, that thus far the two Headships are to be regarded as identical, in the subjection of the body to the Head) as the church is subjected to Christ, so also (again, identity of category in the ὑποτάσσ.) let the wives be to their husbands (not ἰδίοις now, as it would disturb the perspicuity of the comparison) in every thing (thus only, with Calv., Beng., Mey., Ellic., can I find any legitimate meaning or connexion in the words. Chr.) that (intermediate purpose, as regarded her; see below, ver. 27) He might sanctify her, having purified her (ἁγιάσῃ and καθαρίσας might be contemporaneous, and indeed this is the more common usage of past participles with past finite verbs in the N. T. [see ch. i. 9 note]. But here, inasmuch as the sanctifying is clearly a gradual process, carried on till the spotless presentation [ver. 27], and the washing cannot be separated from the introductory rite of baptism, it is best to take the καθαρίσας as antecedent to the ἁγιάσῃ) by the laver (not 'washing,' as E. V.: a meaning the word never has) of the water (of which we all know: viz. the baptismal water, see ref. Tit. We can hardly set aside the reference to the purifying bath of the bride previous to marriage:—see below on ver. 27, and cf. Rev. xxi. 2) in the word (what word? ἐν ὀνόματι πατρὸς κ. υἱοῦ κ. ἁγίου πνεύματος, says Chrys. alluding to the formula in Baptism: and so many fathers:—the 'mandatum divinum' on which Baptism rests [Storr, Peile]:—the 'invocatio divini nominis' which gives Baptism its efficacy [Erasm.]:—the preached word of faith [Rom. x. 8] of which confession is made in baptism, and which carries the real cleansing [John xv. 3; xvii. 17] and regenerating power [1 Pet. i. 23; iii. 21 (?)]—so Aug. Tract. 80 in Joan. 3, vol. iii. p. 1840, Migne; where those memorable words occur, "Detrahe verbum, et quid est aqua nisi aqua? Accedit verbum ad elementum, et fit sacramentum, etiam ipsum tanquam visibile verbum." And this certainly seems the sense most analogous to St. Paul's usage, in which ῥῆμα is confined to the divine word. But we must not join ἐν ῥήματι with τῷ λουτρῷ nor with τοῦ ὕδατος; for the former would require τῷ ἐν ῥήματι,—the latter, τοῦ ἐν ῥήματι,—there being no such close connexion as to justify the omission of the article; indeed the specification being here absolutely required, after so common a term as τὸ λοῦτρον τοῦ ὕδατος. So that we are referred back to the verb [ἁγ.] and participle [καθαρίσας] preceding. The former connexion is not probable, on account of the participle intervening: see also below. The latter is on all accounts the most likely. Thus, the word, preached and received, is the conditional element of purification,—the real water of spiritual baptism;—that wherein and whereby alone the efficacy of baptism is conveyed—that wherein and whereby we are regenerated, the process of sanctification being subsequent and gradual),

27.] that (further purpose of ἑαυτ. παρέδωκεν ὑπὲρ αὐτῆς) He might Himself present to Himself (as a bride, see reff. 2 Cor.: not as a sacrifice [Harl.], which is quite against the context. The expression sets forth that the preparation of the Church for her bridal with Christ is exclusively by His own agency) the church glorious (the prefixed adjective is emphatic, which we lose in translation), not having spot (a late word — τοῦτο φυλάττου, λέγε δὲ κηλίς—Phryn. A classical word, see reff.), or any of such things, but that she may be holy (perfect in holiness) and blameless (see on both, note, ch. i. 4). The presentation here spoken of is clearly, in its full sense, that future one at the Lord's coming, so often treated under the image of a marriage (Matt. xxii. 1 ff.; xxv. 1 ff.; Rev. xix. 7 ff.; xxi. 2 al. fr.), not any progress of sanctification here below, as Harl., Beng., al., maintain [and Calv., commonly quoted on the other side: for he says on παραστήσῃ, 'finem baptismi et ablutionis nostræ declarat: ut sancte et inculpate Deo vivamus']: however the progress towards this state of spotlessness in this life may sometimes be spoken of in its fulness and completion, or with reference to its proper qualities, not here found in their purity. Schöttgen quotes a rabbinical comment on Cant. i. 5:—'Judæi de synagoga intelligunt, et sic explicant: nigra sum in hoc sæculo, sed decora in sæculo futuro.' 28.] Thus (two ways of understanding this οὕτως are open to us: 1) as referring back to Christ's love for the church,—'Thus,' 'in like manner,' &c., as [being] 'their own bodies:' and 2) as referring forward to the ὡς below, as very frequently [though Eadie calls it contrary to grammatical law] in St. Paul [cf. 1 Cor. iii. 15; iv. 1; ix. 26, al., and ver. 33 below, where Eadie himself renders, 'so . . . . as himself'],—'Thus,' 'so,' &c., 'as [they love] their own bodies.' After weighing maturely what has been said on one side and the other, I cannot but decide for the latter, as most in accordance with the usage of St. Paul and with ver. 33: also as more simple. The sense [against Ellic.] remains substantially the same, and answers much better to the comment furnished by the succeeding clauses:—husbands ought to love their own wives as they love their own bodies [= themselves: for their wives are in fact part of their own bodies, ver. 31]: this being illustrated by and referred to the great mystery of Christ and His church, in which the same love, and the same incorporation, has place) ought the husbands also (as well as Christ in the archetypal example just given) to love their own (emphatic: see above on ver. 22) wives, as (with the same affection as) their own bodies. He that loveth his own (see above) wife, loveth himself (is but complying with that universal law of nature by which we all love ourselves. The best words to supply before the following γάρ will be, "And this we all do"): for (see above) no man ever hated his own flesh (= ἑαυτόν, but put in this form to prepare for εἰς σάρκα μίαν in the Scripture proof below. Wetst. quotes from Seneca, Ep. 14, 'fateor, insitam nobis esse corporis nostri caritatem'), but nourishes it up (through all its stages, to maturity: so Aristoph. As the woman owed her natural being to the man, her source and head, so we owe our entire spiritual being to Christ, our source and head: and as the woman was one flesh with the man in this natural relation, so we in our entire spiritual relation, body, soul, and Spirit, are one with Christ, God manifested in our humanity,—parts and members of His glorified Body. Bengel well remarks, that we are not, as in Gen., l. c. ὀστοῦν ἐκ τῶν ὀστέων αὐτοῦ, καὶ σὰρξ ἐκ τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτ.:—'non ossa et caro nostra, sed nos spiritualiter propagamur ex humanitate Christi, carnem et ossa habente']: wherefore (the allusion, or rather free citation, is still carried on: cf. Gen. ii. 24:—i. e. because we are members of Him in the sense just insisted on. This whole verse is said [see on ver. 32 below] not of human marriages, but of Christ and the church. He is the ἄνθρωπος in the Apostle's view here, the Church is the γυνή. But for all this, I would not understand the words, as Meyer, in a prophetical sense of the future coming of Christ:—the omission of the article before ἄνθρωπος sufficiently retains the general aphoristic sense:—but would regard the saying as applied to that, past, present, and future, which constitutes Christ's Union to His Bride the Church: His leaving the Father's bosom, which is past—His gradual preparation of the union, which is present: His full consummation of it, which is future. This seems to me to be necessary, because we are as truly now εἰς σάρκα μίαν with Him, as we shall be, when heaven and earth shall ring with the joy of the nuptials;—and hence the exclusive future sense is inapplicable. In this allegorical sense [see below], Chrys., Jer., and most of the ancients: Beng., Grot., Mey. [as above], al., interpret: and Eadie would have done well to study more deeply the spirit of the context before he characterized it as 'strange romance,' 'wild and visionary,' and said, 'there is no hint that the Apostle intends to allegorize.' That allegory, on the contrary, is the key to the whole) shall a man leave father and mother and shall be closely joined to his wife, and they two shall become (see Matt. xix. 5, note) one flesh ('non solum uti antea, respectu ortus: sed respectu novæ conjunctionis.' Beng.). 32.] This mystery is great (viz. the matter mystically alluded to in the Apostle's application of the text just quoted: the mystery of the spiritual union of Christ with our humanity, typified by the close conjunction of the marriage state. This meaning of μυστήριον, which is strictly that in which St. Paul uses the word [see reff.],—as something passing human comprehension, but revealed as a portion of the divine dealings in Christ,—is, it seems to me, required by the next words. It is irksome, but necessary, to notice the ridiculous perversion of this text by the Romish church, which from the Vulgate rendering, 'sacramentum hoc magnum est, ego autem dico in Christo et in Ecclesia,' deduces that 'marriage is a great sacrament in Christ and in His Church' [Encyclical letter of 1832 cited by Eadie]. It will be enough to say that this their blunder of 'sacramentum' for 'mysterium,' had long ago been exposed by their own Commentators, Cajetan and Estius): but I (emphatic) say (allege) it with reference to Christ, and [with reference to] the church (i. e. my meaning, in citing the above text, is to call your attention, not to mere human marriage, but to that high and mysterious relation between Christ and His Church, of which that other is but a faint resemblance). 33.] Nevertheless (not to go further into the mystical bearings of the subject—so Meyer) you also (as well as Christ) every one (see reff. and 1 Cor. xiv. 27; Acts xv. 21; Heb. ix. 25), let each (the construction is changed and the verb put into concord with ἕκαστος instead of ὑμεῖς: so Plat. Gorg. p. 503, ὅσπερ κ. οἱ ἄλλοι πάντες δημιουργοὶ βλέποντες πρὸς τὸ ἑκάστου ἔργον ἕκαστος οὐκ εἰκῇ ἐκλεγόμενος προσφέρει κ.τ.λ.; Rep. p. 346, αἱ ἄλλαι πᾶσαι [τέχναι] οὕτω τὸ αὑτῆς ἑκάστη ἔργον ἐργάζεται, κ.τ.λ. Cic. de Off. i. 41, 'poetæ suum quisque opus a vulgo considerari vult') so love his own wife as himself, and the wife (best taken as a nominative absolute, as Mey. Otherwise we should rather expect ἵνα δὲ ἡ γυνὴ κ.τ.λ. It is no objection to this [Eadie] that in the resolution of the idiom a verb must be supplied:—but the wife, for her part,—'I order,' or, 'let her see,' cf. note on 2 Cor. viii. 7), that she fear (ὡς πρέπει γυναῖκα φοβεῖσθαι, μὴ δουλοπρεπῶς, Œc.) her husband. Ch. VI. 1—4.] See on ch. v. 22. Duties of children and parents. Children, obey your parents [in the Lord (i. e. Christ: the sphere in which the action is to take place, as usual: ἐν κυρίῳ belonging to ὑπακούετε τ. γον., not to τοῖς γον., as if it were τοῖς ἐν κυρίῳ γον., nor can this be combined, as a second reference, with the other, as by Orig. in Cramer's Catena, understanding 'your fathers in the faith, ὁποῖος ὁ Παῦλος ἦν Κορινθίων.'

I should venture however to question whether the Apostle's view was to hint at such commands of parents as might not be according to the will of God, as is very generally supposed ['quia poterant parentes aliquid imperare perversum, adjunxit in Domino.' Jer.]: for cf. Col. iii. 20, ὑπακούετε τοῖς γονεῦσιν κατὰ πάντα. I should rather believe, that he regards both parents and children as ἐν κυρίῳ, and the commands, as well as the obedience, as having that sphere and element. How children were to regard commands not answering to this description, would be understood from the nature of the case: but it seems to violate the simplicity of this ὑποτασσόμενοι ἀλλήλοις passage, to introduce into it a by-thought of this kind)]: for this is right (Thdrt., Harl., De W., Mey., al., regard δίκαιον as explained by the next verse, and meaning κατὰ τὸν θεοῦ νόμον. But it seems rather an appeal to the first principles of natural duty, as Est., 'ut a quibus vitam acceperimus, iis obedientiam reddamus.' So Beng. Stier, as usual, combines both senses—just, according to the law both of nature and of God. Surely it is better to regard the next verse as an additional particular, not the mere expansion of this). 2.] Honour thy father and thy mother, for such is ('seeing it is,' as Ellic., is rather too strong for ἤτις, throwing the motive to obedience too much on the fact of the promise accompanying it. Whereas the obedience rests on the fact implied in ἐντολή, and the promise comes in to shew its special acceptableness to God) the first commandment (in the decalogue, which naturally stands at the head of all God's other commandments; and which, though not formally binding on us as Christians, is quoted, in matters of eternal obligation [not of positive enactment], as an eminent example of God's holy will) with a promise (i. e. with a special promise attached: 'in respect of promise' is too vague, and does not convey any definite meaning in English. The fact certainly is so, and the occurrence of the description of God as 'shewing mercy unto thousands, &c.' after the second commandment, does not, as Jer., al., have thought, present any difficulty—for that is no special promise attached to the commandment. Nor does the fact that no other commandment occurs in the decalogue with a promise: see above. The ἐν, as in reff.—in the sphere or department of—characterized by—accompanied with), that it may be well with thee, and thou be long-lived upon the earth (he paraphrases the latter portion of the commandment, writing for ἵνα μακρ. γένῃ, ἔσῃ μ.,—and omitting after γῆς, [τῆς ἀγαθῆς, so in Exod., but not in Deut.] ἧς κύριος ὁ θεός σου δίδωσιν σοι: thus adapting the promise to his Christian readers, by taking away from it that which is special and peculiar to the Jewish people. It is surely a mistake, as Jer., Aq., Est., Olsh., to spiritualize the promise, and understand by τῆς γῆς the heavenly Canaan. The very fact of the omission of the special clause removes the words from the region of type into undoubted reality: and when we remember that the persons addressed are τὰ τέκνα, we must not depart from the simplest sense of the words. For the future after ἵνα, see 1 Cor. ix. 18, note: and John vii. 3; Rev. xxii. 14. To consider it as such, is far better than to suppose a change of construction to the direct future—'and thou shalt be, &c.').

4.] And ye, fathers (the mothers being included, as ὑποτασσόμεναι τοῖς ἰδίοις ἀνδράσιν—they being the fountains of domestic rule: not for any other less worthy reason, to which the whole view of the sexes by the Apostle is opposed), irritate not (οἷον, says Chrys., οἱ πολλοὶ ποιοῦσιν, ἀποκληρονόμους ἐργαζόμενοι, καὶ ἀποκηρύκτους ποιοῦντες, καὶ φορτικῶς ἐπικείμενοι, οὐχ ὡς ἐλευθέροις ἀλλ' ὡς ἀνδραπόδοις. But the Apostle seems rather to allude to provoking by vexatious commands, and unreasonable blame, and uncertain temper, in ordinary intercourse: cf. Col. iii. 21) your children, but bring them up (see on ch. v. 29, where it was used of physical fostering up: and cf. Plato, Rep. p. 538 c, περὶ δικαίων κ. καλῶν, ἐν οἷς ἐκτεθράμμεθα ὡς ὑπὸ γονεῦσι) in (as the sphere and element: see Plato above) the discipline and admonition ('παιδεία hic significare videtur institutionem per pœnas: νουθεσία autem est ea institutio quæ fit verbis.' Grot. Such indeed is the general sense of παιδεία in the LXX and N. T., the word having gained a deeper meaning than mere 'eruditio,' by the revealed doctrine of the depravity of our nature: see Trench, Syn. § 32. Ellic. remarks, that this sense seems not to have been unknown to earlier writers, e. g. Xen. Mem. i. 3. 5, διαίτῃ τήν τε ψυχὴν ἐπαίδευσε κ. τὸ σῶμα . . . , he disciplined &c., but not Polyb. ii. 9. 6, where it is ἀβλαβῶς ἐπαιδεύθησαν πρὸς τὸ μέλλον. νουθεσία [a late form for νουθέτησις, see Phryn. Lob. p. 512] is as Cicero, 'quasi lenior objurgatio:' 'the training by word—by the word of encouragement, when no more is wanted;—of remonstrance, reproof, or blame where these are required.' Trench, ubi supra) of the Lord (i. e. Christ: either objective,—'concerning the Lord:'—so Thdrt. and very many of the ancients, and Erasm., Beza [not Est.], &c.; or sub-Chrys. sees in κατὰ σάρκα a consolatory hint that the δεσποτεία is πρόσκαιρος καὶ βραχεῖα: Calv., that their real liberty was still their own: Ellic. in citing these, rightly observes, that however they may be doubted, still both, especially the latter, are obviously deductions which must have been, and which the Apostle might have intended to have been, made) with fear and trembling (see reff., and note on 1 Cor. ii. 3: whence it appears that the φόβος κ. τρόμος was to be not that of dread, arising from their condition as slaves, but that of anxiety to do their duty,—'sollicita reverentia, quam efficiet cordis simplicitas.' This is much more natural, than, with Rückert, to make ποιοῦντες κ.τ.λ. carry the emphasis, and ὡς δοῦλ. χρ. to be merely subordinate to it), doing the will of God (serving not a seen master only [ὀφθαλμοδουλ.], but the great invisible Lord of all, which will be the surest guarantee for your serving your earthly masters, even when unseen); from your soul with good will doing service (this arrangement, which is that of Syr., Chr., Jer., Beng., Lachm., Harl., De Wette, seems to me far better than the other [Tischdf., Mey., Ellic., al.] which joins ἐκ ψυχῆς to ποιοῦντες τὸ θέλ. τοῦ θεοῦ. For 1) these words need here no such qualification as ἐκ ψυχῆς: if the will of God be the real object of the man's obedience, the μὴ κατ' ὀφθαλμοδουλ. will be sufficiently answered: and 2) were it so, it would be more natural to find ἐκ ψυχῆς preceding than following the clause, —ἐκ ψυχῆς ποιοῦντες τὸ θέλ. τοῦ θεοῦ, or ἐκ ψυχῆς τὸ θέλ. τοῦ θεοῦ ποιοῦντες, or τὸ θέλ. τοῦ θεοῦ ἐκ ψυχῆς ποιοῦντες, whereas 3) the double qualification, ἐκ ψυχῆς μετ' εὐνοίας, attached to δουλεύοντες, describes beautifully the source in himself [ἐκ ψυχῆς] and the accompanying feeling towards another [μετ' εὐνοίας] of Christian service. On εὔνοια in this sense, cf. Eur. Androm. 59, εὔνους δὲ καὶ σοί, ζῶντι δ' ἦν τῷ σῷ πόσει: Xen. If we take the rec., or that of A, &c. we must render 'whatsoever good thing each man shall have done,' and take ὃ ἐάν τι for ὅτι ἄν; so Plat. Legg. ix. p. 864 κ, ἢν ἄν τινα καταβλάψῃ: and Lysis. p. 160, ὃς ἄν τις ὑμᾶς εὖ ποιῇ [cited in Mey.]. On ἐάν, see Winer, § 42. 6 obs.), this (emphatic: 'this in full,' 'this exactly') he shall receive (see reff. where the same expression occurs—this he shall then receive in its value as then estimated,—changed, so to speak, into the currency of that new and final state) from the Lord (Christ), whether he be slave or free (Chrys. beautifully gives the connexion of thought: ἐπειδὴ γὰρ εἶκὸς ἦν πολλοὺς τῶν δεσποτῶν ἀπίστους ὄντας μὴ αἰσχύνεσθαι μηδὲ ἀμείβεσθαι τοὺς οἰκέτας τῆς ὑπακοῆς, ὅρα πῶς αὐτοὺς παρεμυθήσατο ὥστε μὴ ὑποπτεύειν τὴν ἀντακόδοσιν, ἀλλὰ σφόδρα θαρρεῖν ὑπὲρ τῆς ἀμοιβῆς. καθάπερ γὰρ οἱ καλῶς πάσχοντες, ὅταν μὴ ἀμείβωνται τοὺς εὐεργέτας, τὸν θεὸν αὐτοῖς ὀφειλέτην ποιοῦσιν· οὕτω δὴ καὶ οἱ δεσπόται, ἂν παθόντες εὖ παρὰ σοῦ μή σε ἀμείψωνται, μᾶλλον ἠμείψαντο, τὸν θεὸν ὀφειλέτην σοι καταστήσαντες): 9.] and ye masters, do the same things ('jus analogum, quod vocant:' as they are to remember one whom they serve, so [below] are ye—and, 'mutatis mutandis,' to act to them as they to you. This wider sense is better than that of Chrys., τὰ αὐτὰ ποῖα; μετ' εὐνοίας δουλεύετε) with regard to them, forbearing your (usual) threatening (τήν, 'quemadmodum vulgus dominorum solet,' Erasm. par. in Mey.), knowing (as ye do: see ver. 8) that both of them and of yourselves the Master is in the heavens, and respect of persons (warping of justice from regard to any man's individual pre-eminence, see reff.) against the spiritual (armies) (so we have [Mey.] τὸ πολιτικόν [Herod. vii. 103], τὸ ἱππικόν [Rev. ix. 16], τὰ ληστρικά [Polyæn. v. 14], τὰ δοῦλα, τὰ αἰχμάλωτα &c. Winer, Gr. § 34, note 3, compares τὰ δαιμόνια, originally a neuter-adjective form. See Bernhardy, Synt. p. 326, for more examples. Stier maintains the abstract meaning, 'the spiritual things:' but as Ellic. remarks, the meaning could not be 'spiritales malignitates,' as Beza, but 'spiritualia nequitiæ,' as the Vulg., i. e. 'the spiritual elements,' or 'properties,' 'of wickedness,' which will not suit here) of wickedness in the heavenly places (but what is the meaning? Chrys. connects ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις with ἡ πάλη ἐστὶν—ἐν τοῖς ἐπ. ἡ μάχη κεῖται . . . . ὡς ἂν εἰ ἔλεγεν, ἡ συνθήκη ἐν τίνι κεῖται; ἐν χρυσῷ. And so Thdrt., Phot., Œc., al. But it is plain that ἐν will not bear this [Chrys. says, τὸ ἐν, ὑπέρ ἐστι, καὶ τὸ ἐν, διά ἐστι], though possibly the order of the sentence might. Rückert, Matth., Eadie, al., interpret of the scene of the combat, thus also joining ἐν τ. ἐπ. with ἔστ. ἡμ. ἡ πάλη. The objection to this is twofold: 1) that the words thus appear without any sort of justification in the context: nay rather as a weakening of the following διὰ τοῦτο, instead of a strengthening: and 2) that according to Eadie's argument, they stultify themselves. He asks, "How can they [the heavenly places, the scenes of divine blessing, of Christ's exaltation, &c.] be the seat or abode of impure fiends?" But if they are "the scene of" our "combat" with these fiends, how can our enemies be any where else but in them? Two ways then remain: to join ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρ. a) with τὰ πνευματικὰ τῆς πονηρίας—b) with τῆς πονηρίας only. The absence of an article before ἐν forms of course an objection to both: but not to both equally. Were b) to be adopted, the specifying τῆς would appear to be required - because the sense would be, 'of that wickedness,' viz., the rebellion of the fallen angels, 'which was (or is) in the heavenly places.' If a), we do not so imperatively require the τά before ἐν, because ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρ. only specifies the locality,—does not distinguish τὰ πνευματικὰ τῆς πονηρ. ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρ. from any other πνευματικὰ τῆς πονηρίας elsewhere. So that this is in grammar the least objectionable rendering. And in sense it is, notwithstanding what Eadie and others have said, equally unobjectionable. That habitation of the evil spirits which in ch. ii. 2 was said, when speaking of mere matters of fact, to be in the ἀήρ, is, now that the difficulty and importance of the Christian conflict is being forcibly set forth, represented as ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις—over us, and too strong for us without the panoply of God. Cf. τὰ πετεινὰ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, Matt. vi. 26; and reff.). 13.] Wherefore (since our foes are in power too mighty for us,—and in dwelling, around and above us) take up (i. e. not 'to the battle,' but 'to put on:' 'frequens est ἀναλαμβάνειν de armis;' Kypke in loc. He refers to Diod. Sic. xx. 33, ἕκαστοι τὰς πανοπλίας ἀνελάμβανον ἐπὶ τὴν τοῦ φονεύσαντος τιμωρίαν, —and many places in Josephus. See also Wetst.) the entire armour of God (see on ver. 11) that ye may be able to withstand in the evil day (not as Chrys., ἡμέραν πονηρὰν τὸν παρόντα βίον φησί — for then the evil day would be upon the Christian before he has on the armour; the ἀεὶ ὀπλίζεσθε of Chr., if taken literally, would be but a poor posture of defence. Nor again can his view stand, ἀπὸ τοῦ χρόνου παραμυθεῖται· βραχύς, φησίν, ὁ καιρός—evidently no such point is raised in the following exhortations, but rather the contrary is implied—a long and weary conflict. The right interpretation is well given by Bengel—"Bellum est perpetuum: pugna alio die minus, alio magis fervet. Dies malus, vel ingruente morte, vel in vita: longior, brevior, in se ipso sæpe varius, ubi Malus vos invadit, et copiæ malignæ vos infestant, ver. 12"), and having accomplished all things (requisite to the combat: being fully equipped and having bravely fought. The words must not be taken in the sense of, 'omnibus debellatis,' as if κατεργασάμενοι = καταπολεμήσαντες [so Chrys. — ἅπαντα —τουτέστι, καὶ πάθη κ. ἐπιθυμίας ἀτόπους κ. τὰ ἐνοχλοῦντα ἡμῖν ἅπαντα], nor again, understood of preparation only [= παρασκευασάμενοι, 1 Cor. xiv. 8] as Erasm., Beza, Bengel, al. To finish, or accomplish, is the invariable Pauline usage of the word when taken in a good sense) to stand firm (at your post: as Estius, reporting others,—'ut posteaquam omnia quæ boni militis sunt, perfeceritis, stare et subsistere possitis:'—that you may not, after having done your duty well in battle, fall off, but stand your ground to the end. The other interpretation, 'stare tanquam triumphatores,' is precluded by what has been said above). 14—20.] Particulars of the armour, and attitude of the soldier. 14.] Stand therefore (whether 'ready for the fight,' or 'in the fight,' matters very little: all the aoristic participles are in time antecedent to the στῆτε—and the fight ever at hand), having girt about your loins with (ἐν, not instrumental, but local: the girt person is within, surrounded by, the girdle: but this is necessarily expressed in English by 'with') truth (not truth objective, which is rather the ῥῆμα θεοῦ below, ver. 17: but 'truthfulness,' subjective truth: to be understood however as based upon the faith and standing of a Christian, necessarily his truthfulness in his place in Christ. As the girdle [hardly here, however true that may have been, to be regarded as carrying the sword, for that would be confusing the separate images, cf. ver. 17] kept all together, so that an ungirded soldier would be (see Mey.) a contradiction in terms,—just so Truth is the band and expediter of the Christian's work in the conflict, without which all his armour would be but encumbrance. Gurnall's notion [Christian Armour, vol. i. p. 378], that 'the girdle is used as an ornament, put on uppermost, to cover the joints of the armour, which would, if seen, cause some uncomeliness' [see also Harl. 'ſie iſt des Chriſten Schmuck'], is against the context, and against the use of the phrase ζωνν. τ. ὀσφ. in the N. T.), and having put on the breastplate of righteousness (see ref. Isa., and Wisd. v. 19. As in those passages, righteousness is the breastplate—the genitive here being one of apposition. The righteousness spoken of is that of Rom. vi. 13—the purity and uprightness of Christian character which is the result of the work of the Spirit of Christ; the inwrought righteousness of Christ, not merely the imputed righteousness), and having shod your feet (as the soldier with his sandals—cf. the frequent description of arming in Homer—τοισι δ' ὑπαὶ λιπαροῖσιν ἐδήσατο καλὰ πέδιλα. The Roman caliga may be in the Apostle's mind: see on ver. 11) with (local again, not instrumental: see on ver. 14) the (article omitted after ἐν) readiness (the uses of ἑτοιμασία ['in classical Greek, ἑτοιμότης, Dem. 1268. 7.' Mey.] in Hellenistic Greek are somewhat curious, and may have a bearing on this passage. In Ps. ix. 17, it has the sense of inward 'preparedness,'—τὴν ἑτοιμασίαν τῆς καρδίας [τῶν πενήτων],—of outward, in Jos. Antt. x. 1. 2, δισχιλίους . . . . ἵππους εἰς ἑτοιμασίαν ὑμῖν παρέχειν ἕτοιμός εἰμι: of preparation, in an active sense, Wisd. xiii. 12, τὰ ἀποβλήματα τῆς ἐργασίας εἰς ἑτοιμασίαν τροφῆς ἀναλώσας ἐνεπλήσθη: in Ezra ii. 68, it answers to the Heb. מְכוֹן, a foundation, τοῦ στῆσαι αὐτὸν (the temple) ἐπὶ τὴν ἑτοιμασίαν αὐτοῦ, see also Ps. lxxviii. 14, δικαιοσ. κ. κρίμα ἑτοιμασία τοῦ θρόνου σου, and Dan. xi. 7 Theod. From this latter usage [which can hardly be a mistake of the translators, as Mey. supposes] some [Beza, Bengel, al.] have believed that as the ὑποδήματα are the lowest part of the panoply, the same meaning has place here: but no good sense seems to me to be gained: for we could not explain it 'pedes militis Christiani firmantur Evangelio, ne loco moveatur,' as Beng. Nor again can it mean the preparation (active) of the Gospel, or preparedness to preach the Gospel, as Chrys. and most Commentators ['shod as ready messengers of the glad tidings of peace,' Conyb.], for the persons addressed were not teachers, but the whole church.

The only refuge then is in the genitive subjective, 'the preparedness of,' i. e. arising from, suggested by, 'the Gospel of peace;' and so Œc. And the all, as no τούτοις is specified, does not apply only to 'quæcunque induistis' [Beng.], but generally, to all things whatever. But it is perhaps doubtful, whether ἐν πᾶσιν ought not to be read: in which case it will be "in all things," i. e. on all occasions) having taken up (see on ver. 13) the shield (θυρεός, 'scutum:' οἷόν τις θύρα φυλάττων τὸ σῶμα: the large oval shield, as distinguished from the small and light buckler, ἀσπίς, 'clypeus.' Polybius in his description [vi. 23] of the Roman armour, which should by all means be read with this passage, says of the θυρεός,—οὗ τὸ μὲν πλάτος ἐστὶ τῆς κυρτῆς ἐπιφανείας πένθ' ἡμιποδίων· τὸ δὲ μῆκος, ποδῶν τεττάρων. Kypke quotes from Plutarch, that Philopœmen persuaded the Achæans, ἀντὶ μὲν θυρεοῦ καὶ δόρατος ἀσπίδα λαβεῖν καὶ σάρισσαν. He adduces examples from Josephus of the same distinction,—which Phryn. p. 366, ed. Lob., states to have been unknown to the ancients, as well as θυρεός in this sense at all. See Lobeck's note, and Hom. Od. ι. 240) of (genitive of apposition) faith, in which (as lighting on it and being quenched in it; or perhaps [as Ellic. altern. with the above], "as protected by and under cover of which") you shall be able (not as Mey., to be referred to the last great future fight—but used as stronger than 'in which ye may,' &c., implying the certainty that the shield of faith will at all times and in all combats quench &c.) to quench all the fiery darts (cf. Ps. vii. 13, τὰ βέλη αὐτοῦ τοῖς καιομένοις ἐξειργάσατο:—Herod. viii. 52, ὅκως στυπεῖον περὶ τοὺς ὀϊστοὺς περιθέντες ἅψειαν, ἐτόξευον ἐς τὸ φράγμα: —Thucyd. ii. 75, καὶ προκαλύμματα εἶχε βέρρεις καὶ διφθέρας, ὥστε τοὺς ἐργαζομένους καὶ τὰ ξύλα μήτε πυρφόροις ὀϊστοῖς βάλλεσθαι, εἰς ἀσφάλειάν τε εἶναι, and other examples in Wetst. Apollodorus, Bibl. ii. 4, uses the very expression, τὴν ὕδραν ..... βαλὼν βέλεσι πεπυρωμένοις ..... Appian calls them πυρφόρα τοξεύματα. The Latin name was malleoli. Ammianus Marcellin. describes them as cane arrows, with a head in the form of a distaff filled with lighted material. Wetst. ib. The idea of Hammond, Bochart, al., that poisoned darts are meant ['causing fever'], is evidently ungrammatical. See Smith's Dict. of Antiq. art. Malleolus, and Winer, RWB. 'Bogen.' If the art. τά be omitted, a different turn must be given to the participle, which then becomes predicative: and we must render, 'when inflamed,' even in their utmost malice and fiery power) of the wicked one (see reff. and notes on Matt. v. 37; John xvii. 15. Here, it is salvation appropriated, by faith), and the sword of (furnished, forged, by: cf. τ. πανοπλ. τ. θεοῦ vv. 11, 13: not

The clause depends on στῆτε οὖν, the principal imperative of the former sentence—not on δέξασθε, which is merely a subordinate one, and which besides [Mey.] would express only how the weapons should be taken, and therefore would not satisfy πάσης and ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ) all (kind of) prayer and supplication ("it has been doubted whether there is any exact distinction between προσευχή and δέησις. Chrys. and Thdrt. on 1 Tim. ii. 1 explain προσευχή as αἴτησις ἀγαθῶν [see Suicer, Thes. s. v. 1],—δέησις as ὑπὲρ ἀπαλλαγῆς λυπηρῶν ἱκετεία [so Grot. as ἀπὸ τοῦ δέους, but see 2 Cor. i. 11]: compare Orig. de Orat. c. 33 [vol. i. p. 271]. Alii alia. The most natural and obvious distinction is that adopted by nearly all recent Commentators, viz. that προσευχή is a 'vocabulum sacrum' (see Harl.) denoting prayer in general, 'precatio:' δέησις a 'vocabulum commune,' denoting a special character or form of it, 'petitum,' rogatio: see Fritz. Rom. x. 1, vol. ii. p. 372. Huther on Tim. l. c." Ellicott) praying in every season (literal: cf. Luke xviii. 1 note, and 1 Thess. v. 17. There seems to be an allusion to our Lord's ἐν παντὶ καιρῷ δεόμενοι, ref. Continual habits of prayer cannot be kept up without watchfulness to that very end. This is better than to understand it, with Chr., &c. of persistence in the prayer itself, which indeed comes in presently) watching in (element in which: watching, being employed, in) all (kind of) importunity and supplication (not a hendiadys: rather the latter substantive is explanatory of the former, without losing its true force as coupled to it: 'importunity and [accompanied with, i. e. exemplified by] supplication') concerning all saints, and (καί brings into prominence a particular included in the general: see Hartung, i. 145) for me (certainly it seems that some distinction between ὑπέρ and περί should be marked: see Eadie's note, where however he draws it too strongly. Krüger, § 68. 28. 3, regards the two in later writers as synonymous. So Meyer, who quotes Demosth. p. 74. 35, μὴ περὶ τῶν δικαίων μηδ' ὑπὲρ τῶν ἔξω πραγμάτων εἶναι τὴν βουλήν, ἀλλ' ὑπὲρ τῶν ἐν τῇ χώρᾳ; and Xen. First of all, the words must be joined with the preceding, not with the following, as in E. V., Grot., Kypke, De W., al., which would [see below] be too tame and prosaic for the solemnity of the passage. Œc. Calv., 'os apertum cupit, quod erumpat in liquidam et firmam confessionem: ore enim semiclauso proferuntur ambigua et perplexa responsa,' and similarly Rück., al., and De W. But this again is laying too much on the phrase: see below. The same objection applies to Beza and Piscator's rendering, 'ut aperiam os meum:' and to taking the phrase of an opening of his mouth by God, as [Chrys. ἡ ἄλυσις ἐπίκειται τὴν παῤῥησίαν ἐπιστομίζουσα, ἀλλ' ἡ εὐχὴ ἡ ὑμετέρα ἀνοίγει μου τὸ στόμα, ἵνα πάντα ἃ ἐπέμφθην εἰπεῖν, εἴπω] Corn.-a-lap., Grot., Harl., and Olsh. from Ps. l. 17 and Ezek. xxix. 21. The best rendering is that of Est. ['dum os meum aperio'], Meyer, Ellicott, Ellic., al., 'in [at] the opening of my mouth,' i. e. 'when I undertake to speak:' thus we keep the meaning of ἀνοίγειν τὸ στόμα [reff. and Job iii. 1; Dan. x. 16], which always carries some solemnity of subject or occasion with it), in boldness ([subjective] freedom of speech, not as Grot. ['ut ab hac custodia militari liber per omnem urbem perferre possem sermonem evangelicum,' &c.], Koppe [objective], liberty of speech) to make known (the purpose of the gift of λόγος ἐν ἀνοίξει τοῦ στόματος) the mystery of the gospel (contained in the gospel: subjective genitive. 'The genitive is somewhat different to τὸ μυστήρ. τοῦ θελήματος, ch. i. 9: there it was the mystery in the matter of, concerning the θέλημα, gen. objecti,' Ellic.), on behalf of which (viz. τοῦ μυστ. τοῦ εὐαγγ.—for as Meyer remarks, this is the object of γνωρίσαι, and γνωρίσαι is pragmatically bound to πρεσβεύω) I am an ambassador (of Christ [ref.]: to whom, is understood: we need not supply as Michaelis, to the court of Rome) in chains (the singular is not to be pressed, as has been done by Paley, Wieseler, al., to signify the chain by which he was bound to 'the soldier that kept him' [Acts xxviii. 20]: for such singulars are often used collectively: see Bernhardy, Syntax, p. 58 f., Polyb. xxi. 3. 3, παρὰ μικρὸν εἰς τὴν ἅλυσιν ἐνέπεσον. Wetst. remarks, 'alias legati, jure gentium sancti et inviolabiles, in vinculis haberi non poterant.' His being thus a captive ambassador, was all the more reason why they should pray earnestly that he might have boldness, &c.), that (co-ordinate purpose with ἵνα δοθῇ, not subordinate to πρεσβεύω. See examples of such a co-ordinate ἵνα in Rom. vii. 13; Gal. iii. 14; 2 Cor. ix. 3. But no tautology [as Harl.] is involved: see below) in (the matter of, in dealing with: cf. λήθη ἐν τοῖς μαθήμασι, Plat. Phileb. p. 252 B: and see Bernhardy, p. 212: not as in 1 Thess. ii. 2, ἐπαῤῥησιασάμεθα ἐν τῷ θεῷ ἡμῶν, where ἐν denotes the source or ground of the confidence) it I may speak freely, as I ought to speak (no comma at με, as Koppe—'that I may have confidence, as I ought, to speak;' but the idea of speaking being already half understood in παῤῥησίᾳ, λαλῆσαι merely refers back to it. This last clause is a further qualification of the παῤῥησία—that it is a courage and free-spokenness ὡς δεῖ: and therefore involves no tautology).

21.] But (transition to another subject: the contrast being between his more solemn occupations just spoken of, and his personal welfare) that ye also (the καί may have two meanings: 1) as I have been going at length into the matters concerning you, so if you also on your part, wish to know my matters, &c.: 2) it may relate to some others whom the same messenger was to inform, and to whom he had previously written. If so, it would be an argument for the priority of the Epistle to the Colossians [so Harl. p. lx, Mey., Wieseler, and Wigger's Stud. u. Krit. 1841, p. 432]: for that was sent by Tychicus, and a similar sentiment occurs there, iv. 7. But I prefer the former meaning) may know the matters concerning me, how I fare (not, 'what I am doing,' as Wolf: Meyer answers well, that he was always doing one thing: but as in Ælian, V. CHAP. I. 1, 2.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. 1.] Timotheus seems to be named as being well known to the Philippians (Acts xvi. 3, 10 ff.), and present with St. Paul at this time. The mention is merely formal, as the Apostle proceeds (ver. 3) in the first person singular. Certainly no official character is intended to be given by it, as Huther, al., have thought: for of all the Epistles, this is the least official: and those to the Romans and Galatians, where no such mention occurs, the most so. Observe, there is no ἀπόστολος subjoined to Παῦλος (as in Col. i. 1), probably because the Philippians needed no such reminiscence of his authority. Cf. also 1 and 2 Thess.

On δοῦλοι χρ. Ἰησ., see Ellicott.

πᾶσιν] both here and in vv. 4, 7, 8, 25; ch. ii. 17, 26, is best accounted for from the warm affection which breathes through this whole Epistle (see on ver. 3), not from any formal reason, as that the Apostle wishes to put those Philippians who had not sent to his support, on a level in his affection with those who had (Van Hengel),—that he wishes to set himself above all their party divisions (ch. ii. 3: so De W.), &c.

σὺν ἐπισκ.] This is read by Chrys. συνεπισκόποις, and he remarks: τί τοῦτο; μιᾶς πόλεως πολλοὶ ἐπίσκοποι ἦσαν; οὐδαμῶς· ἀλλὰ τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους οὕτως ἐκάλεσε. ὁπότε γὰρ τέως ἐκοινώνουν τοῖς ὀνόμασι, κ. διάκονος ὁ ἐπίσκοπος ἐλέγετο (see also var. readd.). But thus the construction would be imperfect, the σύν having no reference. Theodoret remarks, ἐπισκόπους τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους καλεῖ· ἀμφότερα γὰρ εἶχον κατ' ἐκεῖνον τὸν καιρὸν ὀνόματα,—and alleges Acts xx. 28, Tit. i. 5, 7, as shewing the same. See on the whole subject, my note on Acts xx. 17, and the article Bischof, by Jacobson, in Herzog's Realencyclopädie für protestantische Theologie u. Kirche.

κ. διακόνοις] See on Rom. xii. 7; xvi. 1. Chrys. enquires why he writes here to the κλῆρος as well as to the ἅγιοι, and not in the Epistles to the Romans, or Corinthians, or Ephesians. And he answers it, ὅτι αὐτοὶ καὶ ἀπέστειλαν, κ. ἐκαρποφόρησαν, κ. αὐτοὶ ἔπεμψαν πρὸς αὐτὸν τὸν Ἐπαφρόδιτον. But the true reason seems to be, the late date of our Epistle. The ecclesiastical offices were now more plainly distinguished than at the time when the two former of those Epistles were written. That to the Ephesians rests on grounds of its own. The simple juxtaposition of the officers with the members of the Church, and indeed their being placed after those members, shews, as it still seems to me, against Ellicott in loc., the absence of hierarchical views such as those in the Epistles of the apostolic fathers. 2.] See on Rom. i. 7.

3—11.] THANKSGIVING FOR THEIR FELLOWSHIP REGARDING THE GOSPEL (3—5), CONFIDENCE THAT GOD WILL CONTINUE AND PERFECT THE SAME (6—8), AND PRAYER FOR THEIR INCREASE IN HOLINESS UNTO THE DAY OF CHRIST (9—11). 3.] See the similar expressions, Rom. i. 9; 1 Cor. i. 4; Eph. i. 16; Col. i. 3; 1 Thess. i. 2; Philem. 4. ἐπί here with a dative is hardly distinguishable in English from the same preposition with a genitive in Rom. i. 10; Eph. i. 16;—at, or in: the primitive idea of such construction being addition by close adherence: 'my whole remembrance of you is accompanied with thanks to God.' πάσῃ τῇ μνείᾳ must not be rendered as in E. V. (so even Conyb.) 'every remembrance,' but my whole remembrance. The expression comprehends in one all such remembrances: but the article forbids the above rendering: cf. πᾶσα ἡ πόλις, Matt. xxi. 10; also ib. vi. 29; Mark iv. 1; Luke iii. 3: Winer, § 18. 4. Some (Maldon., Bretschn., al.) take ἐπί as assigning the reason for εὐχαριστῶ (as 1 Cor. i. 4), and μνείᾳ ὑμῶν as meaning, 'your remembrance of me,' viz. in sending me sustenance. But this is evidently wrong: for the ground of εὐχαριστῶ follows, ver. 5. μνεία here, remembrance, not 'mention,' which meaning it only gets by ποιεῖσθαι being joined to it, 'to make an act of remembrance,' i. e. to mention, Rom. i. 9; Eph. i. 16; 1 Thess. i. 2; Philem. 4. 4.] πάντοτε—πάσῃ—πάντων—here we have the overflowings of a full heart. Render—always in every prayer of mine making my prayer for you all with joy: not, as in E. V., 'in every prayer of mine for you all making request with joy.' For the second δέησις, having the article, is thereby defined to be the particular request, ὑπὲρ π. ὑμ.—τὸ μετὰ χαρᾶς μεμνῆσθαι σημεῖον τῆς ἐκείνων ἀρετῆς, Thl.; so that the sense is, that every time he prayed, he joyfully offered up that portion of his prayers which was an intercession for them. See Ellic., who defends the other connexion; but has misunderstood my note. 5.] for (ground of the εὐχ., πάντοτε to ποιούμενος having been epexegetical of it) your fellowship (with one another: entire accord, unanimous action: not your fellowship with me, ὅτι κοινωνοί μου γίνεσθε κ. συμμερισταὶ τῶν ἐπὶ τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ πόνων, Thl.: this must have been further specified, by μετ' ἐμοῦ [1 John i. 3] or the like. Still less must we with Estius, Wetst., al. [and nearly so Chrys.], render ἐπὶ τῇ κοινωνίᾳ, pro liberalitate vestra erga me) as regards the Gospel (not 'in the Gospel,' as E. V. and Thdrt., κοινωνίαν δὲ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου τὴν πίστιν ἐκάλεσε: but thus it would be the genitive, and εἰς τὸ εὐ. can hardly be taken as equivalent to it: cf. κοινωνεῖν εἰς, ch. iv. 15. Their mutual accord was for the purposes of the Gospel—i. e. the perfecting, of which he proceeds to treat. "The article τῇ is not repeated after ὑμῶν, because κοινωνία εἰς τὸ εὐ. is conceived as one idea, together." Meyer. Ellic. would understand κοιν. as absolute and abstract, 'fellowship,' not 'contribution:' including, without expressly mentioning, 'that particular manifestation of it which so especially marked the liberal and warm-hearted Christians of Philippi:' and it may well be so, even holding my former interpretation: this was the exhibition of their κοινωνία εἰς τὸ εὐαγγ.) from the first day (of your receiving it) until now. τοῦτο and ἵνα,—τοῦτο introducing the substance of the prayer, ἵνα its aim. See, on ἵνα with προσεύχομαι, note, 1 Cor. xiv. 13: and Ellic. here. ἡ ἀγάπη ὑμ.] not, 'towards me,' as Chrys. (ὅρα πῶς φιλούμενος ἔτι μᾶλλον ἐβούλετο φιλεῖσθαι), Thl., Grot., all.,—nor towards God and Christ (Calov., al.), but either perfectly general, as Ellic., or, 'towards one another:' virtually identical with the κοινωνία of ver. 5. In ἡ ἀγάπη ὑμῶν its existence is recognized; in μᾶλλον καὶ μᾶλλον περισσ., its deficiency is hinted at. ἐν is not to be taken as if ἐπίγνωσις and αἴσθησις were departments of Love, in which it was to increase: but they are rather elements, in whose increase in their characters Love is also, and as a separate thing, to increase: q. d. 'that your love may increase, but not without an increase in ἐπίγνωσις and αἴσθησις.' For by these Love is guarded from being ill-judged and misplaced, which, separate from them, it would be: and accordingly, on the increase of these is all the subsequent stress laid. ἐπίγνωσις is accurate knowledge of moral and practical truth: αἴσθησις, perceptivity of the same, the power of apprehending it: "the contrary of that dulness and inactivity of the αἰσθητήρια τῆς καρδίας (Jer. iv. 19), which brings about moral want of judgment, and indifference" (Meyer). De W. renders it well, moral tact. 10.] Purpose of the increase in knowledge and perceptiveness: with a view to your distinguishing things that are different, and so choosing the good, and refusing the evil. Meyer's objection to this rendering—that the purpose is, not such distinction, but the approval of the good, is, after all, mere trifling: for the former is stated as implying the latter. He would render with Vulg., E. V., Chr. (τὰ διαφέροντα, τουτέστι, τὰ συμφέροντα), Thl., Erasm., Grot., Est., Beng., al., 'approving (or, as Ellic., with Syr., æth., 'proving,' 'bringing to the test') things that are excellent,' which certainly is allowable, such sense of διαφέρω being justified by Matt. x. 31, and τὰ διαφέροντα for præstantiora occurring Xen. Hier. i. 3; Dio Cassius xliv. 25. But the simpler and more usual meaning of both verbs is preferable, and has been adopted by Thdrt. (διακρίσεως, ὥστε εἰδέναι τίνα μὲν καλά, τίνα δὲ κρείττονα, τίνα δὲ παντάπασι τὰ διαφοράν πρὸς ἄλληλα ἔχοντα), Beza, Wolf, all., Wies., De Wette, al. εἰλικρινεῖς] pure:—a double derivation is given for the word: (1) εἵλη, κρίνω: that which is proved in the sunlight,—in which case it would be better written as it is often in our MSS., εἰλ.: and (2) εἶλος (εἰλεῖν, ἴλλειν), κρίνω: that which is proved by rapid shaking, as in sifting. This latter is defended by Stallbaum on Plato, Phæd. p. 66 A, where the word occurs in an ethical sense as here (εἰλικρινεῖ τῇ διανοίᾳ χρώμενος αὐτὸ καθ' αὐτὸ εἰλικρινὲς ἕκαστον ἐπιχειροίη θηρεύειν τῶν ὄντων): see also ib., p. 81 C: and cf. 12—26.] DESCRIPTION OF HIS CONDITION AT ROME: HIS FEELINGS AND HOPES. And first he explains, 12—18.] how his imprisonment had given occasion to many to preach Christ: how some indeed had done this from unworthy motives, but still to his joy that, any-how, Christ was preached. 12.] According to Meyer, the connexion is with ἐπιγνώσει above, whence γινώσκειν is placed first:—q. d., 'and as part of this knowledge, I would have you, &c.' [Ellic. cites this view as mine also, but erroneously.] τὰ κατ' ἐμέ] my affairs (reff.). μᾶλλον] rather (than the contrary): not, 'more now than before,' as Hoelemann, which would be expressed by μᾶλλον ἤδη or νῦν μᾶλλον. προκοπήν] advance (reff.). The word is common in Polyb. and later authors, but is condemned by Phrynichus, ed. Lobeck, p. 85, as unknown to the Attic writers. ἐλήλυθεν] 'evaserunt,' have turned out: so Herod. i. 120, κ. τά γε τῶν ὀνειράτων ἐχόμενα, τίλεως ἐς ἀσθενὲς ἔρχεται. 13.] so that (effect of this εἰς προκ. ἐληλυθέναι) my bonds (the fact of my imprisonment) have become manifest in Christ (φανερ. ἐν χριστῷ is to be taken together. They became known, not as a matter simply of notoriety, but of notoriety in Christ, i. e. in connexion with Christ's cause,—as endured for Christ's sake;—and thus the Gospel was furthered) in the whole prætorium (i. e. the barrack of the prætorian guards attached to the palatium of Nero [Dio liii. 16, καλεῖται δὲ τὰ βασίλεια παλάτιον . . . ὅτι ἔν τε τῷ Παλατίῳ (monte Palatino) ὁ Καῖσαρ ᾤκει, καὶ ἐκεῖ τὸ στρατήγιον εἶχε. See Wieseler's note, ii. 403 f.]: not the camp of the same outside the city ['castra prætorianorum,' Tac. Hist. i. 31: Suet. Tiber. 37]. That this was so, is shewn by the greeting sent ch. iv. 22 from οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας, who would hardly have been mentioned in the other case. The word 'prætorium' is also used of castles or palaces belonging to Cæsar [Suet. Aug. 72, Tiber. 39, Calig. 37, Tit. 8], or to foreign princes [Acts xxiii. 35, Juv. x. 161], or even to private persons [Juv. i. 75]: it cannot be shewn ever to have signified the palatium at Rome, but the above meanings approach so nearly to this, that it seems to me no serious objection can be taken to it. The fact here mentioned may be traced to St. Paul being guarded by a prætorian soldier, and having full liberty of preaching the Gospel [Acts xxviii. 30 f.]: but more probably his situation had been changed since then,—see Prolegg. to this Epistle, § iii. 6. I should now say that the ὅλῳ, and the τοῖς λοιποῖς πᾶσιν, make it more probable that the prætorium is to be taken in the larger acceptation,—the quadrangular camp now forming part of Aurelian's city walls,—including also the smaller camp on the Palatine) and to all the rest (a popular hyperbole:—i. e., to others, besides those in the prætorium: not to be taken [Chr., Thdrt., E. V.] as governed by ἐν and signifying, 'in all other places.' The matter of fact interpretation would be, that the soldiers, and those who visited him, carried the fame of his being bound for Christ over all Rome),

a meaning can be dogmatically objectionable, I am wholly unable to see. Surely, that intercessory prayer should attain its object, and the supply take place in consequence of the prayer, is only in accord with the simplest idea of any reality in such prayer at all. Then again, is τοῦ πνεύματος a subjective genitive, 'supply which the Spirit gives,'—so Thdrt. [τοῦ θείου μοι πν. χορηγοῦντος τὴν χάριν], Calv., De W., Meyer, all.:—or objective, the Spirit being that which is supplied [so Chrys., Thl., Œc., Grot., Beng., al.] ? Decidedly, I think, the latter, on account [1] of St. Paul's own usage of ἐπιχορηγεῖν with this very word πνεῦμα in Gal. iii. 5, which is quite in point here, and [2] perhaps also, but see Ellic., of the arrangement of the words, which in the case of a subjective genitive would have been κ. τοῦ πν. Ἰ. χ. ἐπιχορηγίας, as in Eph. iv. 16, διὰ πάσης ἁφῆς τῆς ἐπιχορηγίας.—By a delicate touch at the same time of personal humility and loving appreciation of their spiritual eminence and value to him, he rests the advancement of his own salvation, on the supply of the Holy Spirit won for him by their prayers), 20.] according to (for it is 'our confidence, which hath great recompense of reward,' Heb. x. 35 f.) my expectation (not, 'earnest expectation,' which never seems to be the sense of ἀπό in composition: still less is ἀπό superfluous: but καραδοκεῖν signifies to 'attend,' 'look out'—[παρὰ τὴν κάραν ὅλην δοκεῖν ('observare'), Thl. ad loc.]; and ἀπό adds the signification of 'from a particular position,' or better still that of exhaustion, 'look out until it be fulfilled,'—as in 'exspectare,' ἀπεκδέχομαι, ἀπέχω, &c. See the word thoroughly discussed in the Fritzschiorum Opuscula, p. 150 ff.) and hope that (Est., al., take ὅτι argumentatively, because: but thus the expectation and hope will have no explanation, and the flow of the sentence will be broken) in nothing (in no point, no particular, see ref. It should be kept quite indefinite, not specified as Chrys. [κἂν ὁτιοῦν γένηται]. 'In none' [of those to whom the Gospel is preached], as Hoelemann, is beside the purpose—no persons are adduced, but only the most general considerations) I shall be ashamed (general: have reason to take shame for my work for God, or His work in me), but (on the contrary: but perhaps after the ἐν οὐδενί this need not be pressed) in all (as contrasted with ἐν οὐδενί above) boldness (contrast to shame:—boldness on my part, seeing that life or death are both alike glorious for me—and thus I, my body, the passive instrument in which Christ is glorified, shall any-how be bold and of good cheer in this His glorification of Himself in me) as always, now also (that I am in the situation described above, ver. 17) Christ shall be magnified (δεικθήσεται ὅτι ἐστι, Thdrt.: by His Kingdom being spread among men. So Ellicott, saying rightly that it is more than 'praised,' as in my earlier editions) in my body (my body being the subject of life or death,—in the occurrence of either of which he would not be ashamed, the one bringing active service for Christ, the other union with Him in heaven, ver. 21 ff.), either by (means of) life or by (means of) death.

21.] For (justification of the preceding expectation and hope, in either event) to me (emphatic) to live (continue in life, present), (is) Christ (see especially Gal. ii. 20. All my life, all my energy, all my time, is His—I live Christ. That this is the meaning, is clear, from the corresponding clause and the context. But many have taken χριστός for the subject, and τὸ ζῆν for the predicate, and others [as Chrys.] have understood τὸ ζῆν in the sense of higher spiritual life. Others again, as Calvin, Beza, &c., have rendered, 'mihi enim vivendo Christus est et moriendo lucrum,' understanding before τὸ ζ. and τὸ ἀπ., κατά or the like), and to die ('to have died,' aorist; the act of living is to him Christ; but it is the state after death, not the act of dying, which is gain to him [the explanation of the two infinitives given here does not at all affect their purely substantival character, which Ellic. defends as against me: τὸ ζῆν is life and τὸ ἀποθανεῖν is death: but we must not any the more for that lose sight of the tenses and their meaning. τὸ ἀποθνήσκειν would be equally substantival, but would mean a totally different thing]) (is) gain. This last word has surprised some Commentators, expecting a repetition of χριστός, or something at all events higher than mere κέρδος. But it is to be explained by the foregoing context. 'Even if my death should be the result of my enemies' machinations, it will be no αἰσχύνη to me, but gain, and my παῤῥησία is secured even for that event.'

22.] But if (the syllogistic, not the hypothetical 'if:' assuming that it is so) the continuing to live in the flesh (epexegesis of τὸ ζῆν above), this very thing (τοῦτο directs attention to the antecedent as the principal or only subject of that which is to be asserted: this very ζῆν which I am undervaluing is) is to me the fruit of my work (i. e. that in which the fruit of my apostolic ministry will be involved,—the condition of that fruit being brought forth), then (this use of καί to introduce an apodosis is abundantly justified: cf. Simonides, fragm. Danae, εἰ δέ τοι δεινὸν τόγε δεινὸν ἦν, καί κεν ἐμῶν ῥημάτων λεπτὸν ὑπεῖχες οὖας: Hom. Il. ε. 897, εἰ δέ τευ ἐξ ἄλλου γε θεῶν γένευ ὅδ' ἀϊδηλος, καί κεν δὴ πάλαι ἦσθα ἐνέρτερος οὐρανιώνων: Od. ξ. 112, αὐτὰρ ἐπεὶ δείπνησε κ. ἤραρε θυμὸν ἐδωδῇ, καί οἱ πλησάμενος δῶκε σκύφον, ᾧπερ ἔπινεν. And the construction is imitated by Virg. Georg. i. 200, 'si brachia forte remisit, Atque illum præceps prono rapit alveus amni.' See Hartung, Partikell. i. 130, where more examples are given. The primary sense is 'also,' introducing a new feature—for whereas he had before said that death was gain to him, he now says, but, if life in the flesh is to be the fruit of my ministry, then [I must add,—this besides, arises—], &c.) what (i. e. which of the two) I shall choose (for myself) I know not. The above rendering is in the main that of Chr., Thdrt., Œc., Thl., Erasm., Luth., Calv., all., Meyer, De Wette,—and as it appears to me, the only one which will suit the construction and sense. Beza's 'an vero vivere in carne mihi operæ pretium sit et quid eligam ignoro,' adopted [except in his omission of the τοῦτο and his rendering of καρπὸς ἔργου by 'operæ pretium'] by Conyb., is open to several objections: (1) the harshness of attaching to οὐ γνωρίζω the two clauses εἰ . . . ., and τί . . . .: (2) the doubtfulness of such a construction at all as οὐ γνωρίζω, εἰ . . . . . (3) the extreme clumsiness of the sentence when constructed, "whether this life in the flesh shall be the fruit of my labour, and what I shall choose, I know not" (Conyb.): (4) in this last rendering, the lameness of the apodosis in the clause εἰ δὲ [τὸ ζῆν ἐν σαρκὶ τοῦτό] μοι καρπὸς ἔργου, which would certainly, were τοῦτο to be taken with τὸ ζῆν, have been καρπός μοι ἔργου or καρπὸς ἔργου μοι. 23.] But (the contrast is to the decision involved in γνωρίζω) I am perplexed (reff. and Acts xviii. 5 note: held in, kept back from decision, which would be a setting at liberty) by (from the direction of,—kept in on both sides) the two (which have been mentioned, viz. τὸ ζῆν and τὸ ἀποθανεῖν: not, which follow: this is evident by the insignificant position of ἐκ τῶν δύο behind the emphatic verb συνέχομαι, whereas, had the two been the new particulars about to be mentioned, τὸ ἀναλῦσαι and τὸ ἐπιμένειν,

27—II. 18.] EXHORTATIONS TO UNITED FIRMNESS, TO MUTUAL CONCORD, TO HUMILITY; AND IN GENERAL TO EARNESTNESS IN RELIGION. 27.] μόνον,—i. e. I have but this to ask of you, in the prospect of my return:—see reff.

πολιτεύεσθε] The πολίτευμα being the heavenly state, of which you are citizens, ch. iii. 20. The expression is found in Jos. (Antt. iii. 5. 8) and in Philo, and is very common in the fathers: e. g. Ps-Ignat. Trall. 9, p. 789, ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, κ. ἐπολιτεύσατο ἄνευ ἁμαρτίας,—Cyr. Jer. Catech. Illum. iv. 1, p. 51, ἰσάγγελον βίον πολιτεύεσθαι. See Suicer in voc. The emphasis is on ἀξίως τ. εὐ. τοῦ χρ.

ἵνα εἴτε κ.τ.λ.] This clause is loosely constructed,—the verb ἀκούσω belonging properly only to the second alternative, εἴτε ἀπών, but here following on both. Meyer tries to meet this by understanding ἀκούσω in the former case, 'hear from your own mouth:' but obviously, ἰδών is the real correlative to ἀκούσω, only constructed in a loose manner: the full construction would be something of this kind, ἵνα, εἴτε ἐλθὼν κ. ἰδὼν ὑμᾶς εἴτε ἀπὼν κ. ἀκούσας τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν, γνῶ ὅτι στήκετε. Then τὰ περὶ ὑμῶν, ὅτι στήκετε is another irregular construction—the article generalizing that which the ὅτι particularizes, as in οἶδά σε, τίς εἰ, and the like.

ἐν ἑνὶ πνεύματι] refers to the unity of spirit in which the various members of the church would be fused and blended in the case of perfect unity: but when Meyer and De W. deny that the Holy Spirit is meant, they forget that this one spirit of Christians united for their common faith would of necessity be the Spirit of God which penetrates and inspires them: cf. Eph. iv. 3, 4. Then, as this Spirit is the highest principle in us,—he includes also the lower portion, the animal soul; μιᾷ ψυχῇ συναθλοῦντες] These words must be taken together, not ψυχῇ taken with στήκετε as in apposition with πνεύματι (Chr., Thl., all.), which would leave συναθλ. without any modal qualification. The ψυχή, receiving on the one hand influence from the spirit, on the other impressions from the outer world, is the sphere of the affections and moral energies, and thus is that in and by which the exertion here spoken of would take place. συναθλοῦντες, either with one another (so Chr., Thdrt., Thl., Œc., all., De W., al.), or with me (so Erasm., Luth., Beza, Bengel, al., Meyer). The former is I think preferable, both on account of the ἐν πν. and μιᾷ ψυχῇ, which naturally prepare the mind for an united effort, and because his own share in the contest which comes in as a new element in ver. 30, and which Meyer adduces as a reason for his view, seems to me, on that view, superfluous; ἐμοί after συναθλοῦντες (cf. ch. iv. 3) would have expressed the whole. I would render then as E. V., striving together. τῇ πίστει is a 'dativus commodi'—for the faith, cf. Jude 3—not, as Erasm. Paraphr., 'with the faith,' 'adjuvantes decertantem adversus impios evangelii fidem:' for such a personification of πίστις would be without example: nor is it a dative of the instrument (Beza, Calv., Grot., al.), which we have already had in ψυχῇ, and which could hardly be with τοῦ εὐαγ. added. 28.] πτύρω, akin to πτοέω, πτόησσω, πτήσσω, to frighten, especially said of animals (ref.), but often also used figuratively, e. g. by Plato, Axioch. p. 370 A, οὐκ ἂν ποτε πτυρείης τὸν θάνατον: Ps-Clem. Hom. ii. 39, p. 71, πτύραντες τοὺς ἀμαθεῖς ὄχλους.

The ἀντικείμενοι, from the comparison which follows with his own conflict, and the ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ πάσχειν, must be the adversaries of the faith, whether Jews or Alex. (Strom. iv. 13, vol. i. p. 614 P.), Chrys., Thdrt., al.], but simply to ἔνδειξις: the sign is one from God) from God,—because (proof that the sign is from God, in that He has granted to you the double proof of His favour, not only, &c.) to you (first emphasis) it was granted (second emphasis—'gratiæ munus, signum salutis (?) est.' Beng. The aorist refers to the fact in the dealings of God regarded as a historical whole), on behalf of Christ (the Apostle seems to have intended immediately to add πάσχειν, but, the οὐ μόνον κ.τ.λ. coming between, he drops τὸ ὑπὲρ χριστοῦ for the present, and takes it up again by and by with ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ. The rendering of τὸ ὑπ. χ., absolute, 'to you it is given in the behalf of Christ' (E.V.), 'quod attinet ad Christi causam,' is manifestly wrong), not only to believe on Him, but also on his behalf to suffer, 30.] having (the nominative instead of the dative, the subjective ὑμεῖς being before the Apostle's mind: so Eph. iv. 2,—Thuc. iii. 36, ἔδοξεν αὐτοῖς . . . . ἐπικαλοῦντες: ib. vi. 24, καὶ ἔρως ἐνέπεσε πᾶσιν . . . . εὐέλπιδες ὄντες: Sallust, Jug. 112, 'populo Romano melius visum . . . . rati:' see other examples in Kühner, ii. p. 377. This is far better than with Lachm., al., to parenthesize ἥτις . . . . πάσχειν, which unnecessarily breaks the flow of the sentence) the same conflict (one in its nature and object) as ye saw (viz. when I was with you, Acts xvi. 16 ff.) in me (in my case as its example); and now hear of in me (ἐν ἐμοί, as before, not 'de me.' He means, by report of others, and by this Epistle). II. 1—11.] Exhortation to unity and humility (1—4), after the example of Christ (5—11).

1.] He introduces in the fervour of his affection (ὅρα πῶς λιταρῶς, πῶς σφοδρῶς, πῶς μετὰ συμπαθείας πολλῆς, Chr.) four great points of the Christian life and ministry, and by them enforces his exhortation. Mey. observes, that the four fall into two pairs, in each of which we have first the objective principle of Christian life (ἐν χριστῷ and πνεύματος), and next the subjective principle (ἀγάπης and σπλάγχ. κ. οἰκτιρμοί). And thus the awakening of motives by these four points is at the same time (so Chrys. above) powerful and touching. παράκλησις] here, exhortation, not 'comfort,' which follows in παραμύθιον. ἐν χριστῷ specifies the element of the exhortation. παραμύθ.] better comfort, than 'persuasion:' it corresponds (see above) to σπλ. κ. οἰκτιρ. in the other pair: see also reff. παραμυθία, the ear-

The MSS. evidence in favour of the reading εἴ τις is overwhelming; and in Tischendorf's language, "nobis servandum erit τις, nisi malumus grammatici quam editoris partes agere." It is in its favour, that almost all the great MSS. have εἴ τι before παραμύθιον. For if εἴ τις had been a mere mechanical repetition of the preceding, why not in one place as well as in the other? And if this were once so, and the former τις got altered back to its proper form, why not this also? The construction may be justified perhaps as analogous to ὄχλου . . . ἐχόντων, Mark viii. 1; see also Luke ii. 17; vii. 49: though, it must be confessed, it is the harshest example of its kind.

I may remark, that the exhortation being addressed to the Philippians, the εἴ τις and εἴ τι are to be taken subjectively—If there be with you any &c. 2.] πληρώσατε has the emphasis—'he already had joy in them, but it was not complete, because they did not walk in perfect unity:' cf. ch. i. 9. ἵνα, of the purpose, as always—but here as frequently, of a correlative result, contemplated as the purpose: never, however, without reason: e.g., here the unanimity of the Philippians is the far greater and more important result, to which the πληροῦν μου τὴν χ. is but accessory. τὸ αὐτὸ φρονῆτε] This expression (be of the same mind) is more general than τὸ ἓν φρονοῦντες ('being of one mind') below. And this is all that can be reasonably said of the difference between them. In the more fervid portions of such an Epistle as this, we must be prepared for something very nearly approaching to tautology. βαβαί, says Chrys., ποσάκις τὸ αὐτὸ λέγει ἀπὸ διαθέσεως πολλῆς. τ. αὐτὴν ἀγάπ. ἔχοντες] τουτέστιν, ὁμοίως καὶ φιλεῖν κ. φιλεῖσθαι, Chrys. σύμψ. τ. ἓν φρ.] to be taken together as one designation only: σύμψ. having the emphasis, and defining the τὸ ἓν φρ., with union of soul, unanimous (minding one thing). We may observe, (1) that ἁρπαγμόν holds the emphatic place in the sentence: (2) that this fact casts τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ into the shade, as secondary in the sentence, and as referring to the state indicated by ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων above: (3) that ἁρπαγμός strictly means, as here given, the act of seizing or snatching [so in the only place in profane writers where it occurs, viz. Plut. de Puerorum educ. p. 120 A, καὶ τοὺς μὲν Θήβησι κ. τοὺς Ἡλιδὶ φευκτέον ἔρωτας, κ. τὸν ἐκ Κρήτης καλούμενον ἁρπαγμόν. One thing must also be remembered,—that in the word, the leading idea is not 'snatching from another,' but 'snatching, grasping, for one's self:'—it answers to τὰ ἑαυτῶν σκοποῦντες above], not [ἅρπαγμα] the thing so seized or snatched: but that here, τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ, i. e. a state, being in apposition with it, the difference between the act [subjective] and the thing [objective] would logically be very small: (4) that τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ is no new thing, which He thought it not robbery to be, i. e. to take upon Him,—but His state already existing, respecting which He οὐχ ἡγήσατο &c.: (5) that this clause, being opposed by ἀλλά to His great act of self-denial, cannot be a mere secondary one, conveying an additional detail of His Majesty in His præ-existent state, but must carry the whole weight of the negation of selfishness on His part: (6) that this last view is confirmed by the ἡγήσατο, taking up and corresponding to ἡγούμενοι above, ver. 3. (7) Other renderings have been:—(a) of those who hold τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ, as above to be virtually identical with ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχειν before,—Chrys. says, ὁ τοῦ θεοῦ υἱὸς οὐκ ἐφοβήθη καταβῆναι ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀξιώματος. οὐ γὰρ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο τὴν θεότητα, οὐκ ἐδεδοίκει μή τις αὐτὸν ἀφέληται τὴν φύσιν ἢ τὸ ἀξίωμα. διὸ καὶ ἀπέθετο αὐτό, θαῤῥῶν ὅτι αὐτὸ ἀναλήψεται· καὶ ἔκρυψεν, ἡγούμενος οὐδὲν ἐλαττοῦσθαι ἀπὸ τούτου. διὰ τοῦτο οὐκ εἶπεν οὐχ ἥρπασεν, ἀλλὰ οὐχ ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσατο, ὅτι οὐχ ἁρπάσας εἶχε τὴν ἀρχήν, ἀλλὰ φυσικήν, οὐ δεδομένην, ἀλλὰ μόνιμον κ. ἀσφαλῆ. And so in the main, Œc., Thl., Aug.:—Beza, "non ignoravit, se in ea re (quod Deo patri coequalis esset) nullam injuriam cuiquam facere, sed suo jure uti: nihilominus tamen quasi jure suo cessit"—and so Calvin, but wrongly maintaining for ἡγήσατο a subjunctive sense: 'non fuisset arbitratus:' Thdrt., θεὸς γὰρ ὤν, κ. φύσει θεός, κ. τὴν πρὸς τὸν πατέρα ἰσότητα ἔχων, οὐ μέγα τοῦτο ὑπέλαβε. τοῦτο γὰρ ἴδιον τῶν παρ' ἀξίαν τιμῆς τινος τετυχηκότων. ἀλλὰ τὴν ἀξίαν κατακρύψας, τὴν ἄκραν ταπεινοφροσύνην εἵλετο, κ. τὴν ἀνθρωπείαν ὑπέδυ μορφήν: and so, nearly, Ambr., Castal., all.; — Luther, Erasm., Grot., Calov., all.,—'He did not as a victor his spoils, make an exhibition of &c., but' . . . . (β) of those who distinguish τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ from ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχειν: Bengel,—'Christus, quum posset esse pariter Deo, non arripuit, non duxit rapinam, non subito usus est illa facultate:' De Wette, 'Christ had, when He began His Messianic course, the glory of the godhead potentially in Himself, and might have devoted Himself to manifesting it forth in His life: but seeing that it lay not in the purpose of the work of Redemption that He should at the commencement of it have taken to Himself divine honour, had He done so, the assumption of it would have been an act of robbery:'—Lünemann [in Meyer]: 'Christus, etsi ab æterno inde dignitate creatoris et domini rerum omnium frueretur, ideoque divina indutus magnificentia coram patre consideret, nihilo tamen minus haud arripiendum sibi esse autumabat existendi modum cum Deo æqualem, sed ultro se exinanivit.' And in fact Arius [and his party] had led the way in this explanation: ὅτι θεὸς ὢν ἐλάττων οὐχ ἥρπασε τὸ εἶναι ἴσα τῷ θεῷ τῷ μεγάλῳ καὶ μείζονι. See this triumphantly answered in Chrys. Hom. vi. in loc. Indeed the whole of this method of interpretation is rightly charged with absurdity by Chrys., seeing that in ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων we have already equality with God expressed: εἰ ἦν θεός, πῶς εἶχεν ἁρπάσαι; κ. πῶς οὐκ ἀπερινόητον τοῦτο; τίς γὰρ ἂν εἴποι, ὅτι ὁ δεῖνα, ἄνθρωπος ὤν, οὐχ ἥρπασε τὸ εἶναι ἄνθρωπος; πῶς γὰρ ἄν τις ὅπερ ἐστίν, ἁρπάσειεν; (8) We have now to enquire, whether the opening of the passage will bear to be understood of our Lord already incarnate. De Wette, al., have maintained that the name χριστὸς Ἰησοῦς cannot apply to the λόγος ἄσαρκος. But the answer to this is easy, viz. that that name applies to the entire historical Person of our Lord, of whom the whole passage is said, and not merely to Him in his præ-existent state. That one and the same Person of the Son of God, ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων, afterwards ἐν ὁμοιώματι ἀνθρώπων ἐγένετο, gathering to itself the humanity, in virtue of which He is now designated in the concrete, Christ Jesus. So that the dispute virtually resolves itself into the question between the two lines of interpretation given above,—on which I have already pronounced. But it seems to me to be satisfactorily settled by the contrast between ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπάρχων and μορφὴν δούλου λαβών. These two cannot belong to Christ in the same incarnate state. Therefore the former of them must refer to his præ-incarnate state.

7.] but emptied Himself (ἑαυτόν emphatic, — not ἐκένωσεν ἑαυτόν. ἐκένωσεν, contrast to ἁρπαγμὸν ἡγήσ.— he not only did not enrich himself, but he emptied himself:—He used His equality with God as an opportunity, not for self-exaltation, but for self-abasement. And the word simply and literally means, 'exinanivit' [vulg.], as above. He emptied Himself of the μορφὴ θεοῦ [not His essential glory, but its manifested possession: see on the words above: the glory which He had with the Father before the world began, John xvii. 5, and which He resumed at His glorification]—He ceased while in this state of exinanition, to reflect the glory which He had with the Father. Those who understand ὃς above of the incarnate Saviour, are obliged to explain away this powerful word: thus Calv., 'inanitio hæc eadem est cum humiliatione de qua postea videbimus:' Calov., 'veluti deposuit:' Le Clerc, 'non magis ea usus est, quam si ea destitutus fuisset:' De W., 'the manner and form of the κένωσις is given by the three following participles' [λαβών, γενόμενος, εὑρεθείς]: alii aliter) by taking the form of a servant (specification of the method in which He emptied Himself: not co-ordinate with [as De W., al.] but subordinate to ἐκένωσεν ἑαυτόν.

The participle λαβών does not point to that which has preceded ἑαυτ. ἐκέν., but to a simultaneous act, = as in εὖ γ' ἐποίησας ἀναμνήσας με [Plat. Phæd. p. 60 D], see Bernhardy, Synt. p. 383, and Harless on Eph. i. 13. And so of γενόμενος below. The δούλου is contrasted with 'equality with God'—and imports 'a servant of God,'—not a servant generally, nor a servant of man and God. And this state, of a servant of God, is further defined by what follows), being made (by birth into the world,—'becoming:' but we must not render the general, γενόμενος, by the particular, 'being born') in the likeness of men (cf. ἐν ὁμοιώματι σαρκὸς ἁμαρτίας, Rom. viii. 3. He was not a man, purus putus homo [Mey.], but the Son of God manifest in the flesh and nature of men. On the interpretation impugned above, which makes all these clauses refer to acts of Christ, in our nature, this word ὁμοιώματι loses all meaning. But on the right interpretation, it becomes forcible in giving another subordinate specification to μορφὴν δούλου λαβών — viz. that He was made in like form to men, who are θεοῦ δοῦλοι). 8.] My interpretation has hitherto come very near to that of Meyer. But here I am compelled to differ from him. He would join καὶ σχ. εὑρ. ὡς ἄνθρ. to the foregoing, put a period at ἄνθρ., and begin the next sentence by ἐταπείνωσεν without a copula. The main objection to this with me, is, the word εὑρεθείς. It seems to denote the taking up afresh of the subject, and introducing a new portion of the history. Hitherto of the act of laying aside the form of God, specified to have consisted in μορφὴν δούλου λαβεῖν, and ἐν ὁμ. ἀνθρώπων γενέσθαι. But now we take Him up again, this having past; we find Him in his human appearance — and what then? we have further acts of self-humiliation to relate. So Van Hengel: "duo enim, ut puto, diversa hic tradit Paulus, et quamnam vivendi rationem Christus inierit, ... et quomodo hanc vivendi rationem ad mortem usque persecutus sit." And when He was (having been) found in having (guise, outward semblance; e. g. of look, and dress, and speech. σχήματι is a more specific repetition of ὁμοιώμ. above: and is here emphatic: 'being found in habit, &c. He did not stop with this outward semblance, but . . . .') as a man (for He was not a man, but God [in Person], with the humanity taken on Him: ὡς ἄνθρωπος — ἡ γὰρ ἀναληφθεῖσα φύσις τοῦτο ἦν· αὐτὸς δὲ τοῦτο οὐκ ἦν, τοῦτο δὲ περιέκειτο, Thdrt.) He humbled himself (in His humanity: a further act of self-denial. This time, ἑαυτόν does not precede, because, as Meyer well says,—in ver. 7 the pragmatic weight rested on the reflexive reference of the act, but here on the reflexive act itself) by becoming (see on the aorist participle above. It specifies, wherein the ταπείνωσις consisted) obedient (to God; as before in the δούλου: not 'capientibus se, dam-

9—11.] Exaltation of Jesus, consequent on this His humiliation:—brought forward as an encouragement to follow His example. "Quod autem beati sint quicunque sponte humiliantur cum Christo, probat ejus exemplo: nam a despectissima sorte evectus fuit in summam altitudinem. Quicunque ergo se humiliat, similiter exaltabitur. Quis nunc submissionem recuset, qua in gloriam regni cœlestis conscenditur?" Calvin. Wherefore (i. e. on account of this His self-humiliation and obedience: see Heb. ii. 9, note: not as Calv., 'quo facto,' trying to evade the meritorious obedience of Christ thus, 'quod dictio illativa hic magis consequentiam sonet quam causam, hinc patet, quod alioqui sequetur, hominem divinos honores posse mereri et ipsum Dei thronum acquirere, quod non modo absurdum sed dictu etiam horrendum est:' strangely forgetting that herein Christ was not a man, nor an example what we can do, but the eternal Son of God, lowering Himself to take the nature of men, and in it rendering voluntary and perfect obedience) also (introduces the result, reff. and Luke i. 35; Acts x. 29) God (on His part: reference to the τῷ θεῷ understood after ὑπήκοος above) highly exalted Him (not only ὕψωσεν, but ὑπερύψωσεν; His exaltation being a super-eminent one, cf. ὑπερνικᾶν, Rom. viii. 37, also 2 Cor. xii. 7; 2 Thess. i. 3. Not, 'hath highly exalted:' the reference is to a historical fact, viz. that of His Ascension), and gave to Him (the Father being greater than the incarnate Son, John xiv. 28, and having by His exaltation of Jesus to His throne, freely bestowed on him the kingly office, which is the completion of His Mediatorship, Rom. xiv. 9) the name which is above every name (ὄνομα must be kept, against most Commentators, to its plain sense of NAME,—and not rendered 'glory,' or understood of His office. The name is, the very name which He bore in His humiliation, but which now is the highest and most glorious of all names, τὸ ὄνομα ΙΗΣΟΥ. Compare His own answer in glory, Acts ix. 5, ἐγώ εἰμι Ἰησοῦς, ὃν σὺ διώκεις. As to the construction in the rec., without the τό before ὄνομα, the indefinite ὄνομα is afterwards defined to be that name, which we all know and reverence, by τὸ ὑπὲρ κ.τ.λ. The τό before ὄνομα may have been inserted to assimilate the expression to the more usual one), 10.] that (intent of this exaltation) in the name of Jesus (emphatic, as the ground and element of the act which follows) every knee should bend (i. e. all prayer should be made [not, as E. V., 'at the name of Jesus every knee should bow,'—which surely the words will not bear]. But what prayer? to JESUS, or to GOD THROUGH HIM? The only way to answer this question is to regard the general aim of the passage. This undoubtedly is, the exaltation of Jesus. The εἰς δόξαν θεοῦ πατρός below is no deduction from this, but rather an additional reason why we should carry on the exaltation of Jesus until this new particular is introduced. This would lead us to infer that the universal prayer is to be to JESUS. And this view is confirmed by the next clause, where every tongue is to confess that Jesus Christ is κύριος, when we remember the common expression, ἐπικαλεῖσθαι τὸ ὄνομα κυρίου, for prayer: Rom. x. 12 f.; 1 Cor. i. 2 [2 Tim. ii. 22]; Acts [vii. 59] ix. 14, 21; xxii. 16), of those in heaven (angels. Eph. i. 20, 21. Heb. i. 6) and those on earth (men) and those under the earth (the dead: so Hom. Il. ι. 457, Ζεὺς καταχθόνιος, Pluto; so

12. ὥστε] wherefore—i. e. as a consequence on this pattern set you by Christ. The ὑπηκούσατε answers to γενόμενος ὑπήκοος ver. 8, and σωτηρία to the exaltation of Christ. It is therefore better, with Meyer, to refer ὥστε to that which has just preceded, than with De Wette, Wiesinger, al., to all the foregoing exhortations, ch. i. 27 ff. ὑπηκούσατε] i. e. to God, as Christ above: not as ordinarily, 'to me' or 'my Gospel.' This last De W. grounds on the presence and absence of the Apostle mentioned below: those clauses however do not belong to ὑπηκούσατε, but to κατεργάζεσθε. This is evident by μὴ ὡς and νῦν. In fact it would be hardly possible logically to connect them with ὑπηκούσατε. As it is, they connect admirably with κατεργάζεσθε, see below. ὡς is by no means superfluous, but gives the sense not as if (it were a matter to be done) in my presence only,—but now (as things are at present) much more (with more earnestness) in my absence (because spiritual help from me is withdrawn from you) carry out (bring to an accomplishment) your own (emphasis on ἑαυτῶν, perhaps as directing attention to the example of Christ which has preceded,—as HE obeyed and won HIS exaltation, so do you obey and carry out your own salvation) salvation (which is begun with justification by faith, but must be carried out, brought to an issue, by sanctification of the Spirit—a life of holy obedience and advance to Christian perfection. For this reason, the E. V., 'work out your own salvation,' is bad, because ambiguous, giving the idea that the salvation is a thing to be gotten, brought in and brought about, by ourselves) with fear and trembling (lest you should fail of its accomplishment at the last. The expression indicates a state of anxiety and self-distrust: see reff.—δεῖ γὰρ φοβεῖσθαι κ. τρέμειν ἐν τῷ ἐργάζεσθαι τὴν ἰδίαν σωτηρίαν ἕκαστον, μήποτε ὑποσκελισθεὶς ἐκείσῃ ταύτης. Œc. in Meyer. And the stress of the exhortation is on these words:—considering the immense sacrifice which Christ made for you, and the lofty eminence to which God hath now raised Him, be ye more than ever earnest that you miss not your own share in such salvation. The thought before the Apostle's mind is much the same as that in Heb. ii. 3, πῶς ἡμεῖς ἐκφευξόμεθα τηλικαύτης ἀμελήσαντες σωτηρίας;):

quæ provenit ex Spiritu regenerationis. Nam quatenus sumus homines, jam in Deo sumus, et vivimus, et movemur; verum hic de alio motu disputat, quam illo universali." This working must not be explained away with Pelagius (in Mey.), 'velle operatur suadendo et præmia promittendo:' it is an efficacious working which is here spoken of: God not only brings about the will, but creates the will —we owe both the will to do good, and the power, to His indwelling Spirit.

ἐν ὑμ. not among you, but in you, as in ref. 1 Cor., and 2 Cor. iv. 12; Eph. ii. 2; Col. i. 29. The θέλειν and ἐνεργεῖν are well explained by Calvin: "Fatemur, nos a natura habere voluntatem: sed quoniam peccati corruptione mala est, tunc bona esse incipit, quum reformata est a Deo. Nec dicimus hominem quicquam boni facere, nisi volentem: sed tunc, quum voluntas regitur a Spiritu Dei. Ergo quod ad hanc partem spectat, videmus Deo integram laudem asseri, ac frivolum esse quod sophistæ docent, offerri nobis gratiam et quasi in medio poni, ut eam amplectemur si libeat. Nisi enim efficaciter ageret Deus in nobis, non diceretur efficere bonam voluntatem. De secunda parte idem sentiendum. Deus, inquit, est [δ] ἐνεργῶν ἐνεργεῖν. Perducit igitur ad finem usque pios affectus, quos nobis inspiravit, ne sint irriti: sicut per Ezechielem (xi. 20) promittit: Faciam ut in præceptis meis ambulent. Unde colligimus, perseverantiam quoque merum esse ejus donum." ὑπὲρ τῆς εὐδοκίας] for the sake of His good pleasure,—i. e. in order to carry out that good counsel of His will which He hath purposed towards you: εὐδοκίαν δὲ τὸ ἀγαθὸν τοῦ θεοῦ προσηγόρευσε θέλημα· θέλει δὲ πάντας ἀνθρώπους σωθῆναι, κ. εἰς ἐπίγνωσιν ἀληθείας ἐλθεῖν, Thdrt. Conyb. would join ὑπὲρ τῆς εὐδ. with the following verse, —'do all things for the sake of good will'—and remarks, 'It is strange that so clear and simple a construction, involving no alteration in the text, should not have been before suggested.' But surely St. Paul could not have written thus. The sense of εὐδοκία indeed, would be the same as in ch. i. 15:—but that very passage should have prevented this conjecture. It must have been in that case here as there, δι' εὐδοκίαν, or at all events, ὑπὲρ εὐδοκίας: the insertion of the article where it is generally omitted from abstract nouns after a preposition, as here, necessarily brings in a reflexive sense,—to be referred to the subject of the sentence: and thus we should get a meaning very different from that given by Conyb., viz.: 'Do all things for the sake of (to carry out) your own good pleasure.' It has been proposed (I know not by whom, but it was communicated to me by letter: I see it also noticed in Ellic.'s note, and Van Hengel's refutation of it referred to) to take ἑαυτῶν [ver. 12] as = ἀλλήλων, and render "with fear and trembling labour heartily for one another's salvation;" thus connecting the ὅστις with ver. 4. The suggestion is ingenious, and as far as the mere question of the sense of ἑαυτῶν goes, perhaps allowable; but see Eph. iv. 32; Col. iii. 13, 16; 1 Pet. iv. 8, 10: there are, however, weighty and I conceive fatal objections to it. 1) the emphatic position of ἑαυτῶν, which restricts it to its proper meaning: 2) the occurrence of ἑαυτῶν, in the very verse [4] with which it is sought to connect our passage, in its proper meaning—μὴ τὰ ἑαυτῶν ἕκαστοι σκοπεῖτε, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰ ἑτέρων ἕκαστοι: 3) the context, and inference drawn by ὅστις, which this rendering altogether mistakes: see it explained above. 14 ff.] More detailed exhortations, as to the manner of their Christian energizing. γογγυσμός, in every other place in the N. T. (reff.), as also in ref. Exod., signifies murmuring against men, not against God (as Mey.). And the context here makes it best to keep the same sense: such murmurings arising from selfishness, which is especially discommended to us by the example of Christ. This I still maintain as against Ellic.: his rejection of John vii. 12 and 1 Pet. iv. 9, as not applicable, not seeming to me to be justified. διαλογισμῶν] by the same rule, we should rather understand disputings with men, than doubts respecting God or duty (Mey.). It is objected that the N. T. meaning of διαλογισμός is generally the latter. But this may be doubted (see on 1 Tim. ii. 8); and at all events the verb διαλογίζω, and its cognate διαλέγομαι, must be taken for 'to dispute' in Mark ix. 33, 34. I cannot understand how either word can apply to matters merely internal, seeing that the primary object is stated below to be blamelessness, and good example to others: cf. μέσον γενεᾶς, κ.τ.λ. 15.] ἄμεμπτοι, without blame, ἀκέραιοι, "pure, simplices, vulg æth: sinceres [i], Clarom.: ὁ μὴ κεκραμένος κακοῖς, ἀλλ' ἁπλοῦς καὶ ἀπολέλυπος, Etym. Mag. . . . . For the distinction between ἀκέραιος, ἁπλοῦς, and ἄκακος, see Tittm. Synon. i. p. 27." Ellicott. On τέκνα θεοῦ, see especially Rom. viii. 14, 15. ἄμωμα, blameless: unblamed, and unblameable: Herod. uses it, ii. 177, of a law: τῷ ἐκεῖνοι ἐς αἰεὶ χρέωνται, ἑόντι ἀμώμῳ νόμῳ. The whole clause is a reminiscence of ref. Deut., where we have τέκνα μωμητά, γενεὰ σκολιὰ κ. διεστραμμένη. For the figurative meaning of σκολιός, cf. reff. Acts and 1 Pet., and Plat. Legg. xii. p. 945 B, ἂν τίς τι εἴπῃ σκολιὸν αὐτῶν ἢ πράξῃ,—Gorg. p. 525 A, πάντα σκολιὰ ὑπὸ ψεύδους κ. ἀλαζονείας, κ. οὐδὲν εὐθὺ διὰ τὸ ἄνευ ἀληθείας τεθράφθαι: — and on διεστραμμένη, — διεστρέφετο ὑπὸ κόλακος, Polyb. viii. 24. 3. ἐν οἷς, the masculine referring to those included in γενεά: so Thuc. i. 136, φεύγει—ἐς Κέρκυραν, ὧν αὐτῶν εὐεργέτης. See more examples in Kühner, ii. p. 43. φαίνεσθε, not imperative, as most of the Fathers, Erasm., Calvin, Grot., al., — but indicative, for this is the position of Christians in the world: see Matt. v. 14; Eph. v. 8. So De W., Meyer, Wiesinger, &c. &c. It has been said (Mey., Wies., al.) that we must not render φαίνεσθε 'shine,' which would be φαίνετε: but surely there is but very little difference between 'appear' and 'shine' here, and only St. John and St. Peter use φαίνω for 'to shine,' John i. 5; v. 35; 1 John ii. 8; Rev. i. 16; 2 Pet. i. 19,—not St. Paul, for whom in such a matter their usage is no rule. Ellic. 1) objects that this must not be alleged against the simple meaning of the word, and 2) wishes to give the middle a special use in connexion with the appearance or rising of the heavenly bodies. But we may answer 1) by such examples as δεινοὶ δέ οἱ ὅσσε φάανθεν, where Rost and Palm translate the passive '[leuchteten:' and 2) by urging that such a reference seems here to lay too much pregnancy of meaning on the word. φωστῆρες, not 'lights' merely, but luminaries, 'heavenly bodies:' see ref. Gen.: and Sir. xliii. 7, Wisd. xiii. 2. ἐπέχοντες] probably as E. V. holding forth (hardly, as Ellic., "seeing ye hold forth," but "in that ye hold forth:" the participle being rather explicative than causal) to them, applying to them, which is the one of the commonest meanings of ἐπέχειν,—see reff. Various senses have been given,—e. g. 'holding fast,' Luther, Estius, Bengel, De Wette, al.: 'in vertice tenentes,' Erasm.: 'sustinentes,' Calv.: 'possessing,' Meyer, who quotes for this meaning Herod. i. 104, οἱ δὲ Σκύθαι τὴν Ἀσίαν πᾶσαν ἐπέσχον, and Thuc. ii. 101, ὁ δὲ τήν τε Χαλκιδικὴν κ. Βοττικὴν κ. Μακεδονίαν ἅμα ἐπέχων ἔφθειρε,—neither of which justify it: for in both these places it is 'to occupy,' not 'to possess:' as also in Polyb. iii. 112. 8, εὐχαὶ κ. θυσίαι κ.τ.λ. . . . . ἐπεῖχον τὴν πόλιν. And this sense would manifestly be inapplicable. His objection to the ordinary rendering, that the subjects of the sentence themselves shine by means of the λόγος τῆς ζωῆς, surely is irrelevant: for may not the stars be said 'præbere,' 'prætendere,' their light, notwithstanding that that light is in them? εἰς καύχ. ἐμοί] for (result of your thus walking, as concerns myself) a matter of boasting for me against (temporal: reserved for) the day of Christ, that (ὅτι οὐ μάτην τὴν ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ἀνεδεξάμην σπουδήν, Thdrt.) I did not run (the past tense is from the point of view of that day. On ἔδραμον, see reff.) for nothing, nor labour for nothing (cf. ref. Job).

17, 18.] These verses are closely connected with the preceding; not, as De W., al., with ch. i. 26, which is most unnatural, and never would occur to any reader. The connexion is this: in ver. 16 he had tacitly assumed (εἰς ἡμ. χ.) that he should live to witness their blameless conduct even till the day of Christ. Now, he puts the other alternative—that the dangers which surrounded him would result in his death:—and in that case equally he rejoiced, &c. εἰ καί implies more probability than καὶ εἰ: in the former the case is presupposed, in the latter merely hypothesized. Klotz in Devar. p. 519 f., gives two examples from Xen.'s Anabasis: (1) ὀδοποιήσειέ γ' ἂν αὐτοῖς, καὶ εἰ σὺν τεθριπποις βούλοιντο ἀπιέναι (iii. 2. 24), a supposition evidently thought improbable: (2) ἐγώ, ὦ Κλέανδρε, εἰ καὶ οἴει με ἀδικοῦντά τι ἄγεσθαι (vi. 4. 27), where as evidently the speaker believes that Cleander does entertain the thought. The difference is explained by the common rules of emphasis. In εἰ καί, the stress is on εἰ, which is simply 'posito,' and the 'even' belongs to that which is assumed: in καὶ εἰ, the stress is on καί, even, and the strangeness belongs not to the thing simply assumed, but to the making of the assumption. In the present case then, the Apostle seems rather to believe the supposition which he makes. σπένδομαι] not future, but present; If I am even being poured out, because the danger was besetting him now, and waxing onward to its accomplishment. He uses the word literally, with reference to the shedding of his blood. "He represents his whole apostolic work for the faith of the Philippians, as a sacrifice: if he is put to death in the course of it, he will be, by the shedding of his blood, poured out as a libation upon this sacrifice, as among the Jews (Num. xxviii. 7; xv. 4 ff. Jos. Antt. iii. 9. 4. Winer, RWB., s. v. Trankopfer) and heathens, in their sacrifices, libations of wine were usual, which were poured over the offerings (Hom. Il. λ. 775, σπένδων αἴθοπα οἶνον ἐπ' αἰθομένοις ἱεροῖσιν: cf. also Herod. ii. 39)." Meyer. Wetst., al., would render it 'affundor' (κατασπένδομαι), and understand it of the pouring of wine over a live victim destined for sacrifice—but wrongly. The θυσία is the sacrifice: i.e. the deed of sacrifice, not the victim, the thing sacrificed. λειτουργία, priest's ministration, without another article, signifying therefore the same course of action as that indicated by θυσία, viz. his apostolic labours: see below.

τῆς πίστεως ὑμ., gen. objective; your faith is the sacrifice, which I, as a priest, offer to God. The image is precisely as in Rom. xv. 16, where he is the priest, offering up the Gentiles to God. And the case which he puts is, that he, the priest, should have his own blood poured out at, upon (i. e. in accession to: not locally "upon:" for it was not so among the Jews, see Ellic. here), his sacrificing and presentation to God of their faith. χαίρω] not to be joined with ἐπί, as Chrys., but absolute, I rejoice for myself (οὐχ ὡς ἀποθανούμενος λυποῦμαι ἀλλὰ χαίρω, ὅτι σπουδὴ γίνομαι, Thl.) and congratulate you (so the Vulg. rightly, and all.: not, 'rejoice with you,' as most Commentators [even Ellic.]. Meyer well observes that the following verse is decisive against this: for if they rejoiced already, what need of καὶ ὑμεῖς χαίρετε?—congratulate you, viz. on the fact that I have been thus poured out for your faith, which would be an honour and a boast for you. De W.'s objection, after Van Hengel, that to congratulate would be συγχαίρομαι is futile: cf. Æschin. p. 34, τὴν Ἑστίαν ἐκώμασε τὴν βουλαίαν συγχαίρειν τῇ πόλει ὅτι τοιούτους ἄνδρας ἐπὶ τὴν πρεσβείαν ἐξέπεμψεν: —Demosth. p. 194,—Ῥοδίοις . . . συγχαίρω τῶν γεγενημένων): 18.] and ('but' would be too strong: the contrast is only in the reciprocity) on the same account (accusative of reference, governed by χαίρ.) do ye (imperative, not indicative, as Erasm., al.) rejoice (answer to συγχαίρω above,—for this your honour) and congratulate me (answer to χαίρω above,—on this my joy).

19 — 30.] ADDITIONAL NOTICES RESPECTING THE APOSTLE'S STATE IN HIS IMPRISONMENT: HIS INTENDED MISSION OF TIMOTHEUS AND ACTUAL MISSION OF EPAPHRODITUS. The connexion with the foregoing seems to be,—'and yet this σπένδεσθαι is by no means certain, for I hope to hear news of you soon, nay, to see you myself.' 19. ἐν κυρίῳ] 'my hope is not an idle one, as a worldly man's might be; but one founded on faith in Christ.' 1 Cor. xv. 19, to which Meyer refers, is wholly different: see there. ταχέως, see ver. 23. ὑμῖν] The dative after verbs of sending, &c. need not be regarded (as De W., al., here) as the dativus commodi, but is similar to that case after verbs of giving—indicating the position of the recipient. I stated in some former editions, that it is in no case equivalent to the mere local πρὸς ὑμᾶς. But Ellic. has reminded me, that this is too widely stated, later writers undeniably using it in this sense. See note on Acts xxi. 16, and cf. such examples as πότερον ἡγόμην Ἀβροκόμᾳ, Xen. Eph. iii. 6, and ἤγαγεν αὐτὸν Ἀθανασίῳ τῷ πάππῳ, Epiph. vit. p. 340 d. See the discussion in Winer, § 31. 5. κἀγώ] 'as well as you, by your reception of news concerning me.' εὐψ.] may be of good courage. The verb is unknown to the classics: the imperative εὐψύχει is found in inscriptions on tombs, in the sense of the Latin 'have pia anima.'

20.] Reason why he would send Timotheus above all others: for I have none else like-minded (with myself, not with Timotheus, as Beza, Calv., al.) who (of that kind, who) will really (emphatic: —with no secondary regards for himself, as in ver. 21) care for your affairs (have real anxiety about your matters, to order them for the best): 21.] for all (my present companions) (who these were, we know not: they are characterized, ch. iv. 21, merely as οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ ἀδελφοί—certainly not Luke—whether Demas, in transition between Philem. 24 and 2 Tim. iv. 10, we cannot say) seek their own matters, not those of Jesus Christ (no weakening of the assertion must be thought of, as that of rendering οἱ πάντες, many, or most,—or understanding the assertion, care more about &c. than &c.,—as many Commentators: nor must it be restricted to the love of ease, &c., unwillingness to undertake so long a journey, as Chr., Œc., Thl.: both οἱ πάντες and the assertion are absolute). 23.] But the approved worth (reff.) of him ye know (viz. by trial, when we were at Philippi together, Acts xvi. 1, 3,—xvii. 14),—viz.: that as a son (serves) a father, he served with me for (reff.) the Gospel. The construction is this: the Apostle would have written, 'as a son a father, so he served me,'—but changes it to 'so he served with me,' from modesty and reverence, seeing that we are not servants one of another, but all of God, in the matter of the Gospel. We must not supply σύν before πατρί:—when, in case of several nouns governed by the same preposition, that preposition is omitted before any, it is not before the first, cf. Plat. Rep. iii. p. 414, δεῖ ὡς περὶ μητρὸς κ. τροφοῦ τῆς χώρας ἐν ᾗ εἰσι βουλεύεσθαι: and see Bernhardy, Syntax, p. 205. The examples cited by Ellicott to disprove this, do not seem to me to apply: viz. Æsch. Suppl. 313 [311], Eur. Hel. 872 [863]: both are instances of local terms coupled by καί, and both occur in poetry, where the exigencies of metre come into play. Winer takes the construction as above, edn. 6, § 63, ii. 1: "as a son with a father" being, in the English translation [p. 599], a misrendering of the German, 'wie dem Vater ein Kind,' and of a kind which considerably diminishes one's confidence in the accuracy of the English edition. μέν answers to δέ, ver. 24: οὖν reassumes ver. 19. ὡς ἂν ἀφίδω] as soon as I shall have ascertained. On the force of the preposition, see Heb. xii. 2, note. ὡς ἄν, of time, implying uncertainty as to the event indicated: see reff. and Cebes, tab. p. 168, προστάττει δὲ τοῖς εἰσπορευομένοις, τί δεῖ αὐτοὺς ποιεῖν, ὡς ἂν εἰσέλθωσιν εἰς τὸν βίον. See also Klotz, Devar. pp. 759. 63. The form ἀφίδω is supposed by Meyer to be owing to the pronunciation of ἴδω with the digamma. The word signifies here, see clearly, as in Herod. viii. 37, ἐπεὶ δὲ ἀγχοῦ τε ἔσαν οἱ βάρβαροι ἐπιόντες καὶ ἀτώρητον τὸ ἱρόν . . .: following the analogy of ἀπέχω and similar words: the preposition being not intensive (as Ellic. wrongly reports my view), but exhaustive.

The name was a common one: see Wetst. h. l., and Tacit. Ann. xv. 55; Suet. Domit. 14. There is perhaps no reason for supposing him identical with Epaphras (Col. i. 7; iv. 12. Philem. 23), who was a minister of the Colossian church. We must not attempt to give a strict official meaning to each of the words predicated of Epaphroditus. The accumulation of them serves to give him greater recommendation in the eyes of the Philippians. 25.] συνστρατ. applies to the combat with the powers of darkness, in which the ministers of Christ are the leaders: see besides ref., 2 Tim. ii. 3.

26.] reason for the necessity. The imperfect is, as usual, from the position of the receivers of the letter.

ἀδημ.] See note on ref. Matt. Whether there was any special reason, more than affection, which made Epaphroditus anxious to return on account of this, we cannot say.

27.] καὶ γάρ recognizes and re-asserts that which has before been put as from another, as "ἔλεγες τοίνυν δή, ὅτι κ.τ.λ." "καὶ γὰρ ἔλεγον, ἔγωγε ὀχλῳ." Plat. Gorg. 459: see Hartung, Partikell. i. 137,—for he really was sick.

παραπλήσιον does not involve any ellipsis (De W.) as of ἀφίκετο or the like, but (as Mey.) it stands adverbially as παραπλησίως; so in Polyb. iii. 33. 10, εἰ πεποιήκαμεν παραπλήσιον τοῖς ἀξιοπίστως ψευδομένοις τῶν συγγραφέων: and θανάτῳ is the dative of congruence after it,—sometimes a genitive, as Plat. Soph. p. 217, λόγων ἐκελάβου παραπλησίων ὄν . . . . διερωτῶντες ἐντυγχάνομεν. λύπην ἐπὶ λύπην] for construction, see reff. The dative after ἐπί is more usual: so φόνος ἐπὶ φόνῳ, Eur. Iph. Taur. 197 (189): the accus. giving the sense of accession,—"sorrow coming upon sorrow,"—not, sorrow superimposed upon sorrow. The second λύπην refers to his own distress in his imprisonment, so often implied in this Epistle: see Prolegg. § iii. 4, 5: 'si ad vincula accessisset jactura amici,' Grot. This is better, than with Chrys., al., to refer it to Epaphroditus's sickness,—τὴν ἀπὸ τῆς τελευτῆς ἐπὶ τῇ διὰ τὴν ἀῤῥωστίαν,—which does not agree with ἀλυπότερος, ver. 28, implying that λύπη would remain even after the departure of Epaphroditus.

28.] πάλιν most naturally, considering St. Paul's habit of prefixing it to verbs, belongs to χαρῆτε: and there is here no reason to depart from his usage and attach it to ἰδόντες, as Beza, Grot., De W., all., have done. The κἀγὼ ἀλυπότερος ὦ is one of the Apostle's delicate touches of affection. If they rejoiced in seeing Epaphroditus, his own trouble would be thereby lessened.

29.] οὖν, as accomplishing the purpose just expressed. The stress is on προσδέχεσθε, see ref. There certainly seems to be something behind respecting him, of which we are not informed. If extreme affection had been the sole ground of his ἀδημονεῖν, no such exhortation as this would have been needed. τοὺς τοιούτους] ἵνα μὴ δόξῃ αὐτῷ μόνῳ χαρίζεσθαι, . . . Thl. Then there is an inaccuracy in expression, in reverting back to the [concrete] conduct of Epaphroditus as a reason why οἱ τοιοῦτοι [abstract] should be held in honour.

30.] διὰ τὸ ἔργον, viz. of the Gospel, or of Christ (see the glosses in var. readd.);—part of which it was, to sustain the minister of the Gospel.

doubt whether to read παραβουλ- or παραβολευσάμενος. Both words are unknown to Greek writers. The first verb would signify 'male consulere vitæ,' and is found not unfrequently in the fathers, especially Chrys., which makes it all the more likely to have been introduced here for the other. This latter would be formed from παράβολος, 'venturesome,' as περιπετεύομαι from πέρπερος (1 Cor. xiii. 4), ἀλογεύομαι from ἄλογος (Cic. ad Att. vi. 4): similarly ἀσωτεύομαι, φιλανθρωπεύομαι, πονηρεύομαι, &c. See Lobeck on Phryn. pp. 67, 591. Thus παραβολεύεσθαι would be used exactly as παραβάλλεσθαι in Polyb. ii. 26. 6, ἔφη δεῖν μὴ κινδυνεύειν ὅτι, μηδὲ παραβάλλεσθαι τοῖς ὅλοις, and iii. 94. 4, and παραβάλλεσθαι ταῖς ψυχαῖς in Diod. Sic. iii. 16. Phryn. (p. 238, ed. Lob.) says, παραβόλιον· ἀδόκιμον τοῦτο. τῷ μὲν οὖν ὀνόματι οὐ χρῶνται οἱ παλαιοί, τῷ δὲ ῥήματι. φασὶ γὰρ οὕτω, παραβάλλομαι τῇ ἐμαυτοῦ κεφαλῇ. ἐχρῆν οὖν κἀπὶ τούτων λέγειν, παραβάλλομαι ἀργυρίῳ. Hence also nurses of the sick were called parabolani. See various patristic interpretations, and illustrations, in Tischendorf and Wetstein. ἵνα κ.τ.λ.] that he might fill up (1 Cor. xvi. 17) your deficiency (viz. on account of your absence) in the ministration to me (the λειτουργία was the contribution of money, which had been sent by Epaphroditus. The only ὑστέρημα in this kind service was, their inability through absence, to minister it to the Apostle themselves: and this Epaphroditus filled up, and in so doing risked his life in the way above hinted at, i. e. probably by too constant and watchful attendance on the Apostle. So that there is no blame conveyed by τὸ ὑμ. ὑστέρημα, as Chr., ὅπερ ἐχρῆν πάντας ποιῆσαι, τοῦτο ἔπραξεν αὐτός,—but the whole is a delicate way of enhancing Epaphroditus's services—'that which you would have done if you could, he did for you—therefore receive him with all joy').

Ch. III. 1—IV. 1.] Warning against certain Judaizers,—enforced by his own example (1—16): also against immoral persons (17—iv. 1).

1.] He appears to have been closing his Epistle (τὸ λοιπόν, and reff.), but to have again gone off, on the vehement mention of the Judaizers, into an explanation of his strong term κατατομή. Chrys., al., find a connexion with the foregoing, but it is far-fetched (ἔχετε Ἐπαφρ., δι' ὃν ἤλγειτε, ἔχετε Τιμόθ., ἔρχομαι κἀγώ. τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἐπιδίδωσι· τί ὑμῖν λείπει λοιπόν;): the sense is evidently closed with ch. iii. 30.

τὰ αὐτά] It seems to me that Wiesinger has rightly apprehended the reference of this somewhat difficult sentence. The χαίρετε ἐν κυρίῳ, taken up again by the οὕτως στήκετε ἐν κυρίῳ, ch. iv. 1, is evidently put here emphatically, with direct reference to the warning which follows—let your joy (your boast) be in the Lord. And this same exhortation, χαίρειν, is in fact the ground-tone of the whole Epistle. See ch. i. 18, 25; ii. 17; iv. 4, where the πάλιν ἐρῶ seems to refer back again to this saying. So that there is no difficulty in imagining that the Apostle may mean χαίρετε by the τὰ αὐτά. The word ἀσφαλές is no objection to this: because the χαίρ. ἐν κυρ. is in fact an introduction to the warning which follows: a provision, by upholding the antagonist duty, against their falling into deceit. And thus all the speculation, whether τὰ αὐτά refer to a lost Epistle, or to words uttered (γράφειν ?) when he was with them, falls to the ground. And the inference from Polycarp's words in his Epistle to these Philippians, § 3, p. 1008,

The appellation occurs in various references; but in the Jewish usage of it, uncleanness was the prominent idea: see, besides reff., Deut. xxiii. 18; Isa. lvi. 10, 11; Matt. xv. 26, 27. The remark of Chrys. is worth noting in connexion with what follows: οὐκέτι τέκνα Ἰουδαῖοι. ποτὲ οἱ ἐθνικοὶ τοῦτο ἐκαλοῦντο, νῦν δὲ ἐκεῖνοι. But I would not confine it entirely to them, as the next clause certainly generalizes further. τοὺς κακοὺς ἐργάτας] cf. δόλιοι ἐργάται, 2 Cor. xi. 13,—ἐργάτην ἀνεπαίσχυντον, 2 Tim. ii. 15,—ἐργάζονται μὲν γάρ, φησιν, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ κακῷ. By ἐργάτας, he seems to point out persons who actually wrought, and professedly for the Gospel, but who were 'evil workmen,' not mere 'evil-doers.'

τ. κατατομήν] 'gloriosam appellationem περιτομῆς, circumcisionis, vindicat Christianis.' Beng. Observe the (I will not say, circumcision, but mere) concision ('amputation:' who have no true circumcision of heart, but merely the cutting off of the flesh. Mey. quotes from Diog. Laert. vi. 24, of Diogenes the Cynic, τὴν Εὐκλείδου σχολὴν ἔλεγε χολήν, τὴν δὲ Πλάτωνος διατριβὴν κατατριβήν. Cf. Gal. v. 12 note. On the thrice repeated article, Erasmus says, 'indicat, eum de certis quibusdam loqui, quos illi noverint'): 3.] for WE are the περιτομή, the real CIRCUMCISION (whether bodily circumcised, or not — there would be among them some of both sorts: see Rom. ii. 25, 29; Col. ii. 11), who serve (pay religious service and obedience) by the Spirit of God (cf. John iv. 23, 24. The dative is instrumental, Rom. viii. 13,—expressing the agent, whereby our service is rendered: see Rom. v. 5; viii. 14; xii. 1; Heb. ix. 14. The emphasis is on it: for both profess a λατρεία. The θεοῦ is expressed for solemnity), and glory in (stress on καυχώμενοι,—are not ashamed of Him and seek our boast in circumcision, or the law, but make our boast in Him) Christ Jesus, and trust not in the flesh (stress on ἐν σαρκί—'but, in the Spirit - in our union with Christ').

4.] Although (see Hartung, Partik. i. 340: πίθου γυναικί, καίπερ οὐ στέργων, δμως, Æsch. Theb. 709: προσεκύνησαν, καίπερ εἰδότες, ὅτι ἐπὶ θανάτῳ ἔχοντο, Xen. Anab. i. 6. 10) I (emphatic. There is no ellipsis, but the construction is regular, καίπερ, as in the above examples, having a participle after it: had it been καίπερ ἔχοντες, this would have been universally seen: now, only one of the οὐ πεποιθότες, viz. ἐγώ, is made the exception; but the construction is the same) have (not, 'might have,' as E. V. I have it, but do not choose to make use of it: I have it, in the flesh, but I am still of the number of the οὐ πεποιθότες, in spirit) confidence (not, 'ground of confidence,' as Beza, Calv., Grot., &c.: there is no need to soften the assertion, see above:

nor, with Van Hengel, to understand it of the unconverted state of the Apostle) also (over and above) in the flesh. If any other man thinks (δοκεῖ is certainly, as De W., Wiesinger, al., and reff., of his own judgment of himself, not of other men's judgment of him, as Meyer, al.: for how can other men's judging of the fact of his having confidence be in place here? But it is his own judgment of the existence of the πεποίθησιν ἔχειν which is here in comparison) he has confidence in the flesh, I more: 5.] "predicates of the ἐγώ, justifying the ἐγὼ μᾶλλον," Meyer. He compares himself with them in three particulars: 1. pure Jewish extraction: 2. legal exactitude and position: 3. legal zeal. In circumcision (i. e. 'as regards circumcision:' reff. Many [Erasm., Beng., all.] have taken περιτ. as nominative, and understood it concrete, 'circumcisus,' but wrongly, for the usage applies only collectively, see Winer, edn. 3 [not in edn. 6], § 31. 3), of eight days (Gen. xvii. 12: as distinguished from those who, as proselytes, were circumcised in after life. For usage, see reff.), of the race of Israel (cf. Rom. xi. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 22, οὔτε μὴν ἐκ προσηλύτων γεγέννημαι, ἀλλὰ τὸν Ἰσραὴλ αὐχῶ πρόγονον. Thdrt.), of the tribe of Benjamin (ὅστε τοῦ δοκιμωτέρου μέρους, Chrys.: or perhaps as Calv., merely 'ut moris erat, singulos ex sua tribu censeri'), an Hebrew, of Hebrews (i. e. from Hebrew parents and ancestry [which the word parents was of course meant to imply in my earlier editions: not, as Ellic., to limit the assertion to St. Paul's father and mother] on both sides: ἐντεῦθεν δείκνυσιν ὅτι οὐχὶ προσήλυτος, ἀλλ' ἄνωθεν τῶν εὐδοκίμων Ἰουδαίων. ἐνῆν μὲν γὰρ εἶναι τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, ἀλλ' οὐχ Ἑβραῖον ἐξ Ἑβραίων. πολλοὶ γὰρ καὶ διέφθειρον ἤδη τὸ πρᾶγμα, καὶ τῆς γλώσσης ἦσαν ἀμύητοι, ἑτέροις μεμιγμένοι ἔθνεσιν. Acts xxiii. 6; xxvi. 5), as regards zeal (for the law), a persecutor of the church (of Christ: on the participle, see ref.: Ellic. holds the pres. part. to have an adjectival force, being predicate to a suppressed verb subst.), as regards righteousness which is in (as its element: consists in the keeping of) the law, become blameless (i. e. having carried this righteousness so far as to have become perfect in it, in the sight of men. Calvin well distinguishes between the real and apparent righteousness in the law—the former before God, never possessed by any man: the latter before men, here spoken of by Paul:—'erat ergo hominum judicio sanctus, et immunis ab omni reprehensione. Rara sane laus, et prope singularis: videamus tamen quanti eam fecerit').

Calv.), on whose account (explained by ἵνα . . . . below) I suffered the loss of ALL THINGS (now, emphatic and universal. Or, it may be, "them all," as Ellic.: but this almost involves a tautology; and, besides, τὰ πάντα stands too far from ἅτινα for the τά to be reflexive), and esteem them to be refuse, that I may (by so disesteeming them: ἵνα gives the aim of what went before) gain Christ (not, as the rationalizing Grot., 'Christi favorem:' no indeed, it is Christ Himself,—His perfect image, His glorious perfection, which he wishes to win. He has Him now, but not in full: this can only be when his course is finished, and to this time the next words allude) and be found (now, and especially at His coming,—'evadam:'—not as Calv., 'Paulum renuntiasse omnibus . . . ut recuperaret [ungrammatical] in Christo.' Cf. ref. 2 Cor.) in Him (living and being, and included, in Him as my element), not having (specification of εὑρ. ἐν αὐτῷ,—but not to be joined, as Lachm., al., with ἐν αὐτῷ, which would make this latter superfluous) my own righteousness (see on ver. 6) which is of (arising from) the law, but that which is through (as its medium) the faith of (in) Christ (a construction of this sentence has been suggested to me, which is perhaps possible, and at all events deserves mention. It consists in making ἐμὴν δικαιοσύνην predicative; "not having as my righteousness that righteousness which is of the law, but that which is through faith in Christ"), the righteousness which is of (answering to ἐκ νόμου,—as its source, see Eph. ii. 8) God on my faith (built on, grounded on, granted on condition of, my faith. It is more natural to take ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει with δικαιοσύνην, which it immediately follows, than with Meyer to understand another ἔχων to attach it to. The omission of the article is no objection, but is very frequent, where the whole expression is joined as one idea. Chrys., al., join ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει with τοῦ γνῶναι, as if it were τοῦ ἐπὶ τ. π. γνῶναι, which of course is unallowable: Calv., Grot., Bengel, make the infinitive τοῦ γνῶναι dependent on πίστει ["describit

De W., al., treat τοῦ γν. as parallel with ἵνα κερδήσω, κ.τ.λ. But as Mey. remarks, it is no real parallel, for there is more in ἵνα χρ. κερδήσω &c. than in τοῦ γνῶναι αὐτόν &c. Besides, thus the process of thought is disturbed,—in which, from ἵνα to ἐπὶ τῇ πίστει answers to διὰ τὸν χριστόν above, and from τοῦ γν. to νεκρῶν answers to διὰ τὸ ὑπερέχον τ. γνώσεως αὐτοῦ. Rom. vi. 4; Col. ii. 12),—and the participation of His sufferings (which is the necessitating condition of being brought under the power of His resurrection, see as above, and 2 Tim. ii. 11), being conformed (the nominative is an anacoluthon, belonging to τοῦ γνῶναι, and referring, as often, to the logical subject) to His Death (it does not appear to me that St. Paul is here speaking, as Mey., al., of his imminent risk of a death of martyrdom, but that his meaning is general, applying to his whole course of suffering and self-denial, as indeed throughout the sentence. This conformity with Christ's death was to take place by means of that perfect self-abjuration which he here asserts of himself—see Rom. viii. 29; 2 Cor. ii. 14; iv. 10 ff.; 1 Cor. xv. 31, and especially Gal. ii. 20), if by any means (so Thucyd. ii. 77, πᾶσαν γὰρ ἰδέαν ἐπενόουν, εἴ πως σφίσιν ἄνευ δαπάνης κ. πολιορκίας προσαχθείη: Herod. vi. 52, βουλομένην, εἴ κως ἀμφότεροι γενοίατο βασιλῆες. It is used when an end is proposed, but failure is presumed to be possible: see Hartung, ii. 206; Kühner, ii. 584. ὅμως μετὰ ταῦτα πάντα οὕτως θαῤῥῶ· ὅπερ ἀλλαχοῦ λέγει· ὁ δοκῶν ἑστάναι βλεπέτω μὴ πέσῃ. κ. πάλιν, φοβοῦμαι μή πως ἄλλοις κηρύξας, αὐτὸς ἀδόκιμος γένωμαι. So διώκω absolute in Æsch. Theb. 89, ὄρνυται λαὸς . . . ἐπὶ πόλιν διώκων. This is simpler than to suppose that an object, the βραβεῖον, is in his mind, though not expressed. See Ellic.'s note) if (nearly = εἴ πως above) I may also (besides διώκειν —not as Mey., nicht bloß greife [ἔλαβον], sondern auch ergreife: nor does it answer to the καί following, as De W.) lay hold of (Herod. ix. 58, διωκτέοι εἰσί, ἐς ὃ καταλαμφθέντες . . . . δώσουσι δίκας: Lucian, Hermotim. 77, διώκοντες οὐ κατέλαβον) that for which (this seems the simplest rendering, and has been the usual one. Meyer's rendering of ἐφ' ᾧ 'because,' after Chrys., Thdrt., Thl., requires καταλάβω to be absolute, and would more naturally be expressed ἐφ' ᾧ κἀγὼ κατελήμφθην, the emphatic first person hardly admitting of being supplied from the preceding clause: whereas on our rendering the whole forms but one clause, the first person recurring throughout it. Grot.'s, 'quo ut pervenire possem,' Beza's, &c., 'for which reason,' —all keeping καταλάβω absolute, are not open to the above objection) I was also laid hold of (the καί belongs to the verb, not to ἐγώ understood, nor to the ἐφ' ᾧ, as if there might be other ends for which he was apprehended [Ellic.]: see above—and brings out, that in my case there was another instance of the καταλαβεῖν. For the sense, cf. 1 Cor. xiii. 12, ἐπιγνώσομαι καθὼς καὶ ἐπεγνώσθην: and Plat. Tim. p. 39, τῇ δὴ ταὐτοῦ φορᾷ τὰ τάχιστα περιόντα ὑπὸ τῶν βραδυτέρων ὄντων ἐφαίνετο καταλαμβάνοντα καταλαμβάνεσθαι. The time referred to by the aorist was his conversion: but we need not, as Chrys., al., press the image of the race, and regard him as flying, and overtaken) by Christ. 13.] Emphatic and affectionate re-statement of the same, but not merely so;—he evidently alludes to some whom he wishes to warn by his example. Brethren, I (emphatic: cf. John v. 30; vii. 17; viii. 33; Acts xxvi. 9) do not reckon myself (emphatic) to have laid hold: but one thing (I do: not λογίζομαι, nor διώκω, nor φροντίζω, none of which correspond to the epexegesis following: nor can we say that nothing requires to be supplied [Grot., al.], for even in τοῦτο δέ this would not be so—the sense must have a logical supplement: nor will it do to join ἕν to διώκω [Aug., al.], or to supply ἐστι [Beza]): forgetting the things behind (me, as a runner in the course; by which image, now fully before him, the expressions in this verse must be explained: καὶ γὰρ ὁ δρομεὺς οὐχ ὅσους ἤνυσεν ἀναλογίζεται διαύλους, ἀλλ' ὅσους λείπεται . . . . τί γὰρ ἡμᾶς ὠφελεῖ τὸ ἀνυσθέν, ὅταν τὸ λειπόμενον μὴ προστεθῇ; Chr. Thdrt. explains it περὶ τῶν τοῦ κηρύγματος πόνων: but this seems insufficient), but ever reaching out towards (as the runner whose body is bent forwards in his course; the ἐπί giving the continual addition of exertion in this direction [Mey.] or perhaps merely the direction itself. ὁ γὰρ ἐπεκτεινόμενος, τοῦτ' ἐστιν, ὁ τυὸς πόδας καίτοι τρέχοντας τῷ λοιπῷ σώματι προλαβεῖν σπουδάζων, ἐπεκτείνων ἑαυτὸν εἰς τὸ ἔμπροσθεν, κ. τὰς χεῖρας ἐκτείνων, ἵνα κ. τοῦ δρόμου πλέον τι ἐργάσηται. Chr.) the things before (i. e. the perfection not yet reached), I pursue (on διώκω absolute, see note, ver. 12) towards the goal (the contrary of ἀπὸ σκοποῦ, beside the mark, Plat. Chrys., al., join them with διώκω:—ἐν χ. Ἰ. τοῦτο ποιῶ, φησιν. οὐ γὰρ ἔνι χωρὶς τῆς ἐκείνου βοηθείας τοσοῦτον διελθεῖν διάστημα· πολλῆς δεῖ τῆς βοηθείας, πολλῆς τῆς συμμαχίας. But I own the arrangement of the sentence thus seems to me very unnatural—and the constant practice of St. Paul to join θεός and things said of θεός with ἐν χριστῷ weighs strongly for the other connexion, viz. that with τ. κλήσεως τοῦ θεοῦ. The objection that then τῆς or τοῦ would be required before ἐν, is not valid; the unity of the idea of the κλῆσις ἐν κυρίῳ, 1 Cor. vii. 22, would dispense with it). 15, 16.] Exhortation to them to be unanimous in following this his example. In order to understand this somewhat difficult passage, we must remember (1) that the description of his own views and feelings which he holds up for their imitation (συμμιμηταί μου γίν.) began with having no confidence in the flesh, ver. 4, and has continued to ver. 14. Also (2) that the description commencing with ὅσοι οὖν τέλειοι, is taken up again from ver. 3, ἡμεῖς γάρ ἐσμεν ἡ περιτομή, οἱ πνεύματι θεοῦ λατρεύοντες, κ. καυχώμενοι ἐν χ. Ἰησοῦ, κ. οὐκ ἐν σαρκὶ πεποιθότες. These two considerations will keep us from narrowing too much the τοῦτο φρονῶμεν, and from misunderstanding the ὅσοι οὖν τέλειοι. As many of us then (refers to ver. 3: see above) as are perfect (mature in Christian life, = those described above, ver. 3), let us be of this mind (viz. that described as entertained by himself, vv. 7—14): and if in any thing (accusative of reference: see Kühner, Gramm. ii. 220 ff.) ye be differently minded (for ἑτέρως, cf. Od. α. 232 ff., μέλλεν μέν ποτε οἶκος δὸ' ἀφνειὸς κ. ἀμύμων | ἔμμεναι, ὄφρ' ἔτι κεῖνος ἀνὴρ ἐπιδήμιος ἦεν | νῦν δ' ἑτέρως ἐβάλοντο θεοί, κακὰ μητιόωντες: Demosth. p. 298. 22, εἰ μέν τι τῶν δεόντων ἐπράχθη, τὸν καιρόν, οὐκ ἐμέ φησιν αἴτιον γεγενῆσθαι, τῶν δ' ὡς ἑτέρως συμβάντων ἁπάντων ἐμὲ καὶ τὴν ἐμὴν τύχην αἰτίαν εἶναι. Hence it gives the meaning of diversity in a bad sense. On the elliptic usage of the infinitive for the imperative see Kühner, ii. p. 342, where many examples are given. It appears from these that the usage occurs in the 2nd person only: which determines this to be not 'let us walk,' but 'walk ye'). The exhortation refers to the onward advance of the Christian life—let us go on together, each one in his place and degree of advance, but all in the same path. 17—IV. 1.] Exhortation to follow his example (17): warning against the enemies of the cross of Christ (18, 19): declaration of the high privileges and hopes of Christians (20, 21), and affectionate entreaty to stedfastness (iv. 1). Be imitators together (i. e. with one another: so, and not imitators together with those mentioned below [Mey., Wies.], must the word here be rendered. The latter would be allowable as far as the word is concerned, but the form of the sentence determines for the other. συμμιμηταί μου γίνεσθε forms a complete clause, in which συμμιμηταί has the place of emphasis, and in συμμιμηταί the preposition: it is therefore unallowable to pass on the sense of the συμ. to another clause from which it is separated by καί and another verb. So that instead of καὶ σκοπεῖτε κ.τ.λ. being a reason for this meaning, it is in fact a reason against it) of me, and observe (for imitation: τοὺς εὐτέλειαν μᾶλλον ἢ πολυχρηματίαν σκοποῦντας, Xen. Symp. iv. 42) those who walk in such manner as ye have an example in us. The construction is much controverted. Meyer and Wiesinger would separate οὕτως and καθώς—observe those who thus walk (i. e. as implied above); as ye have (emphatic—ye are not in want of) an example in us (viz. Paul and those who thus walk). My objection to this is, that if οὕτως and καθώς are to be independent —the three verbs γίνεσθε, σκοπεῖτε, ἔχετε, being thus thrown into three independent clauses, will be all correlative, and the ἔχετε τύπον will not apply to οὕτως περιπατοῦντας, but to the foregoing verbs, thus stultifying the sentence: "Be &c., and observe &c., as ye have an example (viz. of being συμμιμηταί μου and of σκοπεῖν τοὺς οὕτως περιπατοῦντας) in us." Besides which, the οὕτως περιπατοῦντας would be (1) very vague as referring back to what went before, seeing that no περιπατεῖν has been specified, whereas (2) it is directly related to what follows, by the πολλοὶ περιπατοῦσιν of ver. 18. I therefore retain the usual rendering. Meyer's objections to it are, (1) that it is ἔχετε, not ἔχουσιν:—but this does not affect the matter: for, the example including in its reference the τοὺς οὕτως περιπατοῦντας and the Philippians, the 2nd person would be more naturally used, the 3rd making a separation which would not be desirable: —(2) that it is ἡμᾶς, not ἐμέ:—but granting that this does not apply to Paul alone, it certainly cannot, as Mey., be meant to include the τοὺς οὕτ. περ. with him, which would be a way of speaking unprecedented in his writings,—but must apply to himself and his fellow-workers, Timotheus, Epaphroditus, &c. Of course the τύπον is no objection (as De W.) to the proper plural sense of ἡμᾶς, for it is used of that wherein they were all united in one category, as in ἡδεῖς τὴν ὄψιν (Plat.), κακοὶ τὴν ψυχήν (Æsch.): see Kühner, ii. 27. 18.] For (reason for σκοπεῖτε κ.τ.λ. in the form of warning against others who walk differently) many walk

'ambulant terrena cogitantes' [ungrammatical: οἱ τὰ ἐπίγ. φρ.]: or to consider the sentence as broken off by the relative clause [De W., al.]; for περιπατοῦσιν is a 'verbum indifferens,' as in ver. 17, τοὺς οὕτως περιπ.) whom I many times (answers to πολλοί) mentioned to you (viz. when I was with you) but now mention even weeping (διὰ τί; ὅτι ἐπέτεινε τὸ κακόν, ὅτι δακρύων ἄξιοι οἱ τοιοῦτοι . . . . κλαίει τοίνυν ὁ Παῦλος ἐφ' οἷς ἕτεροι γελῶσι καὶ σκαταλῶσιν. οὕτως ἐστὶ συμπαθητικός, οὕτω φροντίζει πάντων ἀνθρώπων. Not Judaistic but Epicurean error, not obliquity of creed but of practice, is here stigmatized. And so Chrys.,—ἐπειδή τινες ἦσαν ὑποκρινόμενοι μὲν τὸν χριστιανισμόν, ἐν ἀνέσει δὲ ζῶντες κ. τρυφῇ· τοῦτο δὲ ἐναντίον τῷ σταυρῷ),—of whom perdition (everlasting, at the coming of the Lord: see ch. i. 28) is the (fixed, certain) end; of whom their belly is the god (cf. the boast of the Cyclops, in Eurip. giving the English reader the idea of ζωή, and so misleading him. I may remark, in passing, on the unfortunate misconception of St. Paul's use of the plural, which has marred so many portions of Mr. Conybeare's version of the Epistles, and none more sadly than this,—where he gives the Apostle's noble description of the state and hopes of us Christians, as contrasted with the τὰ ἐπίγ. φρονοῦντες,—all in the singular—'For my life, &c.,—from whence also I look, &c.') subsists (the word is more solemn, as indicating priority and fixedness, than ἐστιν would be: see notes, ch. ii. 6, and Acts xvi. 20) in the heavens, from whence (οὗ does not refer to πολίτευμα, as Beng., al.—nor = ὅν, nor to be rendered 'ex quo tempore,' as Erasm., but ἐξ οὗ is adverbial, 'unde,' see Winer, § 21. 3, and cf. Xen. Anab. i. 2. 20, ἡμέρας τρεῖς, ἐν ᾗ) also (additional particular, following on heaven being our country) we wait for (expect, till the event arrives: see note on Rom. viii. 19, and a dissertation in the Fritzschiorum Opuscula, p. 150 ff.) a Saviour (emphatic: therefore we cannot τὰ ἐπίγ. φρονεῖν, because we are waiting for one to deliver us from them. Or, as Saviour [Ellic.]: but perhaps the other is preferable, as being simpler), (viz.) the Lord Jesus Christ, 21.] (describes the method, in which this Saviour shall save us—a way utterly precluding our making a God of our body) who shall transform (see 1 Cor. xv. 51 ff. The words assume, as St. Paul always does when speaking incidentally, the ἡμεῖς surviving to witness the coming of the Lord. The change from the dust of death in the resurrection, however we may accommodate the expression to it, was not originally contemplated by it; witness the ἀπεκδεχόμεθα, and the σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν. It is quite in vain to attempt to escape from this inference, as Ellicott does, by saying that "every moment of a true Christian's life involves such an ἀπεκδοχήν." This is most true, but in no way accounts for the peculiar expressions used here) the body of our humiliation (beware of the hendiadys, by which most Commentators, and even Conyb. here enervate the Apostle's fine and deep meaning. The body is that object, that material, in which our humiliation has place and is shewn, by its suffering and being degraded—πολλὰ πάσχει νῦν τὸ σῶμα, δεσμεῖται, μαστίζεται, μυρία πάσχει δεινά, Chrys. He once had such a ταπείνωσις, and has passed through it to His glory—and He shall change us so as to be like Him.—Whereas the rendering 'our vile body' sinks all this, and makes the epithet merely refer to that which is common to all humanity by nature. It is besides, perhaps, hardly allowable: for ταπείνωσις cannot—unless the exigency of context require it, as in ref. Luke [not in Prov. xvi. 19],—signify mere 'vileness,' ταπεινότης, but must imply the act whereby the body ταπεινοῦται) (so as to be) conformed to (on this common idiom, εὔφημον, ἃ τάλαινα, κοίμησον στόμα, Æsch. Ag. 1258, al. freq.,—cf. Kühner, ii. 121) the body of His glory (in which, as its object or material, His glory has place and is displayed: see above), according to (after the analogy of) the working of His power also (besides the μετασχήμ. &c. spoken of) to subject to Him all things (the universe: see the exception, 1 Cor. xv. 25—27). ταῦτα δὲ ποιήσει, says Thdrt., ἅτε δὴ δύναμιν ἄῤῥητον ἔχων, κ. ῥᾳδίως κ. τὴν φθορὰν κ. τὸν θάνατον καταπαύων, κ. εἰς ἀθανασίαν τὰ ἡμέτερα σώματα μεταβάλλων, κ. παρασκευάζων ἅπαντας εἰς αὐτὸν ἀποβλέπειν. person, with ἀδελφοί, as here,—there also οὕτως occurs, answering to the οὕτως here, —and there, in the Christian's hopes, vv. 20, 21, lies the ground of the ὅστε here.

ὥστε] 'quæ cum ita sint'—since we have such a home, and look for such a Saviour, and expect such a change:—ὥστε κἂν ὁρᾶτε τούτους χαίροντας, κἂν ὁρᾶτε δεδοξασμένους, στήκετε, Chrys. Cf. 1 Cor. xv. 58. ἐπιπόθ.] longed for. The word occurs in Appian, vi. 43, ὅρκους τε ὤμοσεν αὐτοῖς κ. ἔλαβεν, ἐπιποθήτους ἐν τοῖς ὕστερον πολέμοις πολλάκις γενομένους. For the verb, see ch. i. 8 reff.: for the substantive, -ησις, 2 Cor. vii. 7, 11.

στέφανος] from ref. 1 Thess., both χαρά and στέφανος apply to the future great day in the Apostle's mind. And indeed even without such reference to his usus loquendi, it would be difficult to dissociate the "crown" from such thoughts as that in 2 Tim. iv. 8. οὕτως] see above: 'as I have been describing:' not ὡς ἑστήκατε ἀκλινῶς, as Chrys., Thl., Œc., Calv., Beng., 'ita, ut statis, state,' which would be inconsistent with ch. iii. 17. ἐν κυρίῳ] as the element wherein your stedfastness consists. ἀγαπητοί] an affectionate repetition: μετ' εὐφημίας πολλῆς ἡ παραίνεσις, Thdrt. "Doctrinam suo more vehementioribus exhortationibus claudit, quo eam hominum animis tenacius infigat. Et blandis appellationibus in eorum affectus se insinuat: quæ tamen non sunt adulationis, sed sinceri amoris." Calv. 2—9.] Concluding exhortations to individuals (2, 3), and to all (4—9). 2.] Euodia and Syntyche (both women, cf. αὐταῖς and αἵτινες below) appear to have needed this exhortation on account of some disagreement, both however being faithful, and fellow-workers (perhaps deaconnesses, Rom. xvi. 1) with himself in the Gospel. θαυμάζει μὲν τὰς γυναῖκας· αἰνίττεται δὲ ὡς ἴδιόν τινα πρὸς ἀλλήλας ἐχούσας, Thdrt. The repetition of the verb παρακαλῶ not merely signifies 'vehementiam affectus' (Erasm.), but hints at the present separation between them.

τὸ αὐτὸ φρονεῖν] see ch. ii. 2, note. He adds ἐν κυρίῳ, both to shew them wherein their unanimity must consist, and perhaps to point out to them that their present alienation was not ἐν κυρίῳ.

3.] ναί assumes the granting of the request just made, and carries on further the same matter, see Philem. 20 and note; but does not conjure, as Grot., al. γνήσιε σύνζυγε] true ('genuine:'—true, as distinguished from counterfeit: lit. of legitimate worth [γενήσιος]) yoke-fellow. Who is intended, it is quite impossible to say. Various opinions have been, (1) that St. Paul addresses his own wife. So Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 6 (53), p. 535 P, καὶ δ γε Παῦλος οὐκ ἀκνεῖ ἔν τινι ἐπιστολῇ τὴν αὐτοῦ προσαγορεύειν σύνζυγον, ἣν οὐ περιεκόμιζε διὰ τὸ τῆς ὑπηρεσίας εὐσταλές,—Eus. H. E. iii. 30, al. But this is evidently an error, and Thdrt. says rightly,—τὸν δὲ σύνζ. τινες ἀνοήτως ὑπέλαβον γυναῖκα εἶναι τοῦ ἀποστόλου, οὐ προσεσχηκότες τοῖς ἐν τῇ πρὸς Κορινθίους γεγραμμένοις (1 Cor. vii. 8), ὅτι τοῖς ἀγάμοις συνέταξεν ἑαυτόν. Besides which, the adjective in this case would be feminine,—cf. Eur. Alcest. 326, πολίας τυχοῦσα συνζύγου;—and 354, τοιᾶσδ' ἁμαρτάνοντι συνζύγου: perhaps even if it were of two terminations [as adjectives in -ως frequently in the N.T., e.g. οὐράνιος, Luke ii. 13; Acts xxvi. 19: ὁσίους χεῖρας, 1 Tim. ii. 8, &c. See Winer, § 11. 1], in which case Ellic. remarks, it would revert to three terminations; but authority for this statement seems wanting. (2) that he was the husband, or brother, of Euodia or Syntyche; so Chrys. doubtfully, and Thl., al. But then the epithet would hardly be wanted—nor would the expression be at all natural. (3) that he was some fellow-labourer of the Apostle. So Thdrt.,—σύνζυγον καλεῖ, ὡς τὸν αὐτὸν ἔλκοντα τῆς εὐσεβείας ζυγόν, Pelag., all., and De W.,—and of these some (Grot., Calov., al.) have understood Epaphroditus,—Estius, Timotheus,—Bengel (but afterwards he preferred Epaphroditus), Silas,—Luther, the chief bishop at Philippi. (4) Others have regarded Σύνζυγε as a proper name: so τινές in Chrys. and Œc., and so Meyer. In this case the γνήσιε would mean, 'who art veritably, as thy name is,' a yoke-fellow. And this might be said by the Apostle, who elsewhere compares the Christian minister to the βοῦς ἀλοῶν. It seems to me that we must choose between the two last hypotheses. The objections to each are about of equal weight: the Apostle nowhere else calls his fellow-labourers σύνζυγοι,—and the proper name Σύνζυγος is nowhere else found. But these are no reasons, respectively, against either hypothesis. We may safely say with Chrys., εἴτε τοῦτο, εἴτε ἐκεῖνο, οὐ σφόδρα ἀκριβολογεῖσθαι δεῖ. συνλαμβάνου αὐταῖς] help them (Euodia and Syntyche): but not, as Grot., 'ut habeant, unde se suosque honeste sustentent:' it is the work of their reconciliation which he clearly has in view, and in which they would need help. αἵτινες] 'utpote quæ'—seeing that they .... The E. V. here is in error, 'help those women which ...' The Gospel at Philippi was first received by women, Acts xvi. 13 ff., and these two must have been among those who, having believed, laboured among their own sex for its spread. ἐν τ. εὐαγ.] see reff. μετὰ καὶ Κλήμεντος] These words belong to συνήθλησαν, not to συνλαμβάνου, and are rather an additional reminiscence, than a part of the exhortation 'as did Clemens also &c.' q. d. 'not that I mean, by naming those women with distinction, to imply forgetfulness of those others &c., and especially of Clemens.' The insertion of καί between the preposition and substantive is said to be a habit principally of Pindar,—e. g. ἐν καὶ θαλάσσᾳ, Ol. ii. 28; ἐν καὶ τελευτῇ, Ol. vii. 26: ἐπὶ καὶ θανάτῳ, Pyth. iv. 330. See Hartung, i. 143. It is not necessary to regard the καί—καί as bound together: so that these examples are in point (against Ellic.). Clemens must have been a fellow-worker with the Apostle at Philippi, from the context here; and, from the non-occurrence of any such name among Paul's fellow-travellers, and the fact that οἱ λοιποὶ συνεργοί must have been Philippians,—himself a native of Philippi. It is perhaps arbitrary, seeing that the name is so common, to assume his identity with Clemens afterwards Bishop of Rome, and author of the Epistles to the Corinthians. So Eus. H. E. iii. 4, ὁ Κλήμης, τῆς Ῥωμαίων κ. αὐτὸς ἐκκλησίας τρίτος ἐπίσκοπος καταστάς, Παύλου συνεργὸς κ. συναθλητὴς γεγονέναι πρὸς αὐτοῦ μαρτυρεῖται: see also H. E. v. 6: so Origen, Com. in Joan. t. vi. 36, vol. iv. p. 153: and Jer. Script. Eccl., 15, vol. ii. p. 854. Chrys. does not notice any such idea. See on the whole, Ellicott's note. ὧν τὰ ὀν. ἐν βίβλῳ ζωῆς] belongs to the λοιποί, whom he does not name: whose names are (not a wish, εἴη, as Bengel, nor are they to be regarded as dead when this was written) in the book of life (reff., and Luke x. 20). 4—9. Exhortation to ALL. 4. πάλιν ἐρῶ] AGAIN I will say it: referring to ch. iii. 1, where see note. ἅλον. And he describes the ἐπιεικὴς as ὁ μὴ ἀκριβοδίκαιος ἐπὶ τὸ χεῖρον. See Trench, New Test. Syn., as above.

By the γνωσθήτω πᾶσιν ἀνθρ., the Apostle rather intends, 'let no man know of you any inconsistency with ἐπιείκεια.' The universality of it justifies its application even to those described above, ch. iii. 18 f., —that though warned against them, they were to shew all moderation and clemency towards them: so Chrys. Meyer observes well, that the succession of these precepts seems to explain itself psychologically by the disposition of spiritual joy in the Lord exalting us both above rigorism, and above anxiety of mind (ver. 6). ὁ κύριος ἐγγύς] These words may apply either to the foregoing—'the Lord will soon come, He is the avenger; it is yours to be moderate and clement' (so De Wette, all.): or to the following—'the Lord is near, be not anxious:' so Chrys., Thdrt., all. Perhaps we may best regard it as the transition from the one to the other: Christ's coming is at hand—this is the best enforcer of clemency and forbearance: it also leads on to the duty of banishing anxiety. ὁ κύριος is Christ, and the ἐγγύς refers to the παρουσία; see on ch. iii. 20. 6.] μηδέν has the emphasis. It is the accusative of the object, as τὸ πολλὰ μεριμνᾷν, Xen. Cyr. viii. 7. 12. ἐν παντί] in every thing: see ref. 1 Thess. and note. Meyer remarks that the literally correct rendering of the Vulg. 'in omni (neut.) oratione' led Ambrose wrong, who gives it 'per omnem orationem.' τῇ προσευχῇ καὶ τῇ δεήσει] by your prayer and your supplication: or better, by the prayer and the supplication appropriate to each thing. On the difference between προσευχή and δέησις, see on Eph. vi. 18, 1 Tim. ii. 1. Not μετὰ τῆς εὐχαριστίας, because the matters themselves may not be recognized as grounds of εὐχαριστία, but it should accompany every request. Ellic., who doubts this explanation, thinks it "more simple to say that εὐχαριστία, 'thanksgiving for past blessings,' is in its nature more general and comprehensive, προσ. and δεησ. almost necessarily more limited and specific. Hence, though εὐχαρ. occurs 12 times in St. Paul's Epistles, it is only twice used with the article, 1 Cor. xiv. 26, 2 Cor. iv. 15." But I much prefer the other view. τὰ αἰτήματα] = ὃ ἂν αἰτώμεθα, 1 John v. 15. Plato, Rep. viii. p. 566, speaks of τὸ τυραννικὸν αἴτημα . . . αἰτεῖν τὸν δῆμον φύλακάς τινας τοῦ σώματος. πρὸς τὸν θεόν] unto, 'before,' 'coram:' see Acts viii. 24. 7.] Consequence of this laying every thing before God in prayer with thanksgiving—peace unspeakable. καί, and then. ἡ εἰρ. τοῦ θεοῦ, that peace which rests in God and is wrought by Him in the soul, the counterpoise of all troubles and anxieties—see John xvi. 33—. . . . ἵνα ἐν ἐμοὶ εἰρήνην ἔχητε· ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ θλῖψιν ἔχετε. Meyer denies that εἰρήνη ever has this meaning: but he is certainly wrong. The above verse, and John xiv. 27, Col. iii. 15, cannot be fully interpreted on his meaning, mere mutual concord. It is of course true, that mutual concord, and τὸ ἐπιεικές, are necessary elements of this peace: but it goes far beyond them. See the alternatives thoroughly discussed, as usual, in Ellic.'s note. ἡ ὑπερέχουσα πάντα νοῦν] not as Chrys., ὅταν λέγῃ πρὸς τοὺς ἐχθροὺς εἰρηνεύειν . . . . πῶς οὐχ ὑπὲρ νοῦν ἐστιν ἀνθρώπινον τοῦτο; nor as Estius, "quia omnem expectationem humanam excedit, quod Deus pro inimicis sibi reconciliandis filium suum dederit in mortem:" nor as Calvin, "quia nihil humano ingenio magis adversum, quam in summa desperatione nihilominus sperare:" but as Erasm., all., "res felicior quam ut humana mens queat percipere." νοῦς is the intelligent faculty, the perceptive and appreciative power: reff. On the sentiment itself, cf. Eph. iii. 19. φρουρήσει must not with Chrys., Thdrt., Thl., Luth., all. and Vulg., be made optative in sense: it is not a wish, but a declaration—following upon the performance of the injunction above. τὰς καρδίας ὑμῶν κ. τὰ νοήματα ὑμῶν] The heart is the fountain of the thoughts, i. e. designs, plans (not minds, as E. V.): so that this expression is equivalent to, 'your hearts themselves, and their fruits.' ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ is not the predicate after φρουρήσει—shall keep &c. in Christ, i. e. keep them from falling from Christ (ὥστε μένειν κ. μὴ ἐκπεσεῖν αὐτοῦ τῆς πίστεως, Chrys.): but, as usual, denotes the sphere or element of the φρουρά thus bestowed—that it shall be a Christian security:—the verb φρουρήσει being absolute.

8, 9.] Summary exhortation to Christian virtues not yet specified. 8.] τὸ λοιπόν resumes again his intention of closing the Epistle with which he had begun ch. iii., but from which he had been diverted by incidental subjects. It is unnatural to attribute to the Apostle so formal a design as De W. does, of now speaking of man's part, as he had hitherto of God's part:—Chrys. has it rightly,—τί ἐστι τὸ λοιπόν; ἀντὶ τοῦ, πάντα ἡμῖν εἴρηται. ἐπειγομένου τὸ ῥῆμά ἐστι, καὶ οὐδὲν κοινὸν ἔχοντος πρὸς τὰ παρόντα.

This beautiful sentence, full of the Apostle's fervour and eloquence, derives much force from the frequent repetition of ὅσα, and then of εἴ τις. ἀληθῆ] subjective, truthful: not, true in matter of fact. The whole regards ethical qualities. ταῦτα γὰρ ὄντως ἀληθῆ, ἡ ἀρετή, ψεῦδος δὲ ἡ κακία. κ. γὰρ ἡ ἡδονὴ αὐτῆς ψεῦδος, κ. ἡ δόξα αὐτῆς ψεῦδος, κ. πάντα τὰ τοῦ κόσμου ψεῦδος. Chrys.

σεμνά] τὸ σεμνὸν ὄνομα, τὸ καλόν τε κἀγαθόν, Xen. Œc. vi. 14. It is difficult to give it in any one English word: 'honest' and 'honourable' are too weak: 'reverend' and 'venerable,' 'grave,' are seldom applied to things. Nor do I know any other more eligible. δίκαια] not 'just,' in respect of others, merely—but right, in that wider sense in which δικαιοσύνη is used—before God and man: see this sense Acts x. 22; Rom. v. 7.

ἁγνά] not merely 'chaste' in the ordinary confined acceptation: but pure generally: "castimoniam denotat in omnibus vitæ partibus." Calv. προσφιλῆ] lovely, in the most general sense: no subjects need be supplied, as τοῖς πιστοῖς, or τῷ θεῷ (Chrys.): for the exhortation is markedly and designedly as general as possible.

εὔφημα] again, general, and with reference to general fame—of good report, as E.V. The meaning 'sermones qui bene aliis precantur,' adopted by Storr and Flatt, though philologically justified, is evidently not general enough for our context. εἴ τις ἀρετὴ . . . .] sums up all which have gone before and generalizes still further. The E. V. 'if there be any virtue,' &c. is objectionable, not for the reason alleged by Scholefield, Hints, &c. p. 85, as 'expressing a doubt of the existence of the thing in the abstract,' which it does not,—but as carrying the appearance of an adjuration, 'by the existence of,' &c. which conveys a wrong impression of the sense—whatever virtue there is (not 'there be,' as Scholef.) &c.

ἀρετή] virtue, in the most general ethical sense: ἔπαινος, praise, not 'pro eo quod est laudabile,' as Calv., al., but as Erasm., 'laus, virtutis comes.' The disciplinæ, which follows 'laus' in the Vulg. &c., is a pure interpolation, and beside the meaning: see various readings.

ταῦτα—viz., all the foregoing—the ἀληθῆ &c.,—the ἀρετή, and the ἔπαινος—these things meditate: let them be your νοήματα. 9.] These general abstract things he now particularizes in the concrete as having been exemplified and taught by himself when among them. The first καί is not 'both,' as E. V., but also,—moreover: which, besides what I have said recommending them above, were also recommended to you by my own example. ἐμάθετε] again, not as E. V. 'have learned,' &c.—but all aorists,—referring to the time when he was among them. Those things which (not 'whatsoever things:' we are on generals no longer: nor would he recommend to them all his own sayings and doings; but the καί expressly provides for their being of the kinds specified above) ye moreover learned, and received (reff.: here of receiving not by word of mouth, but by knowledge of his character: the whole is not doctrinal, but ethical) and heard (again not of preaching, but of his tried and acknowledged Christian character, which was in men's mouths and thus heard) and saw (each for himself) in me (ἐν ἐμοί will not properly belong to the two first verbs, ἐμάθ. and παρελ., but must be associated by zeugma with them —he himself being clearly the example throughout), these things (ταῦτα . . . . ἅ) practise (correlative with, not opposed to, λογίζεσθε above: — that λογισμός being eminently practical, and issuing, in the concrete, in the ταῦτα πράσσειν, after Paul's example). καί] and then: see ver. 7. On εἰρήνη, see there.

10—20.] He thanks them for the supply received from Philippi. 10.] δέ is transitional; the contrast being between the personal matters which are now introduced, and those more solemn ones which he has just been treating. ἐν κυρίῳ] See above, ch. iii. 1, ver. 4, "Every occurrence, in his view, has reference to Christ,—takes from Him its character and form." Wiesinger. ἤδη ποτέ] now at length, as E. V.: 'tandem aliquando:' χρόνον δηλοῦντός ἐστι μακρόν, Chrys. The ποτέ takes up and makes indefinite the ἤδη: as in δή ποτέ, δή που, &c. See Klotz ad Devar. p. 607, 8. But no reproof is conveyed by the expression, as Chrys. thinks: see below. ἀνεθάλετε] lit. ye came into leaf; "metaphora sumta ab arboribus, quarum vis hyeme contracta latet, vere florere incipit," Calv. But it is fanciful to conclude with Bengel, that it was Spring, when the gift came: see on a similar fancy in 1 Cor. v. 7. The word is taken transitively (see reff.) by Grot., all.,— 'ye caused to spring again your care for me' (see below): but the intransitive only will suit the sense here—ye budded forth again in caring for my interest (see below). Your care for me was, so to speak, the life of the tree; it existed just as much in winter when there was no vegetation, when ye ἠκαιρεῖσθε, as when the buds were put forth in spring. This is evident by what follows. We must thank Meyer, to whom we owe so much in accuracy of grammatical interpretation, for having followed out the right track here, first indicated by Bengel, and rendered τὸ ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ as the accusative governed by φρονεῖν. The ordinary way (so Wiesinger and Ellicott recently) has been to regard the words as = τὸ φρονεῖν ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ, thus depriving the relative ἐφ' ᾧ of any thing to refer to, and producing the logical absurdity [Mey.], ἐφρονεῖτε ἐπὶ τῷ ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ φρονεῖν, or forcing ἐφ' ᾧ to some unjustified meaning ('although,' as Luth., al.,—'sicut,' as vulg.,—&c.), or understanding it 'for whom,' as Calv., al., —contrary to the Apostle's usage, in which [reff.] ἐφ' ᾧ is always neuter. But if we take τὸ ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ together,—'my interest,'—and govern it by φρονεῖν, all will be simple and clear: I rejoiced, &c. that at last ye flourished in anxiety for my interest: for which purpose (cf. Plat. Gorg. p. 502 B, ἐφ' ᾧ ἐσπούδακε:—the purpose, namely, of flourishing, putting forth the supply which you have now sent. Wiesinger prefers the other, and vindicates it from Meyer's imputation: but to me not convincingly: as neither Ellicott) ye also were anxious (all that long time, imperfect), but had no opportunity (ἀκαιρέω is a word of later Greek: εὐκαιρέω, its opposite, is used by Lucian, Plutarch, Polyb., &c., as also its compounds ἐνευκαιρέω, προσευκαιρέω, &c. See Phryn. ed. Lobeck, p. 125. Wiesinger well remarks that we must not press this ἠκαιρεῖσθε into a definite hypothesis, such as that their financial state was not adequate—that they οὐδεμία μοι ἐκκλησία] no church communicated with me as to (in) an account of giving and receiving (i. e., every receipt being part of the department of giving and receiving, being one side of such a reckoning, ye alone opened such an account with me. It is true the Philippians had all the giving, the Apostle all the receiving: the debtor side was vacant in their account, the creditor side in his: but this did not make it any the less an account of "giving-and-receiving," categorically so called. This explanation, which is Meyer's, is in my view far the most simple [against Ellic., who apparently has misunderstood it], and preferable to the almost universal one, that his creditor and their debtor side was that which he spiritually imparted to them: for the introduction of spiritual gifts does not belong to the context, and therefore disturbs it. Similar usages of λῆψις κ. δόσις occur: e. g. Artemid. i. 44, οἱ διὰ δόσεως κ. λήψεως ποριζόμενοι: Arrian, Epict. ii. 9, τὸν φιλάργυρον (ἐπαύξουσιν) αἱ ἀκατάλληλοι λήψεις κ. δόσεις: Cicero, Lælio 16, 'ratio acceptorum et datorum.' See Wetst.) but you only: 16.] for even in Thessalonica (which was an early stage of my ἐξελθεῖν ἀπὸ Μακ., before the departure was consummated. The ὅτι gives a reason for and proof of the former assertion—ye were the only ones, &c.,—and ye began as early as ἐν Θεσσ., i. e. when I was at Thessalonica. In such brachylogical constructions the preposition of rest, as belonging to the act accomplished, overbears the preposition of motion, as belonging to it only in its imperfect state; so οἱ ἐν τῷ Ἡραίῳ κατα-πεφευγότες, Xen. in Bekker's text is a correction) ye sent both once and twice (the account of the expression being, that when the first arrived, they had sent once: when the second, not only once, but twice. So in ref.: and Herod. ii. 121, αὐτῷ κ. δὶς κ. τρὶς ἀνοίξαντι: iii. 148, τοῦτο κ. δὶς κ. τρὶς εἶπαντος Μαιανδρίου. The opposite expression, οὐχ ἅπαξ οὐδὲ δίς, is found in Plat. Clitoph. § 7) ye sent (absolute as in ref.) to (for the supply of, ref.) my necessity. 17.] Again he removes any chance of misunderstanding, as above in ver. 11. It was not for his own sake but for theirs that he rejoiced at their liberality, because it multiplied the fruits of their faith. Not that (see above, ver. 11) I seek (present, 'it is my character to seek.' The preposition in composition denotes, as so often, the direction; not studiose, nor insuper) the gift (τό—in the case in question), but I do seek (the repetition of the verb is solemn and emphatic) the fruit which (thereby, in the case before us) abounds to your account (this εἰς λόγον refers to the same expression, ver. 15—fruit, μισθόν in the day of the Lord, the result of your labour for me in the Lord. De W., after Van Hengel, doubts whether πλεονάζοντα can be constructed with εἰς, and would therefore separate them by a comma. But surely little would be thus gained, for the εἰς would belong to the whole clause, the connecting link being καρπὸν πλεονάζοντα, so that even thus the idea of πλεονάζοντα must be carried on to εἰς: and perhaps in 2 Thess. i. 3 it is so: see note there). 18.] But (notwithstanding that the gift is not that which I desire, I have received it, and been sufficiently supplied by it) I have (emphatic, and exactly as in ἀπέχειν τὸν μισθόν—'I have no more to ask from you, but have enough:'—not as Erasm., Beza, Grot., &c. 'I have duly received all you sent') all (I want), and abound (over and above): I am filled (repetition and intensification of περισσεύω), having received at the hands of Epaphroditus the remittance from you, a savour of fragrance (a clause in apposition, expressing a judgment,—so frequently in poetry, especially in tragedians,—Il. ω. 735, ᾗ τις Ἀχαιῶν βίψει, χειρὸς ἁλόν, ἀπὸ πύργου, λυγρὸν ὄλεθρον: Eur. coming of Christ [as Meyer, according to his wont], but in the whole glorious imparting to you of the unsearchable riches of Christ, begun and carried on here, and completed at that day. ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ] and this filling (or, 'this glory,' but then perhaps τῇ would have been expressed) is, consists, and finds its sphere and element, in Christ Jesus. 20.] The contemplation both of the Christian reward, of which he has been speaking, and of the glorious completion of all God's dealings at the great day,—and the close of his Epistle,—suggests this ascription of praise. δέ] But—however rich you may be in good works, however strong I may be by Christ to bear all things,—not to us, but to our God and Father be the glory. On εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, see note, Eph. iii. 21.

21—23.] GREETING AND FINAL BENEDICTION. 21.] πάντα ἅγιον, every individual saint. The singular has love and affection, and should not be lost as in Conyb., 'Salute all God's people.' ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ] belongs more probably to ἀσπάσασθε,—see Rom. xvi. 22; 1 Cor. xvi. 19,—than to ἅγιον, as in ch. i. 1, where, as Meyer observes, the expression has a diplomatic formality, whereas here there is no reason for so formal an adjunct.

οἱ σὺν ἐμοὶ ἀδελφοί] These must, on account of the next verse, have been his closer friends, perhaps his colleagues in the ministry, such as Aristarchus, Epaphras, Demas, Timotheus. But there has arisen a question, how to reconcile this with ch. ii. 20? And it may be answered, that the lack of ἰσοψυχία there predicated of his companions, did not exclude them from the title ἀδελφοί, nor from sending greeting to the Philippians: see also ch. i. 14. 22.] πάντες οἱ ἅγιοι, all the Christians here.

οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας] These perhaps were slaves belonging to the familia of Nero, who had been converted by intercourse with St. Paul, probably at this time a prisoner in the prætorian barracks (see ch. i. 13 note) attached to the palace. This is much more likely, than that any of the actual family of Nero should have embraced Christianity. The hint which Chrys., al., find here, εἰ γὰρ οἱ ἐν τοῖς βασιλείοις πάντων κατεφρόνησαν διὰ τὸν βασιλέα τῶν οὐρανῶν, πολλῷ μᾶλλον αὐτοὺς χρὴ τοῦτο ποιεῖν, is alien from the simplicity of the close of an Epistle. The reason of these being specified is not plain: the connexion perhaps between a colonia, and some of the imperial household, might account for it. 23.] See Gal. vi. 18.

3.] We (I and Timotheus. In this Epistle, the plural and singular are too plainly distinguished to allow us to confuse them in translating: the plural pervading ch. i., the singular ch. ii., and the two occurring together in ch. iv. 3, 4, and the singular thenceforward. The change, as Mey. remarks, is never made without a pragmatic reason) give thanks to God the Father πατήρ, like ἥλιος, γῆ, &c. is anarthrous, as indeed often in our own language, from its well-known universal import as a predicate necessarily single of its kind: see Eph. i. 2, 3) of our Lord Jesus Christ, always (I prefer, against De W., Mey., B.-Crus., Eadie, to join πάντοτε to περ. ὑμ. προσευχ., rather than to εὐχαριστ. For 1] it would come rather awkwardly after so long an interruption as τῷ θ. πατ. τ. κυρ. ἡμ. Ἰησ. χρ. [see however 1 Cor. xv. 58]: and 2] I doubt whether the next clause would begin with περὶ ὑμῶν, so naturally as with πάντοτε περὶ ὑμῶν, which are found together so usually, cf. 1 Cor. i. 4; 1 Thess. i. 3 [2 Thess. i. 2]) praying for you (Meyer's and Eadie's objection to joining πάντοτε with προσευχόμενοι is, that it is much more natural to say 'we always give thanks when we pray,' than 'we give thanks, always praying.' But we must remember that 'prayer with thanksgiving' was the Apostle's recommendation [Phil. iv. 6], and doubtless his practice, and that the wider term προσευχόμενοι included both): since we heard of (not, because we heard: see Eph. i. 15. The facts which he heard, not the fact of his hearing, were the ground of his thanksgiving) your faith in (not τὴν ἐν: the immediate element of their faith, not its distinctive character, is the point brought out) Christ Jesus, and the love which ye have (these words, dwelling on the fact as reported to him, carry more affectionate commendation than would merely the article τήν of the rec.) towards all the saints, 5.] on account of (not to be joined with εὐχαριστ. as Beng., Eadie, al.: for, as Mey., the ground of such thanksgiving is ever in the spiritual state of the person addressed, see Rom. i. 8; 1 Cor. i. 4 ff.; Eph. i. 15 &c., and this can hardly [against Eadie] be said to be of such a kind: but with ἣν ἔχετε— so Chr.: τοῦτο πρὸς τοὺς πειρασμούς, ὥστε μὴ ἐνταῦθα ζητεῖν τὴν ἄνεσιν. ἵνα γὰρ μή τις εἴπῃ· καὶ τί τὸ κέρδος τῆς ἀγάπης τῆς εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους κοπτομένων αὐτῶν; χαίρωμεν, φησίν, ὅτι μεγάλα ἑαυτοῖς προξενεῖτε ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς. So also Calvin, who combats the argument of Est., al., deriving support for the idea of meritorious works from this verse. It is obvious that we must not include τὴν πίστιν ὑμῶν in the reference, as Grot., Olsh., De W., al., have done: for πίστις ἐν χ. Ἰ. cannot be referred to any such motive: besides, see ver. 8, where he returns again to τὴν ἀγάπην) the hope (on the objective sense of ἐλπίς, see reff.) which is laid up (Kypke quotes Plut. Again: on καρπ. κ. αὐξ., cf. Thdrt.: καρποφορίαν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου κέκληκε τὴν ἐπαινουμένην πολιτείαν. αὔξησιν δὲ τῶν πιστευόντων τὸ πλῆθος. He was one acting faithfully "vice Apostoli" [Ambrst.], and therefore not lightly to be set aside in favour of the new and erroneous teachers), who also made known to us your love in the Spirit (viz. the ἀγάπη of which he described himself in ver. 4 as having heard; their love εἰς πάντας τοὺς ἁγίους. This love is emphatically a gift, and in its full reference the chief gift of the Spirit, [Gal. v. 22; Rom. xv. 30], and is thus in the elemental region of the Spirit,—as distinct from those unspiritual states of mind which are ἐν σαρκί. This love of the Colossians he lays stress on, as a ground for thankfulness, a fruit of the hope laid up for them,—as being that side of their Christian character where he had no fault [or least fault, see ch. iii. 12—14] to find with them. He now proceeds, gently and delicately at first, to touch on matters needing correction).

Eph. i. 9: but of course not excluding the great source of that special will respecting you, His general will to be glorified in His Son) in all wisdom (seeing that ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ, in the similar clauses, Eph. i. 8; ver. 28, ch. iii. 16, is absolute, I prefer taking it so here, and not, as Ellic., with πνευματικῇ) and spiritual understanding (the instrument by which we are to be thus filled,—the working of the Holy Spirit, πνευματικῇ. The meaning is, 'so that [see above] in every way ye may be well pleasing to God'): in (exemplifying element of the καρπ.; see below) every good work (not to be joined with the former clause, as Œc., Thl., Erasm., al., to the destruction of the parallelism) bearing fruit (the good works being the fruits: the περιπατῆσαι is now further specified, being subdivided into four departments, noted by the four participles καρποφοροῦντες, αὐξανόμενοι, δυναμούμενοι, and εὐχαριστοῦντες. On the construction, see Eph. iii. 18 note) and increasing (see on ver. 6 above) by the knowledge of God (the instrument of the increase. This is by far the most difficult of the three readings [see var. readd.], the meaning of ἐν and εἰς, being very obvious—the former pointing out the element, the latter the proposed measure, of the increase. And hence, probably, the variations. It is the knowledge of God which is the real instrument of enlargement, in soul and in life, of the believer—not a γνῶσις which φυσιοῖ, but an ἐπίγνωσις which αὐξάνει), 11.] (corresponding to ἐν παντὶ κ.τ.λ. above) in (not instrumental [Mey.], but betokening the element: all these, ἐν πάσῃ, ἐν παντὶ .... are subjective, not objective. V. has fallen here: the attribute of His glorious majesty here brought out is its κράτος [see Eph. i. 19, note], the power which it has thus to strengthen. In the very similar expression Eph. iii. 16, it was the πλοῦτος τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ, the exuberant abundance of the same, from which as an inexhaustible treasure our strength is to come) to (so as to produce in you, so that ye may attain to) all patient endurance (not only in tribulations, but generally in the life of the Spirit. Endurance is the result of the union of outward and inward strength) and long-suffering (not only towards your enemies or persecutors, but also in the conflict with error, which is more in question in this Epistle. Chrys.'s distinction, μακροθυμεῖ τις πρὸς ἐκείνους οὓς δυνατὸν καὶ ἀμύνασθαι· ὑπομένει δὲ οὓς οὐ δύναται ἀμύνασθαι, though in the main correct, must not be closely pressed: see [Mey.] Heb. xii. 2, 3) with joy (Mey. argues that these words must be joined, as Chr., Œc., Thl., Est., al., with εὐχαριστ., because in the other clauses the participles were preceded by these prepositional qualifications. But this can hardly be pressed, in the frequent disregard of such close parallelism by our Apostle, and seeing that εὐχαριστ. does in fact take up again μετὰ χαρᾶς, which if attached to it is flat and unmeaning: and as De Wette says, by joining μετ. χαρ. to εὐχ., we lose the essential idea of joyful endurance,—and the beautiful train of thought, that joyfulness in suffering expresses itself in thankfulness to God. And so Luth., B.-Crus., Olsh., Eadie, al.), giving thanks to the Father (the connexion is not, as Chr., Thl., Calov., Calv., al., with οὐ παυόμεθα, the subject being we, Paul and Timothy,—but with the last words [see above], and the subjects are 'you,'—τῷ πατρί, viz. of our Lord Jesus Christ: see reff.) who made (historical—by His gift of the Spirit through His Son) us (Christians) capable (not, 'worthy,' as Est. after the Vulg.) for the share (participation) of the inheritance of the saints in the light (it is much disputed with what ἐν τῷ φωτί is to be joined. Mey., after Chr., Œc., Thl., &c., regards it as instrumental—as the means of the ἱκανῶσαι which has been mentioned. But this seems unnatural, both in sense, and in the position of the words, in which it stands too far from ἱκ. to be its qualifying clause. It connects much more naturally with κλήρου, or perhaps better still with the whole, τὴν μερίδα τ. κλήρου τῶν ἁγ., giving τὸ φῶς as the region in which the inheritance of the saints, and consequently our share in it, is situated. This seems supported by the usage of κλῆρος in Acts viii. 21, οὐκ ἔστι σοι μερὶς οὐδὲ κλῆρος ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τούτῳ —cf. also κλῆρον ἐν τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις, ib. xxvi. 18. And so Thdrt., al., De W., Eadie, al.—Grot., al., would take ἐν τ. φωτί with ἁγίων: against this the omission of the article is not decisive: but it does not seem so natural, as giving too great prominence to οἱ ἅγιοι ἐν τῷ φωτί as the ἐπώνυμοι of the inheritance, and not enough to the inheritance itself. The question as to whether he is speaking of a present inheritance, or the future glory of heaven, seems best answered by Chrys., δοκεῖ δέ μοι κ. περὶ τῶν παρόντων κ. περὶ τῶν μελλόντων ὁμοῦ λέγειν. The inheritance is begun here, and the meetness conferred, in gradual sanctification: but completed hereafter. We are ἐν τῷ φωτί here: cf. Rom. xiii. 12, 13; 1 Thess. v. 5; Eph. v. 8; 1 Pet. ii. 9 al.):

abstract subst., than our Redemption as in my earlier editions. See Ellic.), the remission ("on the distinction between ἄφεσις and πάρεσις, see Trench, Synon. § xxxiii." Ellic.) of our sins (note, Eph., ut supra. παραπτωμάτων, the more special word, is here replaced by ἁμαρτιῶν the more general: the meaning being the same): 15.] (The last verse has been a sort of introduction, through our own part in Him, to the Person of the Redeemer, which is now directly treated of, as against the teachers of error at Colossæ. He is described, in His relation 1) to God and His Creation [vv. 15—17]: 2) to the Church [18—20]. This arrangement, which is Meyer's, is far more exact than the triple division of Bähr,—'Source of creation [15, 16]: upholder of creation [17]: relation to the new moral creation [18—20]'), who is (now—in His glorified state—essentially and permanently: therefore not to be understood, as De W. after Erasm., Calv., Beza, Grot., Beng., al., of the historical Christ, God manifested in our flesh on earth: nor again with Olsh., Bleek on Heb. i. al., of the eternal Word: but of Christ's present glorified state, in which He is exalted in our humanity, but exalted to that glory which He had with the Father before the world was. So that the following description applies to Christ's whole Person in its essential glory,—now however, by His assumption of humanity, necessarily otherwise conditioned than before that assumption. See for the whole, notes on Phil. ii. 6, and Heb. i. 2 f.; and Usteri, Paulinisches Lehrbegriff, ii. § 4, p. 286 ff.) image (= the image) of the invisible God (the adjunct τοῦ ἀοράτου is of the utmost weight to the understanding of the expression. The same fact being the foundation of the whole as in Phil. ii. 6 ff., that the Son ἐν μορφῇ θεοῦ ὑπῆρχεν, that side of the fact is brought out here, which points to His being the visible manifestation of that in God which is invisible: the λόγος of the eternal silence, the ἀπαύγασμα of the δόξα which no creature can bear, the χαρακτήρ of that ὑπόστασις which is incommunicably God's: in one word the ἐξηγητής of the Father whom none hath seen. So that while ἀόρατος includes in it not only the invisibility, but the incommunicability of God, εἰκών also must not be restricted to Christ corporeally visible in the Incarnation, but understood of Him as the manifestation of God in His whole Person and work—præ-existent and incarnate. It is obvious, that in this expression, the Apostle approaches very near to the Alexandrian doctrine of the λόγος: how near, may be seen from the extracts from Philo in Usteri: e. g. de somniis, 41, vol. i. p. 656, καθάπερ τὴν ἀνθήλιον αὐγὴν ὡς ἥλιον οἱ μὴ δυνάμενοι τὸν ἥλιον αὐτὸν ἰδεῖν ὁρῶσι, κ. τὰς περὶ τὴν σελήνην ἀλλοιώσεις ὡς αὐτὴν ἐκείνην οὕτως καὶ τὴν τοῦ θεοῦ εἰκόνα, τὸν ἄγγελον αὐτοῦ λόγον, ὃς αὐτὸν κατανοοῦσι: and de Monarch. ii. 5, vol. ii. p. 225, λόγος δέ ἐστιν εἰκὼν θεοῦ, δι' οὗ σύμπας ὁ κόσμος ἐδημιουργεῖτο. See other passages in Bleek on Heb. i. 2. He is, in fact, as St. John afterwards did, adopting the language of that lore as far as it represented divine truth, and rescuing it from being used in the service of error. [This last sentence might have prevented the misunderstanding of this part of my note by Ellic. in loc.: shewing, as it does, that the inspiration of St. Paul and the non-inspiration of Philo, are as fully recognized by me as by himself]), the first-born of all creation (such, and not 'every creature,' is the meaning [so I still hold against Ellic. But see his whole note on this passage, as well worth study]: nor can the strict usage of the article be alleged as an objection: cf. below, ver. 23, and Eph. ii. 21 note: the solution being, that κτίσις, as our word 'creation,' may be used anarthrous, in its collective sense.

Christ is ὁ πρωτότοκος, THE FIRST-BORN, Heb. i. 6. The idea was well known in the Alexandrian terminology: τοῦτον μὲν γάρ,—viz. τὸν ἀσώματον ἐκεῖνον, θείας ἀδιαφορούντα εἰκόνος—πρεσβύτατον υἱὸν ὁ τῶν ὄντων ἀνέτειλε πατήρ, ὃν ἑτέρωθι πρωτόγονον ὠνόμασε, καὶ ὁ γεννηθεὶς μέντοι μιμούμενος τὰς τοῦ πατρὸς ὁδούς, πρὸς παραδείγματα ἀρχέτυπα ἐκείνου βλέπων, ἐμόρφου εἴδη. Philo, de Confus. Ling. 14, vol. i. p. 414. That the word is used as one whose meaning and reference was already known to the readers, is shewn by its being predicated of Christ as compared with two classes so different, the creatures, and the dead (ver. 18). The first and simplest meaning is that of priority of birth. But this, if insisted on, in its limited temporal sense, must apply to our Lord's birth from his human mother, and could have reference only to those brothers and sisters who were born of her afterwards; a reference clearly excluded here. But a secondary and derived meaning of πρωτότοκος, as a designation of dignity and precedence, implied by priority, cannot be denied. Cf. Ps. lxxxviii. 27, κἀγὼ πρωτότοκον θήσομαι αὐτόν, ὑψηλὸν παρὰ τοῖς βασιλεῦσι τῆς γῆς:—Exod. iv. 22, υἱὸς πρωτότοκός μου Ἰσραὴλ:—Rom. viii. 29, and Heb. xii. 23, ἐκκλησίᾳ πρωτοτόκων ἀπογεγραμμένων ἐν οὐρανοῖς, where see Bleek's note. Similarly πρωτόγονος is used in Soph. Phil. 180, οὗτος πρωτογόνων ἴσως οἴκων οὐδενὸς ὕστερος. It would be obviously wrong here to limit the sense entirely to this reference, as the very expression below, αὐτὸς ἐστὶν πρὸ πάντων, shews, in which his priority is distinctly predicated. The safe method of interpretation therefore will be, to take into account the two ideas manifestly included in the word, and here distinctly referred to—priority, and dignity, and to regard the technical term πρωτότοκος as used rather with reference to both these, than in strict construction where it stands. "First-born of every creature" will then imply, that Christ was not only first-born of His mother in the world, but first-begotten of His Father, before the worlds, — and that He holds the rank, as compared with every created thing, of first-born in dignity: FOR, &c., ver. 16, where this assertion is justified. Cf. below on ver. 18.

It may be well to notice other interpretations: 1) Meyer, after Tert., Chr., Thdrt., al., Bengel, al., would restrict the term to its temporal sense: 'primogenitus, ut ante omnia genitus:' on this, see above. 2) The Arians maintained that Christ is thus Himself declared to be a κτίσις of God. It might have been enough to guard them from this, that as Chr. remarks, not πρωτόκτιστος, but πρωτότοκος is advisedly used by the Apostle. 3) The Socinians [also Grot., Wetst., Schleierm., al., after Theod. Mops.] holding the mistaken view of the necessity of the strict interpretation of πρωτότοκος—maintain, that Christ must be one of those among whom He is πρωτότοκος — and that consequently κτίσις must be the new spiritual creation—which it certainly cannot mean without a qualifying adjective to indicate such meaning—and least of all here, where the physical κτίσις is so specifically broken up into its parts in the next verse. 4) Worst of all is the rendering proposed by Isidore of Pelusium and adopted by Erasm. and Er.-Schmidt, 'first bringer forth' [πρωτοτόκος, but used only of a mother]. See on the whole, De W.: and a long note in Bleek on the Hebrews, vol. i. pp. 43—48):

16.] because (explanatory of the πρωτ. πάσ. κτίσ.—it must be so, seeing that nothing can so completely refute the idea that Christ himself is included in creation, as this verse) in Him (as the conditional element, præ-existent and all-including: not 'by Him,' as E. V. after Chr. [τὸ ἐν αὐτῷ, δι' αὐτοῦ ἐστιν]—this is expressed afterwards, and is a different fact from the present one, though implied in it. The idea of the schoolmen, that in Christ was the 'idea omnium rerum,' adopted in the main by Schl., Neander, and Olsh. ["the Son of God is the intelligible world, the κόσμος νοητός, i. e. creation in its primitive ideas, Himself; He bears in Himself their reality," Olsh.], is, as Meyer rightly observes, entirely unsupported by any views or expressions of our Apostle elsewhere: and is besides abundantly refuted by ἐκτίσθη, the historic aorist, indicating the physical act of Creation) was created (in the act of creation: cf. on ἔκτισται below) the universe (thus only can we give the force of the Greek singular with the collective neuter plural, which it is important here to preserve, as 'all things' may be thought of individually, not collectively) — (viz.) things in the heavens and things on the earth (Wetst. urges this as shewing that the physical creation is not meant: 'non dicit ὁ οὐρανὸς κ. ἡ γῆ ἐκτίσθη, sed τὰ ἐν &c., quo habitatores significantur qui reconciliantur' [cf. the Socinian view of ver. 15 above]: the right answer to which is—not with De W. to say that the Apostle is speaking of living created things only, for manifestly the whole universe is here treated of, there being no reason why living things should be in such a declaration distinguished from other things,—but with Mey. to treat τὰ ἐν τ. οὐρρ. κ. τὰ ἐπ. τ. γῆς as an inexact designation of heaven and earth, and all that in them is, Rev. x. 6. In 1 Chron. xxix. 11, the meaning is obviously this, σὺ πάντων τῶν ἐν τῷ οὐρ. κ. ἐπὶ τ. γῆς δεσπόζεις), things visible and things invisible (which divide between them the universe: Mey. quotes from Plato, Phæd. p. 79 A, θῶμεν οὖν, εἰ βούλει, ἔφη, δύο εἶδη τῶν ὄντων, τὸ μὲν ὁρατόν, τὸ δὲ ἀειδές. The ὁράματα are the spirit-world [not, οἷον ψυχή, Chr.: this, being incorporated, would fall under the ὁρατά, for the present purpose], which he now breaks up by εἴτε . . . εἴτε . . . εἴτε), whether (these latter be) thrones, whether lordships, whether governments, whether authorities (on εἴτε, . . . often repeated, see reff.: and Plat. It would be vain to attempt to assign to each of these their places in the celestial world. Perhaps, as De W., the Apostle chose the expressions as terms common to the doctrine of the Colossian false teachers and his own: but the occurrence of so very similar a catalogue in Eph. i. 21, where no such object could be in view, hardly looks as if such a design were before him. Mey. well remarks, "For Christian faith it remains fixed, and it is sufficient, that there is testimony borne to the existence of different degrees and categories in the world of spirits above; but all attempts more precisely to fix these degrees, beyond what is written in the N. T., belong to the fanciful domain of theosophy." All sorts of such interpretations, by Teller and others, not worth recording, may be seen refuted in De W.): the whole universe (see above on τὰ πάντα, ver. 16) has been created (not now of the mere act, but of the resulting endurance of creation—leading on to the συνέστηκεν below) by Him (instrumental: He is the agent in creation—the act was His, and the upholding is His: see John i. 3, note) and for Him (with a view to Him: He is the end of creation, containing the reason in Himself why creation is at all, and why it is as it is. See my Sermons on Divine Love, Serm. I. II. The fancies and caprices of those who interpret creation here ethically, are recounted and refuted by Meyer): and He Himself (emphatic, His own Person) is (as in John viii. 58, of essential existence: ἦν might have been used, as in John i. 1: but as Mey. well observes, the Apostle keeps the past tenses for the explanatory clauses referring to past facts, vv. 16, 19) before all things (in time; bringing out one side of the πρωτότοκος above: not in rank, as the Socinians: of which latter James v. 12, 1 Pet. iv. 8, are no justifications, for if πρὸ-πάντων be taken as there, we must render, 'and He, above all, exists,' 'He especially exists,' προπάντων being adverbial, and not to be resolved. as in St. Paul, it is the church which is, not which possesses, the body, see reff.): who (q. d. 'in that He is:' the relative has an argumentative force: see Matthiæ, Gr. § 477: in which case it is more commonly found with a particle, ὅς μέν, or ὅς γε) is the beginning (of the Church of the First-born, being Himself πρωτότ. ἐκ τ. νεκρ.: cf. ἀπαρχὴ χριστός, 1 Cor. xv. 23, and reff., especially the last. But the word evidently has, standing as it does here alone, a wider and more glorious reference than that of mere temporal precedence: cf. ref. Rev. and note: He is the Beginning, in that in Him is begun and conditioned the Church, vv. 19, 20), the First-born from (among) the dead (i. e. the first who arose from among the dead: but the term πρωτότοκος [see above] being predicated of Christ in both references, he uses it here, regarding the resurrection as a kind of birth. On that which is implied in πρωτότ., see above on ver. 15), that He (emphatic, again: see above) may become (not, as Est., 'ex quibus efficitur, Christum .... tenere:' but the aim and purpose of this his priority over creation and in resurrection) in all things (reff. Beza, [and so Kypke] argues, that because the Apostle is speaking of the Church, πᾶσιν must be masculine, allowing however that the neuter has some support from the τὰ πάντα which follows. In fact this decides the question: the τὰ πάντα there are a resumption of the πᾶσιν here. The ἐν then is not 'inter,' but of the reference:—'in all matters:' πανταχοῦ, as Chrys.: because the πάντα which follows applies not only to things concrete, but also to their combinations and attributes) pre-eminent (first in rank: the word is a transitional one, from priority in time to priority in dignity, and shews incontestably that the two ideas have been before the Apostle's mind throughout. Add to reff., Wetst., πρωτεύειν ἐν ἅπασι κράτιστον, Demosth. 1416. 25: and Plut. de puer. educ. p. 9 B, τοὺς παῖδας ἐν πᾶσι τάχιον πρωτεῦσαι).

Meyer.—for in Him God was pleased (on the use of εὐδοκέω for δοκέω by the later Greeks, see Fritzsche's note, on Rom. vol. ii. pp. 369—72. The subject here is naturally understood to be God, as expressed in 1 Cor. i. 21; Gal. i. 15: clearly not Christ, as Conyb., thereby inducing a manifest error in the subsequent clause, 'by Himself He willed to reconcile all things to Himself,' for it was not to Christ but to the Father that all things were reconciled by Him, cf. 2 Cor. v. 19. See a full discussion on the construction, and the subject to εὐδόκησεν, in Ellic.'s note. His conclusion, that πλήρωμα is that subject, I cannot accept) that the whole fulness (of God, see ch. ii. 9; Eph. iii. 19, and on πλήρωμα, note, Eph. i. 10, 23. We must bear in mind here, with Mey., that the meaning is not active, 'id quod rem implet,' but passive, 'id quo res impletur:' all that fulness of grace which is the complement of the divine character, and which dwells permanently in Christ: 'cumulatissima omnium divinarum rerum copia,' Beza,—as in John i. 16. The various other interpretations have been,—"the essential fulness of the Godhead;" so Œc., al.; which is manifestly not in question here,—but is not to be set aside, as Eadie, by saying that 'the divine essence dwelt in Christ unchangeably and not by the Father's consent or purpose: it is His in His own right, and not by paternal pleasure:' for all that is His own right, is His Father's pleasure, and is ever referred to that pleasure by Himself;—"the fulness of the whole universe;" so Conyb., and Castellio in Beza. This latter answers well: "Quorsum mentio universitatis rerum? Nam res ipsa clamat Apostolum de sola ecclesia hic agere, ut etiam 1 Cor. xv. 18 (?); Eph. i. 10; iv. 6, 20 (?):"—'the Church itself,' as Severianus in Cramer's Catena, τουτέστιν τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τὴν πεπληρωμένην αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ χριστῷ,—and Thdrt., πλήρ. τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἐν τῇ πρὸς Ἐφεσίους ἐκάλεσεν, ὡς τῶν θείων χαρισμάτων πεπληρωμένην, ταύτην ἔφη εὐδοκῆσαι τὸν θεὸν ἐν τῷ χριστῷ κατοικῆσαι, τουτέστιν αὐτῷ συνῆφθαι,—and similarly B.-Crus., al., and Schleierm., understanding the fulness of the Gentiles and the whole of Israel, as Rom. xi. 12, 25, 26. But this has no support, either in the absolute usage of πλήρωμα, or in the context here. See others in De W.) should dwell, and ('hæc inhabitatio est fundamentum reconciliationis,' Beng.) by Him (as the instrument, in Redemption as in Creation, see above ver. 16 end) to reconcile again (see note on Eph. ii. 16) all things (= the universe: not to be limited to 'all intelligent beings,' or 'all men,' or 'the whole Church:' these πάντα are broken up below into terms which will admit of no such limitation. On the fact, see below) to Him (viz. to God, Eph. ii. 16: not αὐτόν; the writer has in his mind two Persons, both expressed by αὐτός, and to be understood from the context. The aspirate should never be placed over αυτ-, unless where there is a manifest necessity for such emphasis. But we are not [as Conyb.,—also Est., Grot., Olsh., De W.] to understand Christ to be meant: see above), having made peace (the subject is not Christ [as in Eph. i. 15; so Chrys. (διὰ τοῦ ἰδίου σταυροῦ), Thdrt., Œc., Luth., al.], but the Father: He is the subject in the whole sentence since εὐδόκησεν) by means of the blood of (genitive possessive, belonging to, figuratively, as being shed on: 'ideo pignus et pretium nostræ cum Deo pacificationis fuit sanguis Christi, quia in cruce fusus,' Calv.) His Cross,—through Him (emphatic repetition, to bring αὐτός, the Person of Christ, into its place of prominence again, after the interruption occasioned by εἰρην. . . . . αὐτοῦ: not meaning, as Castal. [in Mey.], 'per sanguinem ejus, hoc est, per eum:' for the former and not the latter is explicative of the other),—whether (τὰ πάντα consist of) the things on the earth, or the things in the heavens. It has been a question, in what sense this reconciliation is predicated of the whole universe. Short of this meaning we cannot stop: we cannot hold with Erasm., al., that it is a reconciliation of the various portions of creation to one another: 'ut abolitis peccatis, quæ dirimebant concordiam et pacem cœlestium ac terrestrium, jam amicitia jungerentur omnia:' for this is entirely precluded by the εἴτε . . . εἴτε: nor, for the same reason, with Schleierm., understand that the elements to be reconciled are the Jews and Gentiles, who were at variance about earthly and heavenly things, and were to be set at one in reference to God (εἰς αὐτόν). The Apostle's meaning clearly is, that by the blood of Christ's Cross, reconciliation with God has passed on all creation as a whole, including angelic as well as human beings, unreasoning and lifeless things, as well as organized and intelligent. Now this may be understood in the following ways: 1) creation may be strictly regarded in its entirety, and man's offence viewed as having, by inducing impurity upon one portion of it, alienated the whole from God: and thus τὰ πάντα may be involved in our fall. Some support may seem to be derived for this by the undeniable fact, that the whole of man's world is included in these consequences (see Rom. viii. 19 f.). But on the other side, we never find the angelic beings thus involved: nay, we are taught to regard them as our model in hallowing God's name, realising His kingdom, and doing His will (Matt. vi. 9, 10). And again the εἴτε . . . εἴτε would not suffer this: reconciliation is thus predicated of each portion separately. We are thus driven, there being no question about τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, to enquire, how τὰ ἐν τοῖς οὐρρ. can be said to be reconciled by the blood of the Cross. And here again, 2) we may say that angelic, celestial creation was alienated from God because a portion of it fell from its purity: and, though there is no idea of the reconciliation extending to that portion, yet the whole, as a whole, may need thus reconciling, by the final driving into punishment of the fallen, and thus setting the faithful in perfect and undoubted unity with God. But to this I answer, a) that such reconciliation (?) though it might be a result of the coming of the Lord Jesus, yet could not in any way be effected by the blood of His Cross: b) that we have no reason to think that the fall of some angels involved the rest in its consequences, or that angelic being is evolved from any root, as ours is from Adam: nay, in both these particulars, the very contrary is revealed. We must then seek our solution in some meaning which will apply to angelic beings in their essential nature, not as regards the sin of some among them. And as thus applied, no reconciliation must be thought of which shall resemble ours in its process—for Christ took not upon Him the seed of angels, nor paid any propitiatory penalty in the root of their nature, as including it in Himself. But, forasmuch as He is their Head as well as ours,—forasmuch as in Him they, as well as ourselves, live and move and have their being, it cannot be but that the great event in which He was glorified through suffering, should also bring them nearer to God, who subsist in Him in common with all creation. And at some such increase of blessedness does our Apostle seem to hint in Eph. iii. 10. That such increase might be described as a reconciliation, is manifest: we know from Job xv. 15, that "the heavens are not clean in His sight," and ib. iv. 18, "His angels He charged with folly." In fact, every such nearer approach to Him may without violence to words be so described, in comparison with that previous greater distance which now seems like alienation; —and in this case even more properly, as one of the consequences of that great propitiation whose first and plainest effect was to reconcile to God, in the literal sense, the things upon earth, polluted and hostile in consequence of man's sin. So that our interpretation may be thus summed up: all creation subsists in Christ: all creation therefore is affected by His act of propitiation: sinful creation is, in the strictest sense, reconciled, from being at enmity: sinless creation, ever at a distance from his unapproachable purity, is lifted into nearer participation and higher glorification of Him, and is thus reconciled, though not in the strictest, yet in a very intelligible and allowable sense. Meyer's note, taking a different view, that the reconciliation is the great κρίσις at the παρουσία, is well worth reading: Eadie's, agreeing in the main with the above result, is unfortunately, as so usual with him, overloaded with flowers of rhetoric, never more out of place than in treating lofty subjects of this kind. A good summary of ancient and modern opinions is given in De W.

21, 22.] And you, who were once alienated (subjective or objective? — 'estranged' [in mind], or 'banished' [in fact]? In Eph. ii. 12, it is decidedly objective, for such is the cast of the whole sentence there: so also in ref. Ps.: in Eph. iv. 18 it describes the objective result, with regard to the life of God, of the subjective 'being darkened in the understanding.' It is better then here to follow usage, and interpret objectively—'alienated'—made aliens) (from God,—not ἀπὸ τῆς πολιτείας τοῦ Ἰσρ., nor ἀπὸ τῆς ζωῆς τ. θεοῦ: for 'God' is the subject of the sentence), and at enmity (active or passive? 'hating God,' or 'hated by God?' Mey. takes the latter, as necessary in Rom. v. 10 [see note there]. But here, where the διάνοια and ἔργα τὰ πονηρά are mentioned, there exists no such necessity: the objective state of enmity is grounded in its subjective causes;—and the intelligent responsible being is contemplated in the whole sentence: cf. εἴ γε ἐπιμένετε κ.τ.λ. below. I take ἐχθ. therefore actively, 'hostile to Him') in (dative of reference; not, as Mey. is obliged to take it on account of his passive ἐχθ. of the cause, 'on account of,' &c.: this is not the fact: our passive ἔχθρα subsists not on account of any subjective actuality in us, but on account of the pollution of our parent stock in Adam) your understanding (intellectual part: see on Eph. ii. 3, iv. 18. Erasm.'s rendering, in his Par., 'enemies to reason,' 'etenim qui carni servit, repugnat rationi,' is clearly wrong: διάνοια is a 'vox media,' and cannot signify 'reason:' besides, there is nothing here about 'carni inservire:' that of Tert., Ambr., and Jer., 'enemies to God's will,' rests on the reading αὐτοῦ after διαν.,—see var. readd.: that of Beza, Mich., Storr, and Bähr,—'mente operibus malis intenta,' is allowable constructionally: the verb is followed by ἐν, cf. Ps. lxxii. 8, διενοήθησαν ἐν πονηρίᾳ, Sir. vi. 37; xxxix. 1, and consequently the article before ἐν would not be needed: but is im-

[and so Grot., Calov.],—of which the same may be said:—as against the Docetæ, who maintained the unreality of the incarnation: so Beza, al.; but St. Paul nowhere in this Epistle maintains, as against any adversaries, the doctrine of its reality. I am persuaded that Mey. is right: 'He found occasion enough to write of the reconciliation as he does here and ver. 20, in the angel-following of his readers, in which they ascribed reconciling mediatorship with God partly to higher spiritual beings, who were without a σῶμα τῆς σαρκός') by means of His Death (that being the instrumental cause, without which the reconciliation would not have been effected) to (aim and end, expressed without εἰς τό: as in Eph. i. 4, al. fr.) present you (see Eph. v. 27 and note: not, as a sacrifice) holy and unblameable and irreproachable ('erga Deum . . . . . respectu vestri . . . . respectu proximi,' Beng. But is this quite correct? do not ἀμώμ. and ἀνεγκλ. both refer to blame from without? rather with Meyer, ἁγίους represents the positive, ἀμώμ. and ἀνεγκλ. the negative side of holiness. The question whether sanctitas inhærens or sanctitas imputata is here meant, is best answered by remembering the whole analogy of St. Paul's teaching, in which it is clear that progressive sanctification is ever the end, as regards the Christian, of his justification by faith. Irrespective even of the strong testimony of the next verse, I should uphold here the reference to inherent holiness, the work of the Spirit, consequent indeed on entering into the righteousness of Christ by faith: 'locus est observatione dignus, non conferri nobis gratuitam justitiam in Christo, quin Spiritu etiam regeneremur in obedientiam justitiæ: quemadmodum alibi [1 Cor. i. 30] docet, Christum nobis factum esse justitiam et sanctificationem.' (plural, because the θλίψεις are thought of individually, not as a mass: those sufferings which are wanting) of the tribulations of Christ in my flesh (belongs to ἀνταναπλ., not [as Aug. on Ps. lxxxvi. c. 3, vol. iv. p. 1104, Storr, al.] to τῶν θλίψ. τοῦ χρ., not only because there is no article [τῶν ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου], which would not be absolutely needed, but on account of the context: for if it were so, the clause τῶν θλίψ. τ. χρ. ἐν τῇ σ. μ. would contain in itself that which the whole clause asserts, and thus make it flat and tautological) on behalf of (see on ὑπέρ above) His body, which is the Church (the meaning being this: all the tribulations of Christ's body are Christ's tribulations. Whatever the whole Church has to suffer, even to the end, she suffers for her perfection in holiness and her completion in Him: and the tribulations of Christ will not be complete till the last pang shall have passed, and the last tear have been shed. Every suffering saint of God in every age and position is in fact filling up, in his place and degree, the θλίψεις τοῦ χριστοῦ, in his flesh, and on behalf of His body. Not a pang, not a tear is in vain. The Apostle, as standing out prominent among this suffering body, predicates this of himself κατ' ἐξοχήν; the ἀναπλήρωσις to which we all contribute, was on his part so considerable, as to deserve the name of ἀνταναπλήρωσις itself—I am contributing θλίψεις which one after another fill up the ὑστερήματα. Notice that of the παθήματα τοῦ χριστοῦ not a word is said [see however 2 Cor. i. 5]: the context does not concern, nor does θλίψεις express, those meritorious sufferings which He bore in His person once for all, the measure of which was for ever filled by the one sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, on the cross: He is here regarded as suffering with His suffering people, bearing them in Himself, and being as in Isa. lxiii. 9, "afflicted in all their affliction." The above interpretation is in the main that of Chrys., Thl., Aug., Anselm, Calv., Beza, Luth., Melancth., Est., Corn.-a-Lap., Grot., Calov., Olsh., De W., Ellic., Conyb. The latter refers to Acts ix. 4, and thinks St. Paul remembered those words when he wrote this: and Vitringa (cit. in Wolf) says well, 'Hæ sunt passiones Christi, quia Ecclesia ipsius est corpus, in quo ipse est, habitat, vivit, ergo et patitur.' The other interpretations are 1) that the sufferings are such as Christ would have endured, had he remained longer on earth. So Phot. (in Eadie): ὅσα . . . . ἔπαθεν ἂν κ. ὑπέστη, καθ' ὃν τρόπον κ. πρὶν κηρύσσων κ. εὐαγγελιζόμενος τὴν βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν. 2) That the sufferings are not properly Christ's, but only of the same nature with His. Thus Thdrt., after stating Christ's sufferings in behalf of the Church, says, καὶ ὁ θεῖος ἀπόστολος ὧν αὐτὸς ὑπὲρ αὐτῆς ὑπέστη τὰ τοιαῦτα παθήματα: and so Mey., Schl., Huther, and Winer. But evidently this does not exhaust the phrase here. To resemble, is not to fill up. 3) Storr, al., would render, 'afflictions for Christ's sake,'—which the words will not bear. 4) Some of the Roman Catholic expositors (Bellarmine, Cajetan, al.) maintain hence the doctrine of indulgences: so Corn.-a-Lap. in addition: 'Hinc sequitur non male Bellarminum, Salmeroneum, Franc. Suarez, et alios Doctores Catholicos, cum tractant de Indulgentiis, hæc generalia Apostoli verba extendere ad thesaurum Ecclesiæ, ex quo ipsa dare solet indulgentias: hunc enim thesaurum voluit Deus constare meritis et satisfactionibus non tantum Christi, sed et Apostolorum omniumque Christi Sanctorum: uti definivit Clemens VI. extravagante [on this word, I find in Ducange, glossarium in voce, 'extravagantes in jure canonico dicuntur pontificum Romanorum constitutiones quæ extra corpus canonicum Gratiani, sive extra Decretorum libros vagantur'] unigenitus.' But Estius, although he holds the doctrine to be catholic and apostolic, and 'aliunde satis probata,' yet confesses, 'ex hoc Apostoli loco non videtur admodum solide statui posse. Non enim sermo iste, quo dicit Apostolus se pati pro ecclesia, necessario sic accipiendus est, quod pro redimendis peccatorum pœnis quas fideles debent, patiatur, quod forte nonnihil haberet arrogantiæ: sed percommode sic accipitur, quomodo proxime dixerat "gaudeo in passionibus meis pro vobis," ut nimirum utraque parte significet afflictiones et persecutiones pro salute fidelium, ipsiusque ecclesiæ promovenda toleratas.' The words in italics are at least an ingenuous confession. Con-

All the above fail in not sufficiently taking into account the οἰκον. εἰς ὑμᾶς. Chrys. better, εἰς ὑμᾶς, φησί, πληρῶσαι τ. λόγ. τ. θεοῦ [but this connexion can hardly stand] περὶ τῶν ἐθνῶν λέγει. ποιῶν, ἡ ἀφιεὶς αὐτοὺς ἐπὶ κατορθώματι μέγα φρονεῖν—and similarly Calv., Beza, and De W. Such an inference from the expression is quite legitimate: but not such an exposition. No prominence is given to the doctrine, but it is merely asserted in passing) to make known (γνωρίσαι is not an interpretation of ἐφανερώθη, nor an addition to it, nor result of it, as has been supposed: see on the reference of the verse above) what (how full, how inexhaustible this meaning of τί, necessarily follows from its being joined with a noun of quantity like πλοῦτος) is the richness of the glory of this mystery among the Gentiles (σεμνῶς εἶπε κ. ὄγκον ἐπέθηκεν ἀπὸ πολλῆς διαθέσεως, ἐπιτάσεις ζητῶν ἐπιτάσεων. Chrys. Beware therefore of all attempts to weaken down the sense by resolving the substantives into adjectives by hendiadys. This the E. V. has here avoided: why not always? Next, as to the meaning of these substantives. All turns on τῆς δόξης. Is this the [subjective] glory of the elevated human character, brought in by the Gospel [so Chrys., Thdrt. (Calv. ?)]: or is it the glory of God, manifested [objective] by His grace in this mystery, revealing His Person to the Gentiles? Neither of these seems to satisfy the conditions of the sentence, in which τῆς δόξης reappears below with ἡ ἐλπὶς prefixed. On this account, we must understand it of the glory of which the Gentiles are to become partakers by the revelation of this mystery: i. e. the glory which is begun here, and completed at the Lord's coming, see Rom. viii. 17, 18. And it is the glory of, belonging to, this mystery, because the mystery contains and reveals it as a portion of its contents. The richness of this glory is unfolded and made known by God's Spirit as the Gospel is received ἐν τ. ἔθν., as the most wonderful display of it: the Gentiles having been sunk so low in moral and spiritual degradation. See Chr. and Calv. in Mey.), which (mystery: this is more in analogy with St. Paul's own method of speaking than to understand ὅ of τὸ πλοῦτος: cf. τὸ ἀνεξιχνίαστον πλοῦτος τοῦ χριστοῦ, Eph. iii. 8,—and τὸ τῆς εὐσεβείας μυστήριον, ὃς ἐφανερώθη ἐν σαρκὶ κ.τ.λ. 1 Tim. iii. 16. CHAP. II. FIRST PART OF THE EPISTLE. His earnestness in entering into and forwarding the Christian life among them, so amply set forth in ch. i., is now more pointedly directed to warning them against false teachers. This he does by 1) connecting his conflict just spoken of, with the confirmation in spiritual knowledge of themselves and others whom he had not seen (vv. 1—3): 2) warning them against false wisdom which might lead them away from Christ (vv. 4—23): and that a) generally and in hints (vv. 4—15),—b) specifically and plain-spokenly (vv. 16—23). 1.] For (follows on, and justifies, while it exemplifies, ἀγωνιζόμενος, ch. i. 29) I would have you know how great (emphatic; not only that I have an ἀγών, but how great it is. many as have not seen ("the form ἑώρακαν is decidedly Alexandrian . . . . The 'sonstige Gebrauch Pauli' urged against it by Mey. is imaginary, as the third person plural does not elsewhere occur in St. Paul's Epistles." Ellicott) my face in the flesh (my corporal presence: ἐν σαρκί must not be joined with the verb, as Chrys. seems to have done, who adds, δείκνυσιν ἐνταῦθα, ὅτι ἑώρων συνεχῶς ἐν πνεύματι; for in ver. 5 the σαρκί is attached to the Apostle. But it is not necessary nor natural, with Estius, to see any 'παινώσεις, ut intelligant pluris faciendam esse præsentiam spiritus quam carnis.' Rather is the tendency of this verse the other way—to exalt the importance of the Apostle's bodily presence with a church, if its defect caused him such anxiety), that (object of the ἀγών) their hearts (these are the words on which the interpretation of the former καὶ ὅσοι must turn. If αὐτῶν apply to a separate class of persons, who had not seen him, whereas the Colossians and Laodiceans had, how are we to bring them into the ἀγών? In ver. 4 the third person αὐτῶν becomes ὑμᾶς. Where is the link, on this hypothesis, that binds them together? The sentence will stand thus: "I am anxious for you who have seen me, and for others who have not: for these last, that &c. &c. This I say that no man may deceive you." What logical deduction can there be, from the circumstances of others, to theirs, unless they are included in the fact predicated of those others? in a word, unless the ὅσοι above include the Colossians and Laodiceans? Thus the αὐτῶν extends to the whole category of those who had never seen him, and the ὑμᾶς of ver. 4 singles them specially out from among this category for special exhortation and warning. This seeming to be the only logical interpretation of the αὐτῶν and ὑμᾶς, the καί above must be ruled accordingly, to be not copulative but generalizing: see there) may be confirmed (see reff. It can hardly be doubted here, where he is treating, not of troubles and persecutions, but of being shaken from the faith, that the word, so manifold in its bearings, and so difficult to express in English, carries with it the meaning of strengthening, not of comforting merely. If we could preserve in 'comfort' the trace of its derivation from 'confortari,' it might answer here: but in our present usage, it does not convey any idea of strengthening. This I still hold against Ellicott), they being knit together (so E. V. well: not 'instructi,' as vulg. notating on the divine name to specify to which Person it belongs. Thus τοῦ θεοῦ having been original, πατρός was placed against it by some, χριστοῦ or τοῦ χριστοῦ by others: and then these found their way into the text in various combinations, some of which from their difficulty gave rise again to alterations, as may be seen in various readings. The reading in text, as accounting for all the rest, has been adopted by Griesb., Scholz, Tischdf. [edn. 2], Olsh., De Wette, al.: τοῦ θεοῦ χριστοῦ by Mey. and Steiger. This latter is also edited, in pursuance of his plan, by Lachm. The shorter reading was by that plan excluded from his present text, as not coming before his notice. In the present digest, the principal differing readings are printed in the same type as that in the text, because I have been utterly unable to fix the reading on any external authority, and am compelled to take refuge in that which appears to have been the origin of the rest. One thing is clear, that τοῦ θεοῦ χριστοῦ, which Ellicott adopts 'with some confidence,' is simply one among many glosses, of which it is impossible to say that any has overwhelming authority. Such expressions were not corrected ordinarily by omission of any words, but constantly by supplementing them in various ways): in which (mystery, as Grot., Beng., Mey., De W., al. [Bisping well remarks, that the two in fact run into one, as Christ is Himself the μυστήριον τοῦ θεοῦ. He might have referred to ch. i. 27 and 1 Tim. iii. 16]—not 'in whom,' as E. V. [but 'wherein' in marg.], and so, understanding 'whom' of Christ, Chrys., Thdrt., al.: for it is unnatural to turn aside from the main subject of the sentence,—the μυστήριον, and make this relative clause epexegetic of the dependent genitive merely. To this view the term ἀπόκρυφοι also testifies: see below) are all the secret (the ordinary rendering is, to make ἀπόκρυφοι the predicate after εἰσὶν: 'is which are all, &c. hidden.' The objection to this is, that it is contrary to fact: the treasures are not hidden, but revealed. The meaning given by Bähr, B.-Crus., and Robinson [Lex.], 'laid up,' lying concealed, ἀποκείμενα, does not belong to the word, nor is either of the places in the canonical LXX [reff.] an example of it. The rendering which I have adopted is that of Meyer, and I am persuaded on consideration that it is not only the only logical but the only grammatical one also. The ordinary one would require ἀποκεκρυμμένοι, or with ἀπόκρυφοι, a different arrangement of the words ἐν ᾧ ἀπόκρυφοί εἰσιν, or ἐν ᾧ εἰσὶν ἀπόκρυφοι. The objection, that for our rendering οἱ ἀπόκρυφοι would be required [Bähr], shews ignorance of the logic of such usage. Where the whole subject is covered by the extent of the predicate, the latter, even though separated by an intervening clause from the former, does not require the specification by the article. It may have it, but need not. Thus if all the men in a fortress were Athenians, I might say 1) οἱ ἄνδρες ἐν τούτῳ ἐν τῷ τείχει οἱ Ἀθηναῖοι: but I might also say 2) οἱ ἄνδρες ἐν τούτῳ ἐν τῷ τείχει Ἀθηναῖοι. If however, part of the men were Platæans, I must use 1), and could not use 2). Here, it is not asserted that 'all the treasures, &c. which are secret, are contained in the mystery,' others being implied which are not secret,—but the implication is the other way: 'the treasures, &c. are all secret, and all contained in the mystery.' Ellicott's rendering of ἀπόκρυφοι as an adverbial predicate, 'hiddenly,' is quite admissible, and tallies better with the

This being so, it may be better to give the τῆς the possessive sense, the better to mark that it is not all philosophy which the Apostle is here blaming: for Thdrt. is certainly wrong in saying ἣν ἅπας πιθανολογίαν, ἐνταῦθα φιλοσοφίαν ἐκάλεσε,—the former being, as Mey. observes, the form of imparting,—this, the thing itself. The φιλοσοφ. is not necessarily Greek, as Tert. de præscr. 7, vol. ii. p. 20 ['fuerat Athenis']—Clem. Strom. i. 11, 50, vol. i. p. 346, P. [οὐ πᾶσαν, ἀλλὰ τὴν Ἐπικούρειον], Grot. al. As De W. observes, Josephus calls the doctrine of the Jewish sects philosophy: Antt. xviii. 2. 1, — Ἰουδαίοις φιλοσοφίαι τρεῖς ἦσαν, ἥ τε τῶν Ἐσσηνῶν κ. ἡ τῶν Σαδδουκαίων, τρίτην δὲ ἐφιλοσόφουν οἱ Φαρισαῖοι. The character of the philosophy here meant, as gathered from the descriptions which follow, was that mixture of Jewish and Oriental, which afterwards expanded into gnosticism), according to the tradition of men (this tradition, derived from men, human and not divine in its character, set the rule to this his philosophy, and according to this he ἀυλαγάγει: such is the grammatical construction; but seeing that his philosophy was the instrument by which, the character given belongs in fact to his philosophy), according to the elements (see on Gal. iv. 3: the rudimentary lessons: i. e. the ritualistic observances ['nam continuo post exempli loco speciem unam adducit, circumcisionem scilicet,' Calv.] in which they were becoming entangled) of the world (all these belonged to the earthly side—were the carnal and imperfect phase of knowledge—now the perfect was come, the imperfect was done away), and not (negative characteristic, as the former were the affirmative characteristics, of this philosophy) according to Christ ("who alone is," as Bisp. observes, "the true rule of all genuine philosophy, the only measure as for all life acceptable to God, so for all truth in thought likewise: every true philosophy must therefore be κατὰ χριστόν, must begin and end with Him"): 9.] (supply, 'as all true philosophy ought to be') because in Him (emphatic: in Him alone) dwelleth (now, in His exaltation) all the fulness (cf. on ch. i. 19, and see below) of the Godhead (Deity: the essential being of God: 'das Gott sein,' as Meyer. θεότης, the abstract of θεός, must not be confounded with θειότης the abstract of θεῖος, divine, which occurs in Rom. i. 20, where see Fritzsche's note. θεότης does not occur in the classics, but is found in Lucian, Icaromenippus, c. 9: τὸν μέν τινα πρῶτον θεὸν ἐπεκάλουν, τοῖς δὲ τὰ δεύτερα κ. τὰ τρίτα ἔνεμον τῆς θεότητος. 'The fulness of the Godhead' here spoken of must be taken, as indeed the context shews, metaphysically, and not as 'all fulness' in ch. i. 19, where the historical Christ, as manifested in redemption, was in question; see this well set forth in Mey.'s note. There, the lower side, so to speak, of that fulness, was set forth—the side which is presented to us here, is the higher side. Some strangely take πλήρωμα here to mean the Church—so Heinr. in Mey.: "Ab eo collecta est omnis ex omnibus sine discrimine gentibus ecclesia, eo tanquam οἴκῳ, tanquam σώματι, continetur gubernaturque." Others again hold Christ here to mean the Church, in whom [or which] the πλήρωμα dwells: so τινές in Thdrt. and Chrys.) bodily (i. e., manifested corporeally, in His present glorified Body—cf. on οἰκεῖ above, and Phil. iii. 21. Before His incarnation, it dwelt in Him, as the λόγος ἔνσαρκος, but not σωματικῶς, as now that He is the λόγος ἔνσαρκος. This is the obvious, and

V. 'are circumcised,'—the reference being to the historical fact of their baptism) with a circumcision not wrought by hands (see Eph. ii. 11, and Rom. ii. 29. The same reference to spiritual [ethical] circumcision is found in Deut. x. 16; xxx. 6: Ezek. xliv. 7: Acts vii. 51), in (consisting in—which found its realization in) your putting off (= when you threw off: ἀπεκδ., the putting off and laying aside, as a garment: an allusion to actual circumcision,—see below) of the body of the flesh (i. e. as ch. i. 22, the body of which the material was flesh: but more here: so also its designating attribute, its leading principle, was fleshliness—the domination of the flesh which is a σὰρξ ἁμαρτίας, Rom. viii. 3. This body is put off in baptism, the sign and seal of the new life. "When ethically circumcised, i. e. translated by μετάνοια out of the state of sin into that of the Christian life of faith, we have no more the σῶμα τῆς σαρκός: for the body, which we bear, is disarrayed of its sinful σάρξ as such, quoad its sinful quality: we are no more ἐν τῇ σαρκί as before, when lust ἐνηργεῖτο ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν [Rom. vii. 5, cf. ib. ver. 23]: we are no more σάρκινοι, πεπραμένοι ὑπὸ τὴν ἁμαρτίαν [Rom. vii. 14], and walk no more κατὰ σάρκα, but ἐν καινότητι πνεύματος [Rom. vii. 6], so that our members are ὅπλα δικαιοσύνης τῷ θεῷ [Rom. vi. 13]. This Christian transformation is set forth in its ideal conception, irrespective of its imperfect realization in our experience." Meyer. To understand τὸ σῶμα to signify 'the mass,' as Calv. ['corpus appellat massam ex omnibus vitiis conflatam, eleganti metaphora'], Grot. ['omne quod ex multis componitur solet hoc vocabulo appellari'], al.,—besides that it is bound up very much with the reading τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν, is out of keeping with N. T. usage, and with the context, which is full of images connected with the body), —in (parallel to ἐν before—then the circumcision without hands was explained, now it is again adduced with another epithet bringing it nearer home to them) the circumcision of Christ (belonging to, brought about by union with, Christ: nearly =, but expresses more than 'Christian circumcision,' inasmuch as it shews that the root and cause of this circumcision without hands is in Christ, the union with whom is immediately set forth. Two other interpretations are given: 1) that in which Christ is regarded as the circumciser: ὁ χρ. περιτέμνει ἐν τῷ βαπτίσματι, ἀπεκδύων ἡμᾶς τοῦ παλαιοῦ βίου, Thl., but not exactly so Chrys., who says, οὐκέτι φησὶν ἐν μαχαίρᾳ ἡ περιτ., ἀλλ' ἐν αὐτῷ τῷ χρ.· οὐ γὰρ χεῖρ ἐπάγει, καθὼς ἐκεῖ, τ. περιτομὴν ταύτην, ἀλλὰ τὸ πνεῦμα. Beza combines both — 'Christus ipsę nos intus suo spiritu circumcidit.' 2) that in which Christ is the circumcised—so Schöttg.: "per circumcisionem Christi nos omnes circumcisi sumus. Hoc est: circumcisio Christi qui se nostri causa sponte legi subjecit, tam efficax fuit in omnes homines, ut nulla amplius circumcisione carnis opus sit, præcipue quum in locum illius baptismus a Christo surrogatus sit" [i. p. 816]. The objection to both is, that they introduce irrelevants elements into the context. The circumcision which Christ works, would not naturally be followed by συνταφέντες αὐτῷ, union with Him: that which was wrought on Him might be thus followed, but would not come in naturally in a passage which describes, not the universal efficacy of the rite once for all performed on Him, but the actual undergoing of it in a spiritual sense, by each one of us), 12.] (goes on to connect this still more closely with the person of Christ—q. d., in the circumcision of Christ, to whom you were united, &c.)—buried together (i. e. 'when you were buried:' the aorist participle, as so often, is contemporary with the preceding past verb) with Him in your baptism (the new life being begun at baptism,—an image familiar alike to Jews and Christians,—the process itself of baptism is regarded as the burial of the former life: originally, perhaps, owing to the practice of immersion, which would most naturally give rise to the idea: but to maintain from such a circumstance that immersion is necessary in baptism, is surely the merest trifling, and a resuscitation of the very ceremonial spirit which the Apostle here is arguing against. As reasonably might it be argued, from the ἀπέκδυσις here, that nakedness was an essential in that sacrament. The things represented by both figures belong to the essentials of the Christian life: the minor details of the sacrament which corresponded to them, may in different ages or climates be varied; but the spiritual figures remain. At the same time, if circumstances concurred,—e. g. a climate where the former practice was always safe, and a part of the world, or time of life, where the latter would be no shock to decency,—there can be no question that the external proprieties of baptism ought to be complied with. And on this principle the baptismal services of the Church of England are constructed); in which (i. e. baptism: not, as Mey. [and so most expositors], 'in whom,' i. e. Christ. For, although it is tempting enough to regard the ἐν ᾧ καί as parallel with the ἐν ᾧ καί above, we should be thus introducing a second and separate leading idea into the argument, manifestly occupied with one leading idea, viz. the completeness of your Christian circumcision,—cf. ἀκροβυστίᾳ again below,—as realized in your baptism: whereas on this hypothesis we should be breaking off from baptism altogether,—for there would be no link to connect the present sentence with the former, but we must take up again from ἐξουσίας. This indeed is freely confessed by Mey., who holds that all allusion to baptism is at an end here, and that the following is a benefit conferred by faith as separate from baptism. But see below. His objection, that if ἐν ᾧ applied to baptism, it would not correspond to the rising again, which should be ἐξ οὗ, or at all events the unlocal δι' οὗ, arises from the too precise materialization of the image. As ἐν before did not necessarily apply to the mere going under the water, but to the process of the sacrament, so ἐν now does not necessarily apply to the coming up out of the water, but also to the process of the sacrament. In it, we both die and rise again,—both unclothe and are clothed) ye were also raised again with Him (not your material, but your spiritual resurrection is in the foreground: it is bound on, it is true, to His material resurrection, and brings with it in the background, yours:

See the other side ingeniously, but to me not convincingly defended in Ellic.'s note here. He has to resort to the somewhat lame expedient of altering αὐτῷ into αὐτῷ: and even then the sentence would labour under the theological indecorum of making our Lord not the Resumer of His own Life merely, but the very Worker of acts which are by Himself and His Apostles always predicated of the Father. It will be seen by the whole translation and exegesis which follows, that I cannot for a moment accept the view which makes Christ the subject of these clauses) quickened you (this repetition of the personal pronoun is by no means unexampled, cf. forgiven (the aorist participle [which aor. 'having forgiven' is in English, we having but one past active participle] is here not contemporaneous with συνεζωοπ. but antecedent: this forgiveness was an act of God wrought once for all in Christ, cf. ἡμῖν below, and 2 Cor. v. 19; Eph. iv. 32) us (he here passes from the particular to the general—from the Colossian Gentiles to all believers) all our transgressions (ἃ τὴν πικρότητα ἐποίει, Chrys.: but this, though true, makes the χαρισάμ. apply to the συνεζ., which it does not), having wiped out (contemporary with χαρισάμενος—in fact the same act explained in its conditions and details. On the word, see reff., and Plat. Rep. vi. p. 501, τὸ μὲν ἄν, οἶμαι, ἐξαλείφοιεν, τὸ δὲ πάλιν ἐγγράφοιεν: Dem. 468. 1, εἶθ' ὑμεῖς ἔτι σκοπεῖτε εἰ χρὴ τοῦτον [τὸν νόμον] ἐξαλεῖψαι, καὶ οὐ πάλαι βεβούλευσθε;) the handwriting in decrees (cf. the similar expression τὸν νόμον τῶν ἐντολῶν ἐν δόγμασιν, Eph. ii. 15, and notes. Here, the force of -γραφον passes on to the dative, as if it were τὸ γεγραμμένον τοῖς δόγμασιν—cf. Plato, Ep. vii. p. 343 a, κ. ταῦτα εἰς ἀμεταχίνητον, ὃ δὴ πάσχει τὰ γεγραμμένα τύποις. This explanation of the construction is negatived by Ellicott, on the ground of χειρόγραφος being "a synthetic compound, and apparently incapable of such a decomposition:" referring to Donaldson, Gram. § 369 [it is § 377]. But there it is laid down that in synthetic compounds of this kind, the accent makes the difference between transitive and intransitive, without any assertion that the verbal element may not pass on in the construction. If χειρόγραφον means written by hands, then surely the element in which the writing consists may follow. Meyer would make the dative instrumental: but it can be so only in a very modified sense, the contents taken as the instrument whereby the sense is conveyed. The χειρόγρ. represents the whole law, the obligatory bond which was against us [see below], and is apparently used because the Decalogue, representing that law, was written on tables of stone with the finger of God. The most various interpretations of it have been given. Calv., Beza, al., understand it of the mere ritual law: Calov., of the moral, against πάντα τὰ παραπτ. above: Luther, Zwingl., al., of the law of conscience. Thdrt.'s view is very curious: he interprets τὸ χειρόγρ. to mean our human body,—ὁ τοίνυν θεὸς λόγος, τὴν ἡμετέραν φύσιν ἀναλαβών, πάσης αὐτὴν ἁμαρτίας ἐλευθέραν ἐφύλαξε, κ. ἐξήλειψε τὰ κακῶς ὑφ' ἡμῶν ἐν αὐτῇ γενόμενα τῶν ὀφλημάτων γράμματα. He urges as an objection to the usual interpretation, that the law was for Jews, not Gentiles, whereas the Apostle says καθ' ἡμῶν. But this is answered by remembering, that the law was just as much against the Gentiles as against the Jews: it stood in their way of approach to God, see Rom. iii. 19: through it they would be compelled to come to Him, and by it, whether written on stone or on fleshy tablets, they were condemned before Him. Chrys., Œc., Thl., al., would understand τὸ χειρόγραφον ὃ ἐποίησε πρὸς Ἀδὰμ ὁ θεὸς εἰπών ᾗ ἂν ἡμέρᾳ φάγῃς ἀπὸ τοῦ ξύλου, ἀποθάνῃ—but this is against the whole anti-judaistic turn of the sentence) which was hostile to us (the repetition of the sentiment already contained in καθ' ἡμῶν seems to be made by way of stronger emphasis, as against the false teachers, reasserting and invigorating the fact that the law was no help, but a hindrance to us. There does not appear to be any force of '*sub*contrarius' in ὑπεναντίος; Mey. refers, besides reff., to Herod. iii. 80, τὸ δ' ὑπεναντίον τούτου εἰς τοὺς πολίτας πέφυκε — to ὑπεναντιότης, Diog. Laert. x. 77: ὑπεναντίωμα, Aristot. poet. xxvi. 22: ὑπεναντίωσις, Demosth. 1405. 18), and (not only so, but) has taken it (the handwriting itself, thus obliterated) away (i. e. 'from out of the way,' cf. reff.: Dem. de corona, p. 354, τὸ καταψεύδεσθαι κ. δι' ἔχθραν τι λέγειν ἀνελόντας ἐκ μέσου: other places in Kypke, ii. 323: and the contrary expression, Dem. 682. 1,—οὐδὲν ἂν ἦν ἐν μέσῳ πολεμεῖν ἡμᾶς πρὸς Καρδιανοὺς ἤδη), by nailing (contemporary with the beginning of ἦρκεν) it to the cross ("since by the death of Christ on

15.] The utmost care must be taken to interpret this verse according to the requirements of grammar and of the context. The first seems to me to necessitate the rendering of ἀπεκδυσάμενος, not, as the great majority of Commentators, 'having spoiled' (ἀπεκδύσας), a meaning unexampled for the middle, and precluded by the plain usage, by the Apostle himself, a few verses below, ch. iii. 9, of the same word ἀπεκδυσάμενοι,—but 'having put off,' 'divested himself of.' Then the second must guide us to the meaning of τὰς ἀρχὰς καὶ τὰς ἐξουσίας. Most Commentators have at once assumed these to be the infernal powers, or evil angels: relying on Eph. vi. 12, where undoubtedly such is the specific reference of these general terms. But the terms being general, such specific reference must be determined by the context of each passage,—or, indeed, there may be no such specific reference at all, but they may be used in their fullest general sense. Now the words have occurred before in this very passage, ver. 10, where Christ is exalted as the κεφαλὴ πάσης ἀρχῆς κ. ἐξουσίας: and it is hardly possible to avoid connecting our present expression with that, seeing that in τὰς ἀρχὰς κ. τὰς ἐξουσίας the articles seem to contain a manifest reference to it. Now, what is the context? Is it in any way relevant to the fact of the law being antiquated by God in the great Sacrifice of the atonement, to say that He, in that act (or, according to others, Christ in that act), spoiled and triumphed over the infernal potentates? Or would the following οὖν deduce any legitimate inference from such a fact? But, suppose the matter to stand in this way. The law was διαταγεὶς δι' ἀγγέλων (Gal. iii. 19: cf. Acts vii. 53), ὁ δι' ἀγγέλων λαληθεὶς λόγος (Heb. ii. 2): cf. also Jos. Antt. xv. 5. 3, ἡμῶν τὰ κάλλιστα τῶν δογμάτων, κ. τὰ ὁσιώτατα τῶν ἐν τοῖς νόμοις δι' ἀγγέλων παρὰ τ. θεοῦ μαθόντων;—they were the promulgators of the χειρόγραφον τοῖς δόγμασιν. In that promulgation of theirs, God was pleased to reveal Himself of old. That writing, that investiture, so to speak, of God, was first wiped out, soiled and rendered worthless, and then nailed to the Cross—abrogated and suspended there. Thus God ἀπεξεδύσατο τὰς ἀρχὰς κ. τὰς ἐξουσίας—divested Himself of, put off from Himself, that ἀγγέλων διαταγή, manifesting Himself henceforward without a veil in the exalted Person of Jesus. And the act of triumph, by which God has for ever subjected all principality and power to Christ, and made Him to be the only Head of His people, in whom they are complete, was that sacrifice, whereby all the law was accomplished. In that, the ἀρχαὶ κ. ἐξουσίαι were all subjected to Christ, all plainly declared to be powerless as regards His work and His people, and triumphed over by Him, see Phil. ii. 8, 9: Eph. i. 20, 21. No difficulty need be created, on this explanation, by the objection, that thus more prominence would be given to angelic agency in the law than was really the fact: the answer is, that the prominence which is given, is owing to the errors of the false teachers, who had evidently associated the Jewish observances in some way with the worship of angels: St. Paul's argument will go only to this, that whatever part the angelic powers may have had, or be supposed to have had, in the previous dispensation, all such interposition was now entirely at an end, that dispensation itself being once for all antiquated and put away. Render then,—putting off (by the absence of a copula, the vigour of the sentence is increased. The participle is con-

There seems no reason to attach the sense of putting to shame [παραδειγματίσαι] to the simple verb. That this sense is involved in Matt. i. 19, is owing to the circumstances of the context) in (element of the δειγματίσαι) openness (of speech; declaring and revealing by the Cross that there is none other but Christ the Head πάσης ἀρχῆς κ. ἐξουσίας), triumphing over them (as in 2 Cor. ii. 14, we are said [see note there] to be led captive in Christ's triumph, our real victory being our defeat by Him,—so here the principalities and powers, which are next above us in those ranks of being which are all subjected to and summed up in Him) in Him (Christ: not 'in it,' viz. the cross, which gives a very feeble meaning after the ἐγείραντος αὐτόν, and συνεζωοπ. σὺν αὐτῷ above). The ordinary interpretation of this verse has been attempted by some to be engrafted into the context, by understanding the χειρόγρ. of a guilty conscience, the ἀρχ. κ. ἐξ. as the infernal powers, the accusers of man, and the scope of the exhortation as being to dissuade the Colossians from fear or worship of them. So Neander, in a paraphrase (Denkwürdigkeiten, p. 12) quoted by Conyb. and Howson, edn. 2, vol. ii. p. 478 note. But manifestly this is against the whole spirit of the passage. It was θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων to which they were tempted—and οἱ ἄγγελοι can bear no meaning but the angels of God.

Mey. quotes Il. τ. 210, Od. α. 191, Plat. Legg. vi. p. 783 c, to shew that in classical Greek the meanings are sometimes interchanged. The same is true of πόσις and πόμα) and (or) in drinking (i. e. in the matter of the whole cycle of legal ordinances and prohibitions which regarded eating and drinking: these two words being perhaps taken not separately and literally,—for there does not appear to have been in the law any special prohibition against drinks,—but as forming together a category in ordinary parlance. If however it is desired to press each word, the reference of πόσις must be to the Nazarite vow, Num. vi. 3), or in respect (reff.: Chrys. and Thdrt. give it the extraordinary meaning of 'in part,'—ἐν μέρει ἑορτῆς· οὐ γὰρ δὴ πάντα κατεῖχον τὰ πρότερα: Mey. explains it, 'in the category of'—which is much the same as the explanation in the text) of a feast or new-moon or sabbaths (i. e. yearly, monthly, or weekly celebrations; see reff.), 17.] which (if the sing. be read, the relative may refer either to the aggregate of the observances mentioned, or to the last mentioned, i. e.

the Sabbath. Or it may be singular by attraction, and refer to all, just as if it were plural, see Matt. xii. 4) is (or as in rec. are: not, 'was,' or were: he speaks of them in their nature, abstractedly) a shadow (not, a sketch, σκιαγραφία or -φημα, which meaning is precluded by the term opposed being σῶμα, not the finished picture,—but literally the shadow: see below) of things to come (the blessings of the Christian covenant: these are the substance, and the Jewish ordinances the mere type or resemblance, as the shadow is of the living man. But we must not, as Mey., press the figure so far as to imagine the shadow to be cast back by the τὰ μέλλοντα going before [cf. also Thdrt., somewhat differently, προλαμβάνει δὲ ἡ σκιὰ τὸ σῶμα ἀνίσχοντος τοῦ φωτός· ἐς εἶναι σκιὰν μὲν τὸν νόμον, σῶμα δὲ τὴν χάριν, φῶς δὲ τὸν δεσπότην χριστόν]: nor with the same Commentator, interpret τῶν μελλ. of the yet future blessings of the state following the παρουσία,—for which ἐστιν [see above] gives no ground. Nor again must we imagine that the obscurity [Suicer, al.] of the Jewish dispensation is alluded to, there being no subjective comparison instituted between the two,—only their objective relation stated); but the body (the substance, of which the other is the shadow) belongs to Christ (i. e. the substantial blessings, which those legal observances typified, are attached to, brought in by, found in union with, Christ: see on the whole figure Heb. viii. 5; x. 1). We may observe, that if the ordinance of the Sabbath had been, in any form, of lasting obligation on the Christian church, it would have been quite impossible for the Apostle to have spoken thus. The fact of an obligatory rest of one day, whether the seventh or the first, would have been directly in the teeth of his assertion here: the holding of such would have been still to retain the shadow, while we possess the substance. And no answer can be given to this by the transparent special-pleading, that he is speaking only of that which was Jewish in such observances; the whole argument being general, and the axiom of ver. 17 universally applicable.

I cannot see that Ellicott in loc. has at all invalidated this. To hold, as he does, that the sabbath was a σκιά of the Lord's day, is surely to fall into the same error as we find in the title of 1 Cor. x. in our authorized bibles,—'The Jewish Sacraments were types of ours.' The antitype is not to be found in another and a higher type, but in the eternal verity which both shadow forth. An extraordinary punctuation of this verse was proposed by some mentioned by Chrys.: οἱ μὲν οὖν τοῦτο στίζουσι, τὸ δὲ σῶμα, χριστοῦ. ἡ δὲ ἀλήθεια ἐπὶ χριστοῦ γέγονεν· οἱ δὲ, τὸ δὲ σῶμα χριστοῦ μηδεὶς ὑμᾶς καταβραβευέτω· and Aug. ep. 149 [59]. 27, vol. ii. p. 841 f., has 'corpus autem Christi nemo vos convincat. Turpe est, inquit . . . ut cum sitis corpus Christi, seducamini umbris.' No wonder that the same father should confess of the passage, 'nec ego sine caligine intelligo.'

18—23.] See above—warning, 2ndly, with reference to angel-worship and asceticism. 18.] Let no one of purpose (such is by far the best rendering of θέλων,—to take it with καταβραβ. and understand it precisely as in ref. 2 Pet. And thus apparently Thl.: θέλουσιν ὑμᾶς καταβραβεύειν διὰ ταπεινοφροσ. Mey. pronounces this meaning 'ganz unpaßend,' and controverts the passages brought to defend it; omitting however ref. 2 Pet. So also does Ellicott, believing it to "impute to the false teachers a frightful and indeed suicidal malice, which is neither justified by the context, nor in any way credible." But his own "desiring to do it" is hardly distinguishable from that other: nor does it at all escape the imputation of motive which he finds so improbable. But surely it is altogether relevant, imputing to the false teachers not only error, but insidious designs also. Others take θέλων with ἐν ταπ., keeping however its reference as above, and understanding, as Phot. in Œc., τοῦτο ποιεῖν after it. So Thdrt., τοῦτο τοίνυν συνεβούλευον ἐκεῖνοι γίνεσθαι ταπεινοφροσύνῃ δῆθεν κεχρημένοι,—Calv., 'volens id facere,'—Mey., Eadie, al. This latter, after Bengel, assigns as his reason for adopting this view, that the participles θέλων, ἐμβατεύων, φυσιούμενος, κρατῶν, form a series. This however is not strictly true —for θέλων would stand in a position of emphasis which does not belong to the next two: rather should we thus expect ἐν ταπ. θέλων κ. θρ. τῶν ἀγγ. I cannot help thinking this rendering flat and spiritless. Others again suppose a harsh Hebraism, common in the LXX [reff., especially Ps. cxlvi. 10], but not found in the N. T., by which θέλειν ἐν is put for חפץ, 'to have pleasure in.' So Aug., Est., Olsh., al. The principal objection to this rendering here is, that it would be irrelevant. Not the delight which the false teacher takes in his ταπ. &c., but the fact of it as operative on the Colossians, and its fleshly sources, are adduced) defraud you of your prize (see reff. Demosth. Mey. points out the difference between καταβρ., a fraudulent adjudication with hostile intent against the person wronged, and παραβραβεύειν, which is merely, as Thdrt. explains this, ἀδίκως βραβεύειν. So Polyb. xxiv. 1. 12, τινὲς δ' ἐγκαλοῦντες τοῖς κρίμασιν, ὡς παραβεβραβευμένοις, διαφθείραντος τοῦ Φιλίππου τοὺς δικαστάς. Supplying this, which Chrys. has not marked, we may take his explanation: καταβραβευθῆναι γάρ ἐστιν ὅταν παρ' ἑτέρων μὲν ἡ νίκη, παρ' ἑτέρων δὲ τὸ βραβεῖον. Zonaras gives it better, in Suicer ii. 49: καταβρ. ἐστι, τὸ μὴ τὸν νικήσαντα ἀξιοῦν τοῦ βραβείου, ἀλλ' ἑτέρῳ διδόναι αὐτό, ἀδικουμένου τοῦ νικήσαντος. This deprivation of their prize, and this wrong, they would suffer at the hands of those who would draw them away from Christ the giver of the prize [2 Tim. iv. 8. James i. 12. 1 Pet. v. 4], and lower them to the worship of intermediate spiritual beings. The various meanings, —'ne quis brabeutæ potestatem usurpans atque adeo abutens, vos currentes moderetur, perperamque præscribat quid sequi quid fugere debeatis præmium accepturi' [Beng.], —'nemo adversum vos rectoris partes sibi ultro sumat' [Beza and similarly Corn.-a-Lap.], —'præmium, id est libertatem a Christo indultam, exigere' [Grot.],—are all more or less departures from the meaning of the word) in (as the element and sphere of his καταβραβ.) humility (αἵρεσις ἦν παλαιὰ λεγόντων τινῶν ὅτι οὐ δεῖ τὸν χριστὸν ἐπικαλεῖσθαι εἰς βοήθειαν, ἢ εἰς προσαγωγὴν τὴν πρὸς τὸν θεόν, ἀλλὰ τοὺς ἀγγέλους ὡς τάχα τοῦ τὸν χριστὸν ἐπικαλεῖσθαι πρὸς τὰ εἰρημένα μείζονος ὄντος τῆς ἡμετέρας ἀξίας. τοῦτο δὲ τάχα ταπεινούμενοι ἔλεγον. Zonaras in canon 35 of the Council of Laodicea, in Suicer i. p. 45. Similarly Thdrt., λέγοντες ὡς ἀόρατος ὁ τῶν ὅλων θεός, ἀνεφικτός τε κ. ἀκατάληπτος, κ. προσήκει διὰ τῶν ἀγγέλων τὴν θείαν εὐμένειαν πραγματεύεσθαι. Aug. Conf. x. 42, vol. i. p. 807, says: "Quem invenirem, qui me reconciliaret tibi? abeundum mihi fuit ad angelos? . . . . multi conantes ad te redire, neque per se ipsos valentes, sicut audio, tentaverunt hæc, et inciderunt in desiderium curiosarum visionum, et digni habiti sunt illusionibus." So that no ironical sense need be supposed) and (explicative, or appending a specific form of the general ταπεινοφρ.) worship of the angels (genitive objective, 'worship paid to the holy angels:' not subjective, as Schöttg., Luther, Rosenm., al.: cf. Jos. Antt. viii. 8. 4, τοῦ ναοῦ κ. τῆς θρησκείας τῆς ἐν αὐτῷ τοῦ θεοῦ; Justin M. cohort. ad Græc. § 38, p. 35,—ἐπὶ τὴν τῶν μὴ θεῶν ἐτράπησαν θρησκείαν. With reference to the fact of the existence of such teaching at Colossæ, Thdrt. gives an interesting notice: οἱ τῷ νόμῳ συνηγοροῦντες καὶ τοὺς ἀγγέλους σέβειν αὐτοῖς εἰσηγοῦντο, διὰ τούτων λέγοντες δεδόσθαι τὸν νόμον. ἔμεινε δὲ τοῦτο τὸ πάθος ἐν τῇ Φρυγίᾳ κ. The canon of the council of Laodicea [A.D. 360] runs thus: οὐ δεῖ χριστιανοὺς ἐγκαταλείπειν τὴν ἐκκλησίαν τοῦ θεοῦ, κ. ἀπιέναι, κ. ἀγγέλους ὀνομάζειν, κ. συνάξεις ποιεῖν, ἅπερ ἀπηγόρευται. εἴ τις οὖν εὑρεθῇ ταύτῃ τῇ κεκρυμμένῃ εἰδωλολατρείᾳ σχολάζων, ἔστω ἀνάθεμα, ὅτι ἐγκατέλιπε τὸν κύρ. ἡμ. application of its primary meaning of treading or entering on: but whether it does so mean here, must be determined by the context. And it surely would be a strange and incongruous expression for one who was advocating a religion of faith,—whose very charter is μακάριοι οἱ μὴ ἰδόντες κ. πεπιστευκότες,—to blame a man or a teacher for ἃ μὴ ἑόρακεν ἐμβατεύειν, placing the defect of sight in the very emphatic forefront of the charge against him. Far rather should we expect that one who διὰ πίστεως περιπάτει, οὐ διὰ εἴδους, would state of such teacher as one of his especial faults, that he ἃ ἑόρακεν ἐνεβάτευεν, found his status, his standing-point, in the realm of sight. And to this what follows corresponds. This insisting on his own visual experience is the result of fleshly pride as contrasted with the spiritual mind. Of the other meanings of ἐμβατεύειν, that of 'coming into possession of property,' 'inheriting,' might be suitable, but in this sense it is usually constructed with εἰς, cf. Demosth. 1085. 24, 1086. 19. The ordinary meaning is far the best here: see reff., and cf. Æsch. Pers. 448—νῆσος . . . . ἣν ὁ φιλόχορος Πὰν ἐμβατεύει, Eur. Electr. 595—κασίγνητον ἐμβατεῦσαι πόλιν [this view I still maintain as against Ellicott]), vainly (groundlessly. εἰκῇ must not be joined with ἐμβατ., as De W., Conyb., al.,—for thus the emphasis of that clause is destroyed: see above) puffed up (no inconsistency with the πεπειρωφρ. above: for as Thdrt. says, τὴν μὲν ἐσκήπτοντο, τοῦ δὲ τύφου τὸ πάθος ἀκριβῶς περιέκειντο) by (as the working principle in him) the mind (intent, bent of thought and apprehension) of his own flesh (ὑπὸ σαρκικῆς διανοίας, οὐ πνευματικῆς, Chrys. But as usual, this adjectival rendering misses the point of the expression,—the διάνοια is not only σαρκική, but is τῆς σαρκός—the σάρξ, the ordinary sensuous principle, is the fons of the νοῦς—which therefore dwells in the region of visions of the man's own seeing, and does not in true humility hold the Head and in faith receive grace as one of His members. I have marked αὐτοῦ rather more strongly than by 'his' only: its expression conveys certainly some idea of self-will. On the psychological propriety of the expression, see Ellicott's note), 19.] and not (objective negative source of his error) holding fast (see ref. Cant. The want of firm holding of Christ has set him loose to ἐμβατεύειν ἃ ἑόρακεν) the Head (Christ: see on Eph. i. 22. Each must hold fast the Head for himself, not merely be attached to the other members, however high or eminent in the Body), from whom (better than with Mey., 'from which,' viz. the Head,—Christ, according to him, being referred to 'nicht perſönlich, ſondern ſächlich:' but if so, why not ἐξ ἧς—what reason would there be for any change of gender? The only cause for such change must be sought in personal reference to Christ, as in ref. 1 Tim.; and this view is confirmed by the τ. αὔξησιν τ. θεοῦ below, shewing that the figure and reality are mingled in the sentence. Beng. gives as his first alternative, 'ex quo, sc. tenendo caput:' but this would be δι' οὗ, not ἐξ οὗ. The Head itself is the Source of increase: the holding it, the means) all the body (in its every part: not exactly = 'the whole body,' in its entirety, which would, if accurately expressed, be τὸ πᾶν σῶμα, cf. τὸν πάντα χρόνον, Acts xx. 18,—ὁ πᾶς νόμος, Gal. v. 14. On the whole passage see Eph. iv. 16, an almost exact parallel) by means of the joints (see against Meyer's meaning, 'nerves,' on Eph. l. c.) and bands (sinews and nerves which bind together, and communicate between, limb and limb) being supplied (the passive of the simple verb is found in 3 Macc. vi. 40, Polyb. iv. 77. 2, πολλαῖς ἀφορμαῖς ἐκ φύσεως κεχορηγημένος πρὸς πραγμάτων κατάκτησιν: ib. iii. 75. 3; vi. 15. 4, al. ματικῶν,—as Chrys.,—understanding it however after πᾶν τὸ σῶμα,—ἔχει τὸ εἶναι, κ. τὸ καλῶς εἶναι. The supply is as the sap to the vine—as the πᾶσα αἴσθησις κ. πᾶσα κίνησις [Thl.] to the body) increaseth with (accusative of the cognate substantive, see Ellic. and Winer, § 32. 2) the increase of God (i. e. 'the increase wrought by God,'—God being the first cause of life to the whole, and carrying on this growth in subordination to and union with the Head, Jesus Christ: not as Chrys., merely = κατὰ θεόν, τὴν ἀπὸ τῆς πολιτείας τῆς ἀρίστης,—nor to be tamed down with Calv., al., to "significat, non probari Deo quodvis augmentum, sed quod ad caput dirigitur." Still less must we adopt the adjectival rendering, 'godly growth,' Conyb., making that an attribute of the growth, which is in reality its condition of existence). The Roman Catholic Commentators, Corn.-a-Lap., Estius, Bisping, endeavour by all kinds of evasions to escape the strong bearing of this passage on their following (and outdoing) of the heretical practices of the Judaizing teachers in this matter of the θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων. The latter (Bisp.) remarks,—"It is plain from this passage, as indeed from the nature of things, that the Apostle is not blaming every honouring of the angels, but only such honouring as put them in the place of Christ. The true honouring of the angels and saints is after all in every case an honouring of Christ their Head." On this I may remark 1) that the word 'honouring' (Verehrung) is simply disingenuous, there being no question of honouring, but of worship in the strict sense (θρησκεία). 2) That whatever a Commentator may say in his study, and Romanists may assert when convenient to them, the honour and worship actually and practically paid by them to angels and saints does by very far exceed that paid to Christ their Head. Throughout Papal Europe, the worship of Christ among the body of the middle and lower orders is fast becoming obliterated, and supplanted by that of His Mother.

20.] Warning against asceticism. If ye died (in your baptism, as detailed above, vv. 11 ff.) with Christ from (a pregnant construction: 'died, and so were set free from:' not found elsewhere in N. T.: cf. Rom. vi. 2; Gal. ii. 19, where we have the dative) the elements (cf. ver. 8: the rudimentary lessons, i. e. ritualistic observances) of the world (see on ver. 8: Christ Himself was set free from these, when, being made under the law, He at His Death bore the curse of the law, and thus it was antiquated in Him), why, as living (emphatic, as though you had not died, see Gal. vi. 14) in the world, are ye being prescribed to (the active use of the verb, 'to decree,' is common in the later classics, and occurs in the LXX, and Apocrypha. The person to whom the thing is decreed or prescribed is put in the dative [2 Macc. x. 8], so that, according to usage, such person may become the subject of the passive verb: cf. Thuc. i. 82, ἡμεῖς ὑπ' Ἀθηναίων ἐπιβουλευόμεθα [ἐπιβουλεύειν τινί],—Herod. vii. 144, αἱ δὲ νῆες . . . . οὐκ ἐχρήσθησαν [χρῆσθαί τινι], and see Kühner, Gram. ii. p. 35. Some, as Bernhardy, p. 346, and Ellicott, prefer considering this form as middle, and give it the sense of "doceri vos sinitis." It seems to be of very little consequence which we call it; the meaning in either case is almost identical: "why is the fact so?" or, "why do you allow it?" To my mind, the passive here carries more keen, because more hidden, rebuke. The ἀδιακεῖσθε and ἀνοσιέρεσθε of 1 Cor. vi. 7 rest on somewhat different ground. There, the voluntary element comes into emphasis, and the middle sense is preferable. See note there. I cannot see, with Meyer, why we should be so anxious to divest the sentence of all appearance of blaming the Colossians, and cast all its blame on the false teachers. The passive [see above] would demand a reason for the fact being so—'Cur ita siti estis, ut . . . ,' which is just as much a reproach as the middle

'Cur, sinitis, ut . . .' The active renderings, 'decreta facitis,' Melancth. [in Eadie], 'decernitis,' Ambrst. [ib.], are wrong both in grammar and in fact. The reference to δόγμασιν ver. 14 is plain. They were being aga n put under that χειρόγρ. which was wiped out and taken away) "Handle not, neither taste, nor even touch" (it will be understood that these words follow immediately upon δογματίζεσθε without a stop, as τὰ δογματιζόμενα;—just as the inf. in 2 Macc. x. 8. Then as to the meaning,—I agree with Calv., Beza, Beng., and Meyer in referring all the three to meats,—on account mainly of vv. 22, 23 [see below], but also of γεύσῃ coming as a defining term between the two less precise ones ἅψῃ and θίγῃς. Others have referred the three to different objects: ἅψῃ and θίγῃς variously to meats, or unclean objects, or women: γεύσῃ universally to meats. Mey. remarks of the negatives, the relation of the three prohibitions is, that the first μηδέ is 'nec,' the second 'ne . . . quidem.' This would not be necessary from the form of the sentence, but seems supported by the word θίγῃς introducing a climax. Wetst. and the Commentators illustrate ἅψῃ and θίγῃς as applied to meats, by Xen. Cyr. i. 3. 5, ὅταν μὲν τοῦ ἄρτου ἅψῃ, [ὁρῶ] εἰς οὐδὲν τὴν χεῖρα ἀποψώμενον, ὅταν δὲ τούτων τινὸς θίγῃς, εὐθὺς ἀποκαθαίρῃ τὴν χεῖρα εἰς τὰ χειρόμακτρα)—which things (viz. the things forbidden) are set (ἐστιν emphatic, 'whose very nature is . . .') all of them for destruction (by corruption, see reff.) in their consumption (i. e. are appointed by the Creator to be decomposed and obliterated with their consumption by us. So Thdrt.—πῶς . . . νομίζετέ τινα μὲν τῶν δεσμάτων ἔννομα, τινὰ δὲ παράνομα, κ. οὐ σκοπεῖτε ὡς μόνιμον τούτων οὐδέν; εἰς κόπρον γὰρ ἅπαντα μεταβάλλεται: and similarly Œc.—φθορᾷ γάρ, φησιν, ὑπόκειται ἐν τῷ ἀφεδρῶνι—Thl., Erasm., Luth., Beza, Calv., Grot., Wolf, Olsh., Mey., al. The argument in fact is similar to that in Matt. xv. 17, and 1 Cor. vi. 13.

Two other lines of interpretation have been followed: 1) that which carries the sense on from the three verbs, "Handle not &c. things which tend to [moral] corruption in their use." De W., Baum.-Crus., al. But this suits neither the collocation of the words, nor ἀποχρήσει, the 'using up,' 'consumption,' which should thus rather be χρήσει. 2) that which makes ἅ refer to δόγματα, and renders 'which δόγματα all tend to [everlasting] destruction in their observance;' but this is just as much against the sense of ἀπόχρησις, and would rather require τήρησις, if indeed τῇ ἀποχρήσει be not superfluous altogether. See these same objections urged at greater length in Meyer's note)—according to (connects with δογματίζεσθε Μὴ . . . θίγῃς: the subsequent clause being a parenthetical remark; thus defining the general term δόγματα to consist in human, not divine commands) the commands and systems (διδασκαλία is the wider term comprising many ἐντάλματα. In reff., the wider term is prefixed: here, where examples of separate ἐντάλματα have been given, we rise from them to the system of doctrine of which they are a part) of men (not merely ἀνθρώπων, bringing out the individual authors of them, but τῶν ἀν. describing them generically as human, not divine. This I would press as against Ellic., who views the τῶν as the art. of correlation, rendered necessary by τὰ ἐντάλματα. But even if this usage were to be strictly pressed with such a word as ἀνθρώπων, the substantive nearest to it, διδασκαλίας, has no article), such as (ἅτινα brings us from the general objective, human doctrines and systems, to the specific subjective, the particular sort of doctrines and systems which they were following: q. d., 'and that, such sort of ἐντ. κ. διδασκ. as . . .') are possessed of (ἐστὶν ἔχοντα does not exactly = ἔχει, but betokens more the abiding attribute of these δόγματα—'enjoy,' as we say) a reputation (λόγον ἔχειν occurs in various meanings. Absolutely, it may signify 'avoir raison,' as Demosth. p. 204, ἔστι δὲ τοῦτο οὕτως μὲν ἀκοῦσαι λόγον τινὰ ἔχον, which meaning is obviously out of place here:—as is also 'to take account of,' Herod. i. 62, 'Αθηναῖοι δὲ οἱ ἐκ τοῦ ἄστεος, ἕως . . . . . λόγον οὐδένα εἶχον. But the meaning 'to have the repute of,'—found Herod. v. 66, Κλεισθένης . . . . ὅπερ δὴ λόγον ἔχει τὴν Πυθίην ἀναπεῖσαι ['is said to have influenced the

It is implied by it, not by the mere phrase λόγον ἔχειν [see the examples above], that they had the repute only without the reality) of wisdom in (element of its repute) voluntary worship (words of this form are not uncommon: so we have ἐθελοπρόξενος, a volunteer or self-constituted proxenus, in Thuc. iii. 70,—ἐθελοκωφέω, to pretend to be deaf, Strab. i. p. 36,—ἐθελοδουλεία, voluntary slavery, Plat. Symp., p. 184 c, &c. &c.; see Lexx., and Aug., Ep. 149 [59, cited above on ver. 17], says 'sic et vulgo dicitur qui divitem affectat thelodives, et qui sapientem thelosapiens, et cætera hujusmodi.' Mey. cites Epiphan. Hær. xvi. p. 34, explaining the name Pharisees, διὰ τὸ ἀφωρισμένους εἶναι αὐτοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν ἄλλων διὰ τὴν ἐθελοπεριτσοθρησκείαν παρ' αὐτῶν νενομισμένην. See many more examples in Wetst. The θρ. was mainly that of angels, see above, ver. 18: but the generality of the expression here may take in other voluntary extravagancies of worship also) and humility (see ver. 18) and unsparingness of the body (Plato defines ἐλευθερία, ἀφειδία ἐν χρήσει κ. ἐν κτήσει οὐσίας, Def. p. 412 D: Thuc. ii. 43 has ἀφειδεῖν βίου: Diod. Sic. xiii. 60, ἀφειδῶς ἐχρῶντο τοῖς ἰδίοις σώμασιν εἰς τὴν κοινὴν σωτηρίαν, &c. &c., see Wetst.), not in any honour of it (on the interpretations, see below. τιμή is used by St. Paul of honour or respect bestowed on the body, in 1 Cor. xii. 23, 24: of honourable conduct in matters relating to the body, 1 Thess. iv. 4 [see note there: cf. also Rom. i. 24]: and such is the meaning I would assign to it here—these δόγματα have the repute of wisdom for (in) &c., and for (in) unsparingness of the body, not in any real honour done to it—its true honour being, dedication to the Lord, 1 Cor. vi. 13),—to the satiating of the flesh? I connect these words not with the preceding clause, but with δογματίζεσθε above—'why are ye suffering yourselves [see on the passive above] to be thus dogmatized [in the strain μὴ ἅψῃ &c. according to &c., which are &c.], and all for the satisfaction of the flesh'—for the following out of a διδασκαλία, the ground of which is the φυσιοῦσθαι ὑπὸ τοῦ νοὸς τῆς σαρκός, ver. 18? Then after this follow most naturally the exhortations of the next chapter; they are not to seek the πλησμονὴ τῆς σαρκός—not τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς φρονεῖν, but νεκρῶσαι τὰ μέλη τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. The ordinary interpretation of this difficult passage has been, as E. V. 'not in any honour to the satisfying of the flesh,' meaning thereby, that such commands do not provide for the honour which we owe to the body in the supply of the proper refreshment to the flesh. But two great objections lie against this, and are in my judgment fatal to the interpretation in every shape: 1) that ἡ σάρξ cannot be used in this indifferent sense as equivalent to τὸ σῶμα, in a sentence where it occurs together with τὸ σῶμα, and where it has before occurred in an ethical sense: 2) that πλησμονή will not bear this meaning of mere ordinary supplying, 'satisfying the wants of:' but must imply satiety, 'satisfying to repletion.' The children of Israel were to eat the quails εἰς πλησμονήν, Exod. xvi. 8: cf. also Deut. xxxiii. 23: Lam. v. 6; Hab. ii. 16: also διὰ τὰς ἀλόγους οἰνοφλυγίας κ. πλησμονάς, Polyb. ii. 19. 4. Meyer renders—'these commands have a repute for wisdom, &c.,—not for any thing which is really honourable (i. e. which may prove that repute to be grounded in truth), but in order thereby to the satiation of men's sensual nature:' and so, nearly, Ellicott. The objections to this are, 1) the strained meaning of τιμὴ τις, —2) the insertion of 'but' before πρός, or as in Ellic. 'only' after it, both which are wholly gratuitous. This same latter objection applies to the rendering of Beza, al., 'nec tamen ullius sunt pretii, quum ad ea spectant quibus farcitur caro,'—besides that this latter paraphrase is unwarranted. See other renderings still further off the point in Mey. and De W. Among these I fear must be reckoned that of Conyb., 'are of no value to check (?) the indulgence of fleshly passions,' and that of Bähr and Eadie, regarding λόγον—τινι as participial, and joining ἐστιν with πρός—a harshness of construction wholly unexampled and improbable. The interpretation above given seems to me, after long consideration, the simplest, and most in accord with the context. It is no objection to it that the antithesis presented by οὐκ ἐν τιμῇ τινι is thus not to ἐν ἐθελοθρ. κ.τ.λ., but merely to ἀφειδίᾳ σάρκος: for if the Apostle wished to bring out a negative antithesis to these last words only, he hardly could do so without repeating the preposition, the sense of which is carried on to ἀφειδίᾳ.

1—4.] Transition to the new subject, and grounding of the coming exhortations. 1.] If then (as above asserted, ch. ii. 12, 20: the εἰ implies no doubt of the fact, but lays it down as ground for an inference, see ch. ii. 20, and cf. Xen. Mem. i. 5. 1) ye were raised up together with Christ (not as E. V. 'are risen:' the allusion, as above, ch. ii. 11—13, is to a definite time, your baptism. And it is important to keep this in view, that we may not make the mistake so commonly made, of interpreting συνηγέρθητε in an ethical sense, and thereby stultifying the sentence—for if the participation were an ethical one, what need to exhort them to its ethical realization? The participation is an objective one, brought about by that faith which was the condition of their baptismal admission into Him. This faith the Apostle exhorts them to energize in the ethical realization of this resurrection state), seek the things above (heavenly, spiritual things: cf. Matt. vi. 33; Gal. iv. 26; Phil. iii. 20) where Christ is ('se trouve,' not merely the copula. If you are united to Him, you will be tending to Him; and He is in heaven),—seated on the right hand of God (see Eph. i. 20. Here, as every where, when the present state of Christ is spoken of, the Ascension is taken for granted): care for the things above (φρονεῖτε, wider than ζητεῖτε, extending to the whole region of their thought and desire), not the things on the earth (cf. οἱ τὰ ἐπίγεια φρονοῦντες, Phil. iii. 19: i. e. matters belonging to this present mortal state—earthly pleasure, pelf, and pride. There is no reason, with Thl., Calv., Schrad., Huther, to suppose him still aiming at the false teachers, and meaning by τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, τὰ περὶ βρωμάτων κ. ἡμερῶν [Thl.]: in this part of the Epistle he has dropped the controversial and taken the purely ethical tone). For ye died (ch. ii. 12: 'are dead,' though allowable, is not so good, as merely asserting a state, whereas the other recalls the fact of that state having been entered on. That being made partakers with Christ's death, cut you loose from the τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς: see Rom. vi. 4—7), and your life (that resurrection life [which is "your real and true life" as Ellic., objecting to this explanation. The only real life of the Christian is his resurrection life in and with Christ. The fact is, Ellic. has mistaken my meaning in this term: see my remarks on it below], which you now have only in its first fruits, in possession indeed, but not in full possession, see below, and cf. brings them out as seems good to Him. Notice the solemnity of the repetition of the articles: and so all through these verses). When Christ shall be manifested (shall emerge from his present state of hiddenness, and be personally revealed), who is our (no emphasis—ἡμῶν applies to Christians generally—see on ὑμ. below) life (not as Eadie, 'shall appear in the character of our life' [ὅτ. χρ. ἡ ζωὴ ἡμ. φανερωθῇ]: Christ is personally Himself that life, and we possess it only by union with Him and His resurrection: see John xiv. 19), then shall ye also (καί takes out the special from the general—ye, as well as, and among, other Christians: with the reading ἡ ζ. ὑμῶν, the καί would mean, 'as well as Christ') with Him be manifested in glory (see on the whole, the parallel 1 John iii. 2. Though the completed life of the resurrection seems so plainly pointed out by this last verse as the sense to be given to ἡ ζωή, this has not been seen by many Commentators, who hold it to be ethical; hidden, inasmuch as inward and spiritual —ἐν τῷ κρυπτῷ, Rom. ii. 29 [De W.], and ideal: or, inasmuch as it is unseen by the world [Beng., similarly Storr, Flatt, Bisping, al.]. The root of the mistake has been the want of a sufficiently comprehensive view of that resurrection life of ours which is now hidden with Christ. It includes in itself both spiritual, ethical, and corporeal: and the realization of it as far as possible, here, is the sum of the Christian's most earnest endeavours: but the life itself, in its full manifestation, is that perfection of body, soul, and spirit, in which we shall be manifested with Him at His appearing. Cf. Thdrt.: ἐκείνου γὰρ ἀναστάντος πάντες ἠγέρθημεν· ἀλλ' οὐδέπω ὁρῶμεν τῶν πραγμάτων τὴν ἔκβασιν. κέκρυπται δὲ ἐν αὐτῷ τῆς ἡμετέρας ἀναστάσεως τὸ μυστήριον).

With this you have no concern—they are members of Christ, partakers of His resurrection, renewed after His image. The metaphorical sense of μέλη, regarding πορν. &c., as 'membra quibus vetus homo, i. e. ratio ac voluntas hominis depravata perinde utitur ac corpus membris.' Beza, —'naturam nostram quasi massam ex diversis vitiis conflatam imaginatur.' Calv., —seems unnecessary. And the understanding of φρονοῦντα with τὰ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, as Grot., after Thdrt. always ἐπιθ., but not vice versa. The relation is the same as between πορνεία and ἀκαθαρσία), and covetousness (τὴν πλ. as Beng.—'articulus facit ad epitasin, et totum genus vitii a genere enumeratarum modo specierum diversum complectitur.' On πλεονεξία, see on Eph. iv. 19, and Trench, N. T. Synonyms, § xxiv.), for it is ('quippe quæ sit') idolatry (the πλεονέκτης has set up self in his heart —and to serve self, whether by accumulation of goods or by satiety in pleasure, is his object in life. He is therefore an idolater, in the deepest and worst, namely in the practical significance. τὸ μαμωνᾶ, κύριον ὁ Σωτὴρ προσηγόρευσε, διδάσκων ὡς ὁ τῷ πάθει τῆς πλεονεξίας δουλεύων, ὡς θεὸν τὸν πλοῦτον τιμᾷ, Thdrt.), on which account (on account of the πλεονεξία, which amounts to idolatry, the all-comprehending and crowning sin, which is a negation of God and brings down His especial anger) cometh (down on earth, in present and visible examples) the wrath of God: in which (vices. Mey.'s remark that the reading δι' ὅ makes this ἐν οἷς necessarily refer to the ἐπὶ τοὺς υἱοῖς τ. ἀπειθ. which he reads after θεοῦ, does not apply if δι' ὅ be interpreted as above to refer to πλεονεξία. There does not seem to occur in St. Paul any instance of ἐν, after περιπατεῖν absolute, referring to persons. Cf. 2 Thess. iii. 11 [περιπ. ἀτάκτως], John xi. 54, Eph. ii. 3, which last, if the clause ἐπ. τ. υἱ. τ. ἀπ. were inserted here, would certainly go far to decide the matter) ye also walked once, when ye lived (before your death with Christ to the world) in these things (the assertion is not tautological: cf. Gal. v. 25, εἰ ζῶμεν πνεύματι, πνεύματι καὶ στοιχῶμεν. When ye were alive to these things, ye regulated your course by them, walked in them. "Vivere et ambulare inter se differūnt, quemadmodum potentia et actus: vivere præcedit, ambulare sequitur." Calv.): 8.] but now (that ye are no longer living in them: opposed to ποτὲ ὅτε above) do ye also (as well as other believers) put away the whole (τὰ πάντα seems to have a backward and a forward reference—'the whole,—both those things which I have enumerated, and those which are to follow.' The mistake of rendering ἀπόθεσθε, 'have put off,' which one would hardly look for in a Commentator, occurs in Eadie here—cf. Eph. iv. 22),—anger, wrath (see on Eph. iv. 31), malice (ib.), evil speaking (ib.), abusive conversation (the context makes this more probable here, than 'filthy conversation' [so E. V.; Clem. Alex., περὶ αἰσχρολογίας, Pæd. ii. 6, p. 198 P.; he however himself uses αἰσχρολογεῖν for to abuse in words, Pæd. iii. 11, p. 296 P.: Chrys., who calls it ὄχημα πορνείας], for these four regard want of charity, of kindness in thought and word, rather than sins of uncleanness, which were before enumerated. And the occasional usage of the word itself bears this out, cf. Plat. Rep. iii. p. 395 end, κακηγοροῦντάς τε καὶ κωμῳδοῦντας ἀλλήλους κ. αἰσχρολογοῦντας: Polyb. viii. 13. 8, ἡ κατὰ τῶν φίλων αἰσχρολογία) out of your mouth (these words most naturally belong to the two last specified sins, and must be constructed either with ἀπόθεσθε, which seems best, or with 'proceeding,' implied in αἰσχρολογίαν),—lie not towards (εἰς the indifferent general preposition of direction: so κατά with ψεύδομαι in a hostile sense, James iii. 14. Plat. Euthyd. p. 284 a, οὐδὲν κατά σου ψεύδεται. We have πρὸς ἐκεῖνον ψευσάμενον, Xen. Anab. i. 3. 5) one another,—having put off (the participles contain the motive for all the preceding, from ἀπόθεσθε—so Thdrt. [τοῦτον ἀπεκδύσασθε ἐν τῷ βαπτίσματι], Calv. [postquam exuistis], Mey., al. Vulg. [exuentes], Luth., Calov., Beng., Olsh., De W., Conyb., al., understand them as contemporary with ἀπόθεσθε, — putting off,—or, and put off. But surely this is very flat, and besides would, if it is to answer to the foregoing, contain a superfluous member, the ἐνδυσάμ. κ.τ.λ. there being no exhortation to graces in the former sentence, only dehortation from vices. Besides, as Mey. remarks, the objective description in ver. 11 belongs to an assignment of motive, not to a hortative sentence: and the hortative figure begins ver. 12) the old man (i. e. as Mey., 'die vorchriſtliche Individualität;' the nature which they had before their conversion: see on reff.) with his deeds (habits, ways of acting: see reff., and cf. Demosth. 126. 21, ἔκπαγλον ὅπως ἡ πόλις ληφθήσεται, καὶ κατεσκευάζοντο τὴν πρᾶξιν), and having put on the new (the other was the negative ground: this is the positive. See on Eph. iv. 23, and ii. 15), who (the two are personal: not 'which,'—except in its old personal sense) is continually being renewed (notice the present participle. "The new man is not any thing ready at once and complete, but ever in a state of development [by the Holy Spirit, Tit. iii. 5], by which a new state and nature is brought about in it, specifically different from that of the old man." Mey.) towards perfect knowledge (which excludes all falsehood, and indeed all the vices mentioned above) according to the image of Him that created him (the new creation of the spirit unto fulness of knowledge and truth, the highest form of which would be the perfect knowledge of God, is regarded by the Apostle as analogous to man's first creation. As he was then made in the image of God, so now: but it was then his naturally, now spiritually in ἐπίγνωσις. Some join κατ' εἰκ. with ἀνακαιν., some with ἐπίγνωσ. The sense will be the same; but grammatically it is far better to join it with ἀνακαιν. Thus the norm and method of the renewal is, κατ' εἰκ. τ. κτίσαντος αὐτόν [the new man],—i. e. God, who is ever the Creator, not as Chrys., al., Christ. To understand the whole passage as referring to a restoration of the image of God in the first creation, as Calov., Est., and De W., is to fall far short of the glorious truth. It is not to restore the old, but to create the new, that redemption has been brought about. Whatever may have been God's image in which the first Adam was created, it is certain that the image of God, in which Christ's Spirit re-creates us, will be as much more glorious than that, as the second man is more glorious than the first): where (viz. in the realm or sphere of the new man) there is not (on ἔνι see Gal. iii. 28) Greek and Jew (difference of nation; with special allusion also to the antiquation of the Abrahamic privilege as regarded his natural seed), circumcision and uncircumcision (difference of legal ceremonial standing),—barbarian (having as yet specified by pairs, he now brings forward a few single categories, which in the new man were non-existent as marks of distinction; see below. The expression is a Hebraism: and the account of it to be found in the literal use of σπλάγχνα as the seat of the sympathetic feelings: cf. Gen. xliii. 30), kindness (see on Gal. v. 22), lowliness (towards one another—see on Eph. iv. 2), meekness (Eph. ib.: but here it is primarily towards one another; not however excluding but rather implying meekness towards God as its ground), long-suffering (ib.), forbearing one another (see ib.) and forgiving each other (ἑαυτοῖς is not = ἀλλήλοις, as De W., al.: but the mutual forgiveness of the Christian body is put in marked correspondence to that great act of forgiveness which has passed upon the whole body, in Christ. 'Forgiving yourselves,' did it not convey to our ears a wrong idea, would be the best rendering: doing as a body for yourselves, that which God did once for you all), if any have cause of blame (the phrase is a classical one—cf. Eur. Orest. 1068, ἐν μὲν πρῶτά σοι μομφὴν ἔχω—Phœn. 781; Soph. ταῦτα πάντα, which have been individually mentioned, and ἐπὶ πᾶσι τούτοις, that which must over-lie them as a whole) over (carrying on the image ἐνδύσασθε—see below. Calvin's 'propter omnia hæc' is every way wrong:—'in addition to,' as Eadie, al., falls short of the fitness and beauty of the passage, weakening what is really the literal sense into a metaphorical one. The E. V., 'above all these things,' looks ambiguous, but by repeating 'put on,' it seems as if our translators meant 'above' to be taken locally and literally) all these things (put on) love (the article gives a fine and delicate sense here, which we cannot express—ἡ ἀγάπη is not merely love, but 'the [well-known] love which becomes Christians:' the nearest rendering would perhaps be 'Christian love,' but it expresses too much), which thing (reff.: there is a slight causal force,—'for it is') is the bond of perfectness (the idea of an upper garment, or perhaps of a girdle, as Calov. supposed, seems to have been before the Apostle's mind. This completes and keeps together all the rest, which, without it, are but the scattered elements of completeness: πάντα ἐκεῖνά, φησιν, αὕτη συσφίγγει παροῦσα· ἀπούσης δὲ διαλύονται κ. ἐλέγχονται ὑπόκρισις ὄντα κ. οὐδέν, Thl. Wetst. cites from Simplic. in Epictet., p. 208, καλῶς οἱ Πυθαγόρειοι περισσῶς τῶν ἄλλων ἀρετῶν τὴν φιλίαν ἐτίμων, κ. σύνδεσμον αὐτὴν πασῶν τῶν ἀρετῶν ἔλεγον. The genitive after σύνδεσμος is not the genitive of apposition, as in Eph. iv. 3, but of that which is held together by the σύνδεσμος, as in Plat. Rep. x. p. 616 c, εἶναι γὰρ τοῦτο τὸ φῶς ξύνδεσμον τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, οἷον τὰ ὑποζώματα τῶν τριήρων, οὕτω πᾶσαν ξυνέχον τὴν περιφοράν. Those who, as some of the Roman Catholic expositors (not Bisping), find here justification by works, must be very hard put to discover support for that doctrine. The whole passage proceeds upon the ground of previous justification by faith: see ch. ii. 12, and our ver. 12, ὡς ἐκλ. τ. θ. Some render σύνδεσμος 'the sum total,' or inclusive idea, 'Inbegriff:' so Bengel, Usteri, De W., Olsh., al.: and it appears to bear this sense in Herodian iv. 12. 11, πάντα τὸν σύνδεσμον τῶν ἐπιστολῶν,—but not in the N. T.; and besides, the sense would be logically inconsistent with ἐπὶ πᾶσιν τούτοις, implying that Love does not include, but covers and supplements all the former. Still worse is the wretched adjectival rendering of τῆς τελ. as = τέλειος, 'the perfect band,' as Grot., Erasm.-par., Est., al.): and (simply an additional exhortation, not an inference, 'and so,' as Beng.; compare Eph. iv. 3, where peace is the σύνδεσμος. It is exceedingly interesting to observe the same word occurring in the same trains of thought in the two Epistles, but frequently with different application. See the Prolegg. to this Epistle, § iv. 7) let Christ's peace (the peace which He brings about, which He left as his legacy to us [ref. John], which is emphatically and solely His. This peace, though its immediate and lower reference here is to mutual concord, yet must not on account of the context be limited to that lower side. Its reference is evidently wider, as βραβευέτω shews: see below. It is the whole of Christ's Peace in all its blessed character and effects) rule (sit umpire—be enthroned as decider of every thing. Cf. Demosth. 3. 6, 7, ἐξὸν ὑμῖν κ. τὰ ἡμέτερ' αὐτῶν ἀσφαλῶς ἔχειν κ. τὰ τῶν ἄλλων δίκαια βραβεύειν. ib. 1231. 19, τοῦτον τὸν τρόπον ὑμῶν ταῦτα βραβευόντων: and in the later sense of simply to rule, Polyb. ii. 25. 3, ἅπαν τὸ γιγνόμενον ὑπὸ τῶν Γαλατῶν θυμῷ μᾶλλον ἢ λογισμῷ βραβεύεται, al., in Schweigh. It is forcing the passage, to introduce the idea of a combat and a prize, as Chrys., &c.: and philologically wrong to render, as Calv., 'palmam ferat,' explaining it 'superior sit omnibus carnis affectibus.' This reminiscence refers to the whole context from ver. 8, in which the exhortations had been to mutual Christian graces. διὰ τί γὰρ ἄλλο ἐσμὲν ἓν σῶμα, ἢ ἵνα ὡς μέλη ὄντες ἀλλήλων ταύτην τηρῶμεν, κ. μὴ διϊστώμεθα; Thl.): and be thankful (to God, who called you: so the context before and after certainly demands: not 'one to another,' as Conyb., which though an allowable sense of εὐχάριστος, breaks the connexion here, which is as Chrys. on ver. 16—παραινέσας εὐχαρίστους εἶναι, καὶ τὴν ὁδὸν δείκνυσι. The ἐκλήθητε was the word which introduced the exhortation—all conduct inconsistent with the 'calling in one body' being in fact unthankfulness to God, who called us. Jer., Erasm.-not., Calv., al., render it 'amiable,' 'friendly,' against which the same objection lies. See Eph. v. 4; and ib. 19, 20: where the same class of exhortations occurs). 16.] See the connexion in Chrys. above. This thankfulness to God will shew itself in the rich indwelling in you and outflowing from you of the word of Christ, be it in mutual edifying converse, or in actual songs of praise. Let Christ's word (the Gospel: genitive subjective; the word which is His—He spoke it, inspired it, and gives it power) dwell in you (not 'among you,' as Luther, De W., al.: which does not suit ἐνοικ. As Ellic. observes, St. Paul's usage [reff., remembering that ref. 2 Cor. is a quotation] seems to require that the indwelling should be individual and personal. Still we may say with Mey. that the ὑμεῖς need not be restricted to individual Christians: it may well mean the whole community—you, as a church. The word dwelling in them richly, many would arise to speak it to edification, and many would be moved to the utterance of praise. And to this collective sense of ὑμῖν, ἑαυτούς below seems to correspond; see above on ver. 13) richly (i. e. in abundance and fulness, so as to lead to the following results), in all wisdom (these words seem to be better taken with the following than with the foregoing. And so Beng., Olsh., De W., Mey., al.: the usual arrangement has been with E. V., all. [not Chrys.], to join them with the preceding) teaching and warning (see on ch. i. 28) each other (see on ver. 13) in psalms, hymns, spiritual songs (on the meaning of the words, see notes, Eph. v. 19. The arrangement here adopted may be thus vindicated: ψ. ὕμν. ᾠδ. πν. must be joined with the preceding, not with the following, because 1) the instrumental dative is much more naturally taken after διδ. κ. νουθ. ἑαυτ., from the analogy of Eph. v. 19, λαλοῦντες ἑαυτοῖς ψ. κ. ὕμν. κ. ᾠδ. [πν.], ᾄδοντες κ.τ.λ. 2) ᾄδοντες here has already two qualifying clauses, one before and one after, ἐν τῇ χάριτι and ἐν ταῖς καρδίαις ὑμῶν. Meyer's note here is important: "Notice moreover that Paul here also [see on Eph. ut supra] is not speaking of 'divine service' properly so called, for this teaching and admonishing is required of his readers generally and mutually, and as a proof of their rich possession of the word of Christ:—but of the communication of the religious life among one another (e. g. at meals, at the Agapæ, and other meetings, in their family circles, &c.), wherein spiritual influence caused the mouth to overflow with the fulness of the heart, and gave utterance to brotherly instruction and reproof in the higher form of psalms, &c.; perhaps in songs already known,—or extemporized, according to the peculiarity and productivity of each man's spiritual gift: perhaps sung by individuals alone [which would especially be the case when they were extemporized], or in chorus, or in the form of antiphonal song [Plin. Ep. x. 97]." How common religious singing was in the ancient church, independently of 'divine service' properly so called, see in Suicer, Thes. ii. p. 1568 f. Euseb., H. E. ii. 17, v. 28, testifies to the existence of a collection of rhythmical songs which were composed ἀπαρχῆς by Christians [ψαλμοι δὲ ὅσοι κ. ᾠδαί, ἀδελφῶν ἀπαρχῆς ὑπὸ πιστῶν γραφεῖσαι, τὸν λόγον τοῦ θεοῦ τὸν χριστὸν ὑμνοῦσι θεολογοῦντες, v. 28]. On singing at the Agapæ, see Tert. Apol. 39, vol. i. p. 477: "post aquam manualem et lumina, ut quisque de scripturis sanctis vel proprio ingenio potest, provocatur in medium Deo canere"); in grace (the grace—of Christ [see reff. for the absolute use of ἡ χάρις]—ἀπὸ τῆς χάριτος τοῦ πνεύματός φησιν ᾄδοντες, Chrys.: so Œc., διὰ τῆς παρὰ τοῦ ἁγίου πνεύματος δοθείσης χάριτος: not as Erasm., Luth., Melancth., Calv. The article marks 'the grace,' which is yours by God's indwelling Spirit) singing in your hearts to God (this clause has generally been understood as qualifying the former. But such a view is manifestly wrong. That former spoke of their teaching and warning one another in effusions of the spirit which took the form of psalms, &c.: in other words, dealt with their intercourse with one another; this on the other hand deals with their own private intercourse with God. The second participle is co-ordinate with the former, not subordinate to it. The mistake has partly arisen from imagining that the former clause related to public worship, in its external form: and then this one was understood to enforce the genuine heartfelt expression of the same. But this not being so, that which is founded on it falls with it. The singing τῷ θεῷ is an analogous expression to that in 1 Cor. xiv. 28,—ἐὰν δὲ μὴ ᾖ διερμηνευτής, . . . ἑαυτῷ . . . λαλείτω κ. τῷ θεῷ. So the ἐν ταῖς καρδ. ὑμ. describes the method of uttering this praise, viz. by the thoughts only: τῷ θεῷ designates to whom it is to be addressed,—not, as before, to one another, but to God):

18—IV. 1.] Special exhortations to relative social duties: 18, 19, to the married: 20, 21, to children and parents: 22—IV. 1, to slaves and masters. Seeing that such exhortations occur in Ephesians also in terms so very similar, we are not justified, with Chrys., al., in assuming that there was any thing in the peculiar circumstances of the Colossian church, which required more than common exhortation of this kind. It has been said, that it is only in Epistles addressed to the Asiatic churches, that such exhortations are found: but in this remark the entirely general character of the Epistle to the Ephesians is forgotten. Besides, the exhortations of the Epistle to Titus cannot be so completely severed from these as to be set down in another category, as Eadie has endeavoured to do. See throughout the section, for such matters as are not remarked on, the notes to Eph. v. 22—vi. 9. 18. ὡς ἀνῆκεν] The verb is in the imperfect—as ἔδει and χρῆν, conveying always in its form a slight degree of blame, as implying the non-realization of the duty pointed out — just as when we say, 'It was your duty to,' &c. See Winer, § 41. 3, end. The words ἐν κυρίῳ belong to ἀνῆκεν, not to ὑποτάσσεσθε; as is shewn by the parallel expression in ver. 20: was fitting, in that element of life designated by ἐν κυρίῳ. 19.] See the glorious expansion of this in Eph. v. 25—33. πικραίνεσθαι occurs in the same sense in Demosth. 1464. 18: also in Plat. Legg. p. 731 d, — τὸν θυμὸν πραΰνειν κ. μὴ ἀκραχολοῦντα, γυναικείως πικραινόμενον, διατελεῖν. Kypke illustrates the word from Plutarch, de ira cohibenda, p. 457, 'ubi dicit, animi prodere imbecillitatem quum viri πρὸς γύναια διαπικραίνονται:' and from Eurip. Helen. 303: ἀλλ' ὅταν πόσις πικρὸς | ξυνῇ γυναικί, κ. τὸ δῶμ' ἐστι (lege σάζεσθαι) πικρόν, θανεῖν κράτιστον. 20.] See Eph. vi. 1. κατὰ πάντα, the exceptions not being taken into account: St. Paul's usual way of stating a general rule. It is best to take εὐάρεστον, as Mey. absolutely, as προσφιλῆ, Phil. iv. 8: the Christian qualification being given by the ἐν κυρίῳ: De W., al., understand τῷ θεῷ, which would render that qualification meaningless. 21.] See on Eph. vi. 4, for πατέρες. μὴ ἐρεθ.] do not irritate them — τοῦτό ἐστι, μὴ φιλονεικοτέρους αὐτοὺς ποιεῖτε. ἔστιν ὅπου καὶ συγχωρεῖν ὀφείλετε, Chrys. In ἵνα μὴ ἀθ., it is assumed that the result of such irritation will be to cause repeated punishment, and so eventual desperation, on the part of the child. It would be well if all who have to educate children took to heart Bengel's remark

In Eph. vi. 7 the construction is filled up by δουλεύοντες. Mey. observes against De W., that οὐκ is an absolute not a mere relative negative: 'doing things unto men' is to be laid aside altogether, not merely less practised than the other: "as workers to the Lord and non-workers to men," Ellic. 24.] = Eph. vi. 8, but more specific as to the Christian reward. εἰδότες, knowing as ye do . . . The ἀπὸ κυρίου is emphatically prefixed — 'that it is from the Lord that you shall . . . . .' ἀπό, as Winer, § 47. b, is distinguished from παρά, as indicating not immediate bestowal, but that the Lord is the ultimate source and conferrer of the inheritance—from the Lord—not 'at the hands of the Lord.' You must look to Him, not to men, as the source of all Christian reward. [Eadie, p. 265, has represented Winer as saying the contrary of that which he does say.] ἀνταπόδοσις occurs in Thuc. iv. 81, in the sense of a mutual exchange of places taken in war: in Polyb. vi. 5. 3, in that of a compensation, τοῦτο ἱκανὸν ἀνταπόδοσιν ποιήσει ἐκείνου,—and xx. 7. 2, ὅπερ ἐπιτηδὲς ἀνταπόδοσιν ποιουμένη ἡ τύχη: and hence in that of 'an opposite turn,' xxvii. 2. 4, ἀνταπόδοσιν λαμβάνει τὰ πράγματα,—iv. 43. 5, ἀνταπόδοσιν ποιεῖται ὁ ῥοῦς πρός, &c. Here the sense would appear to be, with a marked reference to their present state of slavery, the compensation. κληρ., genitive of apposition (reff.). The very word κληρονομία should have kept the Roman Catholic expositors from introducing the merit of good works here. The last clause, without the γάρ, is best taken imperatively, as a general comprehension of the course of action prescribed in the former part of the verse: serve ye the Lord Christ. So Vulg. 'domino Christo servite.' 25.] This verse seems best to be taken as addressed to the slaves by way of encouragement to regard Christ as their Master and serve Him—seeing that all their wrongs in this world, if they leave them in His hands, will be in due time righted by Him, the just judge, with whom there is no respect of persons. For he that doeth wrong shall receive (see, as on the whole, Eph. vi. 8) that which he did wrongfully (the tense is changed because in ἀδικῶν he is speaking of present practice—in ἠδίκησεν, he has transferred the scene to the day of the Lord, and the wrong is one of past time), and there is not respect of persons (= εἴτε δοῦλος εἴτε ἐλεύθερος, Eph. vi. 8). At His tribunal, every one, without regard to rank or wealth, shall receive the deeds done in the body. So that in your Christian uprightness and conscientiousness you need not fear that you shall be in the end overborne by the superior power of your masters: there is A judge who will defend and right you: ἐστὶ δικαιοκρίτης ὃς οὐκ οἶδε δούλου κ. δεσπότου διαφοράν, ἀλλὰ δικαίαν εἰσφέρει τὴν ψῆφον, Thdrt. Some, as Thl., Beng., al., suppose the verse spoken with reference to the slaves; but οὐκ ἔστιν προσωπολημψία is against this, unless we accept Bengel's far-fetched explanation of it: "tenues sæpe putant, sibi propter tenuitatem ipsorum esse parcendum."

CH. IV. 1.] Meyer contends for the strict meaning of 'equality' for ἰσότητα, and that it never has the signification of 'fairness.' But (see examples in Wetst.) the common conjunction of ἴσον κ. δίκαιον would naturally lead to assigning to ἴσον the same transferred meaning which 'æquus' has in Latin, and to ἰσότης the same which 'æquitas' has. I would render then, equity,—fairness: understanding by that, an extension of τὸ δίκαιον to matters not admitting of the application of strict rules—a large and liberal interpretation of justice in ordinary matters. In every place cited by Meyer where the word is used ethically and not materially, this rendering is better than his. In Polyb. ii. 38. 8, the case is different: it there imports absolute political equality. Erasm., Corn.-a-lap., al., understand impartiality, not preferring one above another: but this does not seem to be in question here. Calv. says: 'Non dubito quin Paulus ἰσότητα hic posuerit pro jure analogo aut distributivo: quemadmodum ad Ephesios τὰ αὐτά. Neque enim sic habent domini obnoxios sibi servos, quin vicissim aliquid ipsis debeant: quemadmodum jus analogum valere debet inter omnes ordines.' Thdrt.: ἰσότητα οὐ τὴν ἰσοτιμίαν ἐκάλεσεν, ἀλλὰ τὴν προσήκουσαν ἐπιμέλειαν, ἧς παρὰ τῶν δεσποτῶν ἀπολαύειν χρὴ τοὺς οἰκέτας. Chrys. 3.] ἡμῶν, 'not me,'—see ch. i. 1, 3. This is plainly shewn here by the singular following after. ἵνα] see on 1 Cor. xiv. 13. Here, the idea of final result is prominent: but the purport is also included. θύραν τ. λόγου] Not as Calv., al., oris apertionem, Eph. vi. 19; but as in reff., objective, an opening of opportunity for the extension of the Gospel by the word. This would, seeing that the Apostle was a prisoner, naturally be given first and most chiefly, as far as he was concerned, by his liberation: cf. Philem. 22. λαλῆσαι] inf. of purpose—so that we may speak. δι' ὃ κ. δ.] for (on account of) which (mystery) I am (not only a minister but) also bound.

4.] The second ἵνα gives the purpose of the previous verse, not the purpose of δέδεμαι, as Chrys. [τὰ δεσμὰ φανεροῖ αὐτόν, οὐ συσκιάζει], Bengel ['vinctus sum ut patefaciam: paradoxon'],—nor to be joined with προσευχόμενοι, as Beza, De W., al. If that might be so, the door opened, &c.,—then he would make it known as he ought to do—then he would be fulfilling the requirements of that apostolic calling, from which now in his imprisonment he was laid aside. Certainly this is the meaning,—and not, as ordinarily understood, cf. Chrys., al., that he might boldly declare the Gospel in his imprisonment. 5, 6.] Exhortations as to their behaviour in the world.

5. ἐν σοφίᾳ] in (as an element) wisdom (the practical wisdom of Christian prudence and sound sense). πρός, as in οὐδὲν πρὸς Διόνυσον,—εἴ τον δέοιτο πρὸς Τιμόθεον πρᾶξαι, Demosth. p. 1185, signifying simply in relation to, in the intercourse of life. Ellic. refers to a good discussion of this preposition in Rost and Palm's Lex. vol. ii. p. 1157. On οἱ ἔξω, see reff. They are those outside the Christian brotherhood. πρὸς τὰ μέλη τὰ οἰκεῖα οὐ τοσαύτης ἡμῖν δεῖ ἀσφαλείας, ὅσης πρὸς τοὺς ἔξω· ἔνθα γὰρ ἀδελφοί, εἰσὶ κ. συγγνώμαι πολλαὶ κ. ἀγάπαι. Chrys. τ. καιρ. ἐξαγορ.] see on Eph. v. 16. The opportunity for ὡφελεῖ, will be understood in each case from the circumstances, and our acknowledged Christian position as watching for the cause of the Lord. The thought in Eph., ὅτι αἱ ἡμέραι πονηραί εἰσι, lies in the background of the word ἐξαγοραζόμενοι.

6.] Let your speech (πρὸς τοὺς ἔξω still) be always in (as its characteristic element) grace (i. e. gracious, and winning favour: cf. Luke iv. 22), seasoned with salt (not insipid and void of point, which can do no man any good: we must not forget that both these words have their spiritual meaning: χάρις, so common an one as to have almost passed out of its ordinary acceptation into that other,—the grace which is conferred on us from above, and which our words and actions should reflect:—and ἅλας, as used by our Saviour in reff. [see note on Mark], as symbolizing the unction, freshness, and vital briskness which characterizes the Spirit's presence and work in a man. So that we must beware here of supposing that mere Attic 'sales' are meant, or any vivacity of outward expression only, and keep in mind the Christian import. Of the Commentators, Thdrt. comes the nearest,—πνευματικῇ συνέσει κοσμεῖσθε. There seems to be no allusion here to the conservative power of salt: the matter in hand at present is not avoiding corrupt conversation. Still less does the meaning of wit belong to this place. A ὁ ἀγ. ἀδελφός, as dear to his heart: πιστ. διάκ., as his tried companion in the ministry,—σύνδ. ἐν κυρίῳ, as one with him in the motives and objects of his active work: ὥστε, as Chrys., αὐτῷ πάντοθεν τὸ ἀξιόπιστον ξυνήγαγεν. There is a delicate touch of affection in ἵνα γνῷ τὰ περὶ ὑμ., which can hardly, in the doubtfulness of the reading, be the work of a corrector. It implies that there were painful circumstances of trial, to which the subsequent παρακαλέσῃ also has reference. δείκνυσιν αὐτοὺς ἐν τοῖς πειρασμοῖς ὄντας, Chrys. The objection (Eadie), that thus the εἰς αὐτὸ τοῦτο will announce another purpose from that enounced above in τὰ κατ' ἐμὲ π. γνωρ., will apply just as much to the other reading;—for any how the αὐτὸ τοῦτο must include the καὶ παρακαλέσῃ κ.τ.λ. But the fact is, that αὐτὸ τοῦτο may apply exclusively to the following, without any reference to what has preceded: see Rom. ix. 17; the parallel place, Eph. vi. 22; Phil. i. 6. 9. σὺν Ὀνησ.] There can hardly be a doubt [compare ver. 17 with Philem. 2, 10 ff.] that this is the Onesimus of the Epistle to Philemon. When Calv. wrote "vix est credibile hunc esse servum illum Philemonis, quia furis et fugitivi nomen dedecori subjectum fuisset," he forgot that this very term, ἀδελφὸς ἀγαπητός, is applied to him, Philem. 16. ἐξ ὑμῶν] most probably, a native of your town.

πάντ. ὑμ. γν. τ. ὧδε] A formal restatement of τὰ κατ' ἐμὲ π. γν. above. Is it likely, with this restatement, that the same should be again stated in the middle of the sentence, as would be the case with the reading ἵνα γνῶτε τὰ περὶ ἡμῶν?

10—14.] Various greetings from brethren.

10.] Aristarchus was a Thessalonian (Acts xx. 4), first mentioned Acts xix. 29, as dragged into the theatre at Ephesus during the tumult, together with Gaius, both being συνέκδημοι Παύλου. He accompanied Paul to Asia (ib. xx. 4), and was with him in the voyage to Rome (xxvii. 2). In Philem. 24, he sends greeting, with Marcus, Demas, and Lucas, as here. On συναιχμάλωτος, Meyer (after Fritzsche, Rom. vol. i. prolegg. p. xxi) suggests an idea, which may without any straining of probability be adopted, and which would explain why Aristarchus is here συναιχμ., and in Philem. 24, συνεργός, whereas Epaphras is here, ch. i. 7, merely a σύνδουλος, and in Philem. 23 a συναιχμάλωτος. His view is, that the Apostle's friends may have voluntarily shared his imprisonment by turns: and that Aristarchus may have been his fellow-prisoner when he wrote this Epistle, Epaphras when he wrote that to Philemon. συναιχμάλωτος belongs to the same image of warfare as συστρατιώτης, Phil. ii. 25; Philem. 2. Μάρκος] can hardly be other than John Mark, cf. Acts xii. 12, 25, who accompanied Paul and Barnabas in part of their first missionary journey, and because he turned back from them at Perga (ib. xiii. 13; xv. 38), was the subject of dispute between them on their second journey. That he was also the Evangelist, is matter of pure tradition, but not therefore to be rejected.

ἀνεψιός] not 'sister's son:' this rendering has arisen from mistaking the definition given by Hesych., ἀνεψιοί, ἀδελφῶν υἱοί,—meaning that ἀνεψιοί are sons of brothers, i. e. cousins. (Ellic. in notes on his translation of the Epistle, suggests that 'sister's-son' may after all be no mistake, but an archaism to express, as the German Geſchwiſterkind, a cousin.) "Pollux dicit, filios filiasque fratrum et sororum, dici ἀνεψιούς, ex his prognatos ἀνεψιαδοῦς, ἀνεψιαδᾶς, — tertio gradu ἐξανεψιούς, ἐξανεψιάς a Menandro dici." Lobeck on Phrynichus, p. 306. This is decisively shewn in Herod. vii. 5, Μαρδόνιος . . . ὃς ἦν Ξέρξῃ μὲν ἀνεψιός, Δαρείου δὲ ἀδελφεῆς παῖς. It is also used in a wider sense (see Hom. Il. α. 464): but there is no need to depart here from the strict meaning. περὶ οὗ . . .] What these commands were, must be left in entire uncertainty. They had been sent previous to the writing of our Epistle (ἐλάβετε): but from, or by whom, we know not. They concerned Marcus, not Barnabas (as Thl., al.): and one can hardly help connecting them, associated as they are with ἐὰν ἔλθῃ, δέξασθε αὐτόν, with the dispute of Acts xv. 38. It is very possible, that in consequence of the rejection of John Mark on that occasion by St. Paul, the Pauline portion of the churches may have looked upon him with suspicion.

11. Ἰησοῦς . . . Ἰοῦστος] Entirely unknown to us. A Justus is mentioned Acts xviii. 7, as an inhabitant of Corinth, and a proselyte: but there is no further reason to identify the two. The surname Justus (יוּסְטוּס) was common among the Jews: cf. Acts i. 23, and Jos. Vit. 9, 65, 76.

These alone who are of the circumcision (the construction is of the nature of an anacoluthon, οἱ ὄντες ἐκ π. being equivalent to 'of those of the circumcision.' We have a similar construction frequently in the classics: e. g. ἄμφω δ' ἑζομένω γεραρώτερος ἦεν Ὀδυσσεύς, Il. γ. 211: ὄφρα πιστὰ ταμόντες ὁ μὲν βασιλευέτω αἰεί, Od. ω. 483. See many more examples in Kühner, ii. § 678. 2. This seems far better, with Meyer and Lachmann, than with rec. Ellic. al. to place the stop at περιτομῆς and attach the clause to the three preceding names. For thus we lose [in spite of the assertion by Ellic. that the μόνοι naturally refers the thought to the category last mentioned] the fact that there were other συνεργοί not of the circumcision who had been a comfort to him. The judaistic teachers were for the most part in opposition to St. Paul: cf. his complaint, Phil. i. 15, 17) are my fellow-workers towards the kingdom of God (the rest would not be called by this name—so that De W.'s objection to the construction does not apply, that the opponents would not be called συνεργοί; for they are not so called), men that proved (the passive meaning of ἐγενήθησαν is not safely to be pressed: see notes on Eph. iii. 7; 1 Thess. i. 5, 6; 1 Pet. i. 15. The aor. alludes to some event recently passed: to what precisely, we cannot say) a comfort to me (they are my συνεργοί 'quippe qui . . . .' Hierocles, de nuptiis, apud Stob. [Kypke], has the same phrase: ἡ γυνὴ δὲ παροῦσα μεγάλη γίνεται κ. πρὸς ταῦτα παρηγορία: so Plutarch, de auditione, p. 43 [id.], νόσημα παρηγορίας . . . δεόμενον). 12.] On Epaphras, see ch. i. 7 note. is better without a comma at ὑμῶν, both as giving more spirit to the δοῦλος χ. Ἰ., and setting the ἐξ ὑμ. in antithesis to the ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν below. On ἀγων. besides reff., see Rom. xv. 30. By mentioning Epaphras's anxious prayers for them, he works further on their affections, giving them an additional motive for stedfastness, in that one of themselves was thus striving in prayer for them. ἵνα here gives the direct aim of ἀγωνιζ. See above on ver. 3—that ye may stand,—perfect and fully persuaded (see reff.),—in (be firmly settled in, without danger of vacillating or falling) all the (lit. 'in every:' but we cannot thus express it in English) will of God. This connexion, of στῆτε with ἐν, as Mey., seems better than, as ordinarily (so also De W. and Ellic.), to join ἐν with the participles. Eadie characterizes it as needless refinement in Mey. to assert that thus not only a modal-bestimmung but a local-bestimmung is attached to στῆτε: but the use of στῆναι ἐν in the reff. seems to justify it.

13.] πόνος,—an unusual word in the N. T., hence the var. readd.,—is usual in the toil of conflict in war, thus answering to ἀγωνιζόμ. above: so Herod. vi. 114, ἐν τούτῳ τῷ πόνῳ ὁ πολέμαρχος Καλλίμαχος διαφθείρεται: similarly viii. 89. Plat. Phædr. 247 b, ἔνθα δὴ πόνος τε κ. ἀγὼν ἔσχατος ψυχῇ πρόκειται: Demosth. 637. 18, εἰ δ' ἐκεῖνος ἀσθενέστερος ἦν τὸν ὑπὲρ τῆς νίκης ἐνεγκεῖν πόνον.

On account of this mention of Laodicea and Hierapolis, some have thought that Epaphras was the founder of the three churches. See Prolegg. § ii. 2, 7.

Λαοδικείᾳ] LAODICEA was a city of Phrygia Magna (Strabo xii. 8, Plin. v. 29: according to the subscription [rec.] of 1 Tim., the chief city of Phrygia Pacatiana), large (ἡ τῆς χώρας ἀρετὴ κ. τῶν πολιτῶν τινες εὐτυχήσαντες, μεγάλην ἐποιήσαντο αὐτήν, Strab.) and rich (Rev. iii. 17; and Prolegg. to Rev. § iii. 13. Tac. Ann. xiv. 27: 'Laodicea, tremore terræ prolapsa, nullo a nobis remedio, propriis opibus revaluit:' δυνατωτέρα τῶν ἐπὶ θαλάττῃ, Philostr. Soph. i. 25), on the river Lycus (hence called Λ. ἡ ἐπὶ Λύκῳ or πρὸς τῷ Λύκῳ, see Strabo, ib.), formerly called Diospolis, and afterwards Rhoas; its subsequent name was from Laodice queen of Antiochus II. (Steph. Byz.) In A.D. 62, Laodicea, with Hierapolis and Colossæ, was destroyed by an earthquake (Tacit. l. c.), to which visitations the neighbourhood was very subject (εἰ γάρ τις ἄλλη κ. ἡ Λαοδίκεια εὐσειστος, κ. τῆς πλησιοχώρου πλέον, Plin. ib.). There is now on the spot a desolate village called Eski-hissar, with some ancient ruins (Arundel, Seven Churches). Winer, RWB.

Ἱεραπόλει] Six Roman miles north from Laodicea: famed for many mineral springs (Strabo, xiii. 4, describes them at length, also the caverns which exhale noxious vapour. See also Plin. ii. 95), which are still flowing (Schubert, i. 283). Winer, RWB. 14.] This Λουκᾶς has ever been taken for the Evangelist: see Iren. iii. 14. 1, p. 201, and Prolegg. to St. Luke, § i. In ὁ ἰατρὸς ὁ ἀγαπητός there may be a trace of what has been supposed, that it was in a professional capacity that he first became attached to St. Paul, who evidently laboured under grievous sickness during the earlier part of the journey where Luke first appears in his company. Compare Gal. iv. 13 note, with Acts xvi. 6, 10. But this is too uncertain to be more than an interesting conjecture.

15.] καί, before Νυμφᾶν, as so often, selects one out of a number previously mentioned: Nymphas was one of these Laodicean brethren. The var. readings, αὐτοῦ, αὐτῆς, appear to have arisen from the construction (see below) not being understood, and the alteration thus having been made to the singular, but in various genders. αὐτῶν refers to τῶν περὶ Νυμφᾶν: cf. Xen. Mem. i. 2. 62, ἐάν τις φανερὸς γένηται κλέπτων — τούτοις θάνατός ἐστιν ἡ ζημία: and see Bernhardy, p. 288; Kühner ii. § 419 b. On the ἐκκλησία spoken of, see note, Rom. xvi. 5.

16.] ἡ ἐπιστ., the present letter, reff. ποιήσ. ἵνα] as ποίει, ὅπως . . . Herod. i. 8. 209,—ὡς σαφέστατά γ' ἂν εἰδείην . . . ἐποίουν, Xen. Cyr. vi. 3. 18.

τὴν ἐκ Λαοδ.] On this Epistle, see Prolegg. to Eph. § ii. 17, 19; and Philem. § iii. 2, 3. I will only indicate here the right rendering of the words. They cannot well be taken, as τινές in Chrys., to mean οὐχὶ τὴν Π. πρὸς αὐτοὺς ἀπεσταλμένην, ἀλλὰ τὴν παρ' αὐτῶν Παύλῳ (so also Syr., Thdrt., Phot. in Œc., Erasm., Beza, Calv., Wolf, Est., Corn.-a-Lap., al.), both on account of the awkwardness of the sense commanding them to read an Epistle sent from Laodicea, and not found there, and on account of the phrase τὴν ἐκ so commonly having the pregnant meaning of 'which is there and must be sought from there;' cf. Kühner, ii. § 623 a. Herod. iii. 6. Thucyd. ii. 34; iii. 22; vi. 32; vii. 70, and other examples there. We may safely say that a letter not from, but to the Laodiceans is meant. For the construction of this latter sentence, ποιήσατε again is of course to be supplied.

17.] Archippus is mentioned Philem. 2, and called the Apostle's συνστρατιώτης. I have treated on the inference to be drawn from this passage as to his abode, in the Prolegg. to Philemon, § iii. 1. He was evidently some officer of the church, but what, in the wideness of διακονία, we cannot say: and conjectures are profitless (see such in Est. and Corn.-a-Lap.). Meyer well remarks, that the authority hereby implied on the part of the congregation to exercise reproof and discipline over their teachers is remarkable: and that the hierarchical turn given to the passage by Thl. and Œc. (ἵνα ὅταν ἐπιτιμᾷ Ἀρχ. αὐτοῖς, μὴ ἔχωσιν ἐγκαλεῖν ἐκείνῳ ὡς πικρῷ, ... ἐπεὶ ἄλλως ἄτοπον τοῖς μαθηταῖς περὶ τοῦ διδασκάλου διαλέγεσθαι, Thl.) belongs to a later age. As to the words themselves,—Take heed to the ministry which thou receivedst in the Lord (the sphere of the reception of the ministry; in which the recipient lived and moved and promised at his ordination: not, of the ministry itself [τὴν ἐν κυρ.],—nor is ἐν to be diverted from its simple local meaning), that (aim and end of the βλέπε,—in order that) thou fulfil it (reff.).

ὁ . . . . Παύλου] See ref. 1 Cor., where the same words occur. μνημ. . . . . δεσμ.] These words extend further than to mere pecuniary support, or even mere prayers: they were ever to keep before them the fact that one who so deeply cared for them, and loved them, and to whom their perils of false doctrine occasioned such anxiety, was a prisoner in chains: and that remembrance was to work and produce its various fruits—of prayer for him, of affectionate remembrance of his wants, of deep regard for his words. When we read of 'his chains,' we should not forget that they moved over the paper as he wrote. His right hand was chained to the soldier that kept him. See Smith's Dict. of Antiq. under 'Catena.' ἡ χάρις—cf. reff. and ch. iii. 16. 'The grace' in which we stand (Rom. v. 2): it seems (reff.) to be a form of valediction belonging to the later period of the Epistles of St. Paul.

CHAP. I. 1.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. The Apostle names Silvanus and Timotheus with himself, as having with him founded the church at Thessalonica, see Acts xvi. 1: xvii. 14. Silvanus is placed before Timotheus, then a youth (Acts xvi. 1 f., see further in Prolegg. to 1 Tim. § i. 3, 4), as being one ἡγούμενος ἐν τοῖς ἀδελφοῖς (Acts xv. 22, 32; xviii. 5), and a προφήτης (ib. xv. 32, see also 2 Cor. i. 19; 1 Pet. v. 12). He does not name himself an Apostle, probably for (an amplification of) the reason given by De Wette,—because his Apostleship needed not any substantiation to the Thessalonians. For the same reason he omits the designation in the Epistle to the Philippians. This last fact precludes the reasons given,—by Pelt, al., 'id ei tum non jam moris fuisse,' by Chrys.,—διὰ τὸ νεοκατηχήτους εἶναι τοὺς ἄνδρας, κ. μηδέπω αὐτοῦ πεῖραν εἰληφέναι, — by Estius, Pelt (altern.), and Zwingl., out of modesty, not to distinguish himself from Silvanus and Timotheus,—by Jowett, "probably the name 'Apostle,' which in its general sense was used of many, was gradually, and at no definite period, applied to him with the same special meaning as to the Apostles at Jerusalem." τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ] So in 2 Thess., Gal., Corr., in the other Epistles, viz. Rom., Eph., Col., Phil., more generally, e. g.,—πᾶσιν τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Ῥώμῃ ἀγαπητοῖς θεοῦ, κλητοῖς ἁγίοις. This is most probably accounted for by the circumstances of the various Epistles. We may notice that the gen. plur. of the persons constituting the church occurs only in the addresses of these two Epistles. We may render 'of Thessalonians,' or 'of the Thessalonians:' better the former.

ἐν θεῷ πατρί] The construction need not be filled up by τῇ or τῇ οὔσῃ, as Chr., al.: nor with Schott, by understanding χαίρειν λέγουσιν, which would be unnecessary, seeing that the apostolic greeting follows. The words form a ("tertiary," Ellic.) predication respecting τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, or Θεσσαλονικέων, which requires no supplementing. See Winer, edn. 6, § 20. 2. ἐν θεῷ πατρί marks them as not being heathens,—κ. κυρίῳ Ἰησοῦ χριστῷ, as not being Jews. So De W. after Chrys.: but perhaps the πατρί already marks them as Christians.

The ἐν, as usual, denotes communion and participation in, as the element of spiritual life. χάρις ὑμῖν κ. εἰρήνη] "Gratia et pax a Deo sit vobis, ut, qui humana gratia et sæculari pace privati estis, apud Deum gratiam et pacem habeatis." Anselm (in Pelt). The words which follow in the rec. are not yet added in this his first Epistle. Afterwards they became a common formula with him.

2—III. 13.] FIRST PORTION OF THE EPISTLE, in which he pours out his heart to the Thessalonians respecting all the circumstances of their reception of and adhesion to the faith. 2—10.] Jowett remarks, that few passages are more characteristic of the style of St. Paul than this one: both as being the overflowing of his love in thankfulness for his converts, about whom he can never say too much: and as to the very form and structure of the sentences, which seem to grow under his hand, gaining force in each successive clause by the repetition and expansion of the preceding. See this exemplified in detail in his note. 2.] εὐχαριστοῦμεν, coming so immediately after the mention of Paul, Silvanus, and Timotheus, can hardly be here understood of the Apostle alone, as Pelt, Conyb. and Hows., Jowett, al. For undoubted as it is that he often, e. g. ch. iii. 1, 2, where see note, uses the plural of himself alone, yet it is as undoubted that he uses it also of himself and his fellow-labourers—e. g., 2 Cor. i. 18, 19. And so De W., Lünemann, al., take it here.

πάντοτε περὶ πάντων] We have the same alliteration Eph. v. 20. These words belong to εὐχαριστ., not to μνείαν ποι. On these latter words see Rom. i. 9 f.

ἀδιαλείπτως seems by the nearly parallel place, Rom. i. 9, to belong to μνείαν ὑμ. ποι., not to μνημονεύοντες, as Lün., Pelt, al. Such a formula would naturally repeat itself, as far as specifications of this kind are concerned. Still it must be borne in mind, that the order there is slightly different. 3.] μνημον. is not intransitive, as Erasm.-Schmid, al.: but as in reff.: 'commemorantes,' Beza. ὑμῶν is by Œcum., Calv., al., regarded as the genitive after μνημον. standing alone, and ἕνεκα supplied before the other genitives. But such a construction may be doubted, and at all events it is much simpler here to regard ὑμ. as the genitive governed by τοῦ ἔργου, ... τοῦ κόπου, and τῆς ὑπομονῆς, and prefixed, as belonging to all three. πίστις, ἀγάπη, ἐλπίς, are the three great Christian graces of 1 Cor. xiii. See also ch. v. 8; Col. i. 4, 5: and Usteri, paulinisch. Lehrbegriff, p. 236 ff.

τοῦ ἔργου τῆς πίστεως] Simple as these words are, all sorts of strange meanings have been given to them. Koppe and Rosenmüller hold τ. ἔργου to be pleonastic: Calv., Calov., al., render (ungrammatical) 'your faith wrought by God;' Kypke, 'the reality (ἔργ. as contrasted with λόγος) of your faith;' Chrys., Thl., Thdrt., Œc., al., 'the endurance of your faith in suffering:' &c. Comparing the words with the following genitives, they seem to mean, 'that work (energetic activity) which faith brings forth' (as Chrys. ἡ πίστις διὰ τῶν ἔργων δείκνυται: the gen., as also those following, being thus a possessive one: see Ellicott here): q. d. 'the activity of your faith:' see 2 Thess. i. 11: or perhaps, as Jowett (but not so well), "'your work of faith,' i. e. the Christian life, which springs from faith:" thus making the gen. one of origin.

τοῦ κόπου] probably towards the sick and needy strangers, cf. Acts xx. 35;

τ. ὑπομ. τῆς ἐλπίδος] your endurance of hope—i. e. endurance (in trials) which belongs to (see above), characterizes, your hope; and also nourishes it, in turn: cf. Rom. xv. 4, ἵνα διὰ τῆς ὑπομονῆς, κ. διὰ τῆς παρακλήσεως τῶν γραφῶν τὴν ἐλπίδα ἔχωμεν. τοῦ κυρ. ἡμ. Ἰ. χ.] specifies the hope—that it is a hope of the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ (cf. ver. 10). Olsh. refers the words to all three preceding substantives—but this seems alien from St. Paul's style. On all three Jowett says well, 'your faith, hope, and love; a faith that had its outward effect on your lives: a love that spent itself in the service of others: a hope that was no mere transient feeling, but was content to wait for the things unseen when Christ should be revealed.' ἔμπρ. τ. θ. κ. πατρ. ἡμ.] belongs most naturally to μνημονεύοντες—making mention . . . . before God: not to the genitives preceding (see Rom. iv. 17; xiv. 22), as Thdrt., al.

4.] εἰδότες refers back to μνημονεύοντες; in that we know—or for we know. Thdrt., Erasm., Grot., al., take it for οἴδατε γάρ, or εἰδότες ἐστέ, wrongly referring it to the Thessalonians: Pelt joins it with μνείαν ποιούμενοι: but the construction as above seems the best. ὑπὸ θεοῦ belongs to ἠγαπημένοι, as in 2 Thess. ii. 13, see also Rom. i. 7: not to εἰδότες, as Est. thinks possible (ὑπό for παρά?), nor to ἐκλογήν—either as E. V., 'your election of God,' which is ungrammatical (requiring τὴν ὑπ. θ. ἐκ), or as Œc., Thl., all., ὑπὸ θ. τὴν ἐκλ. ὑμ. (εἶναι), which would introduce an irrelevant emphasis on ὑπὸ θεοῦ. ἐκλογή must not be softened down: it is the election unto life of individual believers by God, so commonly adduced by St. Paul (reff.: and 1 Cor. i. 27; 2 Thess. ii. 13). ὑμῶν, objective genitive after ἐκλογήν — knowing that God ἐξελέξατο ὑμᾶς. 5.] ὅτι has been taken to mean 'videlicet, id est,' and the verse to be an epexegesis of ἐκλογήν: but as Lün. remarks, evidently verses 5, 6 ff. are meant not to explain wherein their election consisted, but to give reasons in matter of fact for concluding (εἰδότες) the existence of that election. ὅτι must then be because, and a colon be placed at ὑμῶν. These reasons are (1) the power and confidence with which he and Silvanus and Timotheus preached among them (ver. 5), and (2) the earnest and joyful manner in which the Thessalonians received it (vv. 6 ff.). Both these were signs of God's grace to them—tokens of their election vouchsafed by Him. τὸ εὐαγγ. ἡμ., the gospel which we preached. ἐγενήθη εἰς] See reff., especially Gal.: came to you is perhaps the nearest: εἰς betokens the direction. πρός, with ἐγέν., would give nearly the same sense, or perhaps that of apud, see ref. 1 Cor. &c. We must not take ἐγενήθη εἰς ὑμ. for a constr. prægnans (ἦλθ. εἰς καὶ ἐγ. ἐν), which with ἦν it might be: for ἐγενήθη εἰς carries motion in itself without any thing supplied. On 'the passive form ἐγενήθη, alien to the Attic, and originally Doric, but common in the κοινή' (Lün.), see note on Eph. iii. 7; Lobeck on Phryn. p. 108 ff.; Kühner, i. 193; Winer, § 15. It was attempted in my earlier editions to press the passive sense in the frequent occurrences of this form in this Epistle. But wider acquaintance with the usage has since convinced me that this is not possible, and that we must regard it as equivalent in meaning to the more usual ἐγένετο. The prepositions ἐν following indicate the form and manner in which the preaching was carried on, not (as Pelt, al.) that in which the Thessalonians received it, which is not treated till ver. 6. δυνάμει is not 'miracles,' as Thdrt., Œc., all., nor efficacia et

Even Conyb. here has fallen into this error, and rendered "power of the Holy Ghost." It is a predicate advancing beyond ἐν δυνάμει—not only in force and energy, but in the Holy Ghost—in a manner which could only be ascribed to the operation of the Holy Spirit. πληροφορίᾳ πολλῇ] much confidence (of faith), see reff. Many irrelevant meanings have been given: fulness of spiritual gifts, which the Thessalonians had received (Lomb., Corn.-a-lap., Turretin.): certainty of the truth, felt by them (Macknight, Benson, al.): 'fulfilment of the apostolic office' (Estius). The confidence (see above) was that in which Paul and Silvanus and Timotheus preached to them. καθὼς κ.τ.λ.] Appeal to their knowledge that the fact was so. These words restrict the foregoing to the preachers, as explained above: καὶ τί, φησι, μακρηγορῶ; αὐτοὶ ὑμεῖς μάρτυρές ἐστε, οἷοι ἐγενήθημεν πρὸς ὑμᾶς. Œc. This interpretation is fixed by καθώς, referring back to the whole previous description. The sense has been variously given: Conyb., 'And you, likewise know'—but 'likewise' surely confounds the connexion: Pelt, even further from the mark, ... 'ita accipimus, ut Apostolum exemplum suum Thessalonicensibus imitandum statuamus.' οἷοι ἐγενήθ.] what manner of men we proved, as Ellic.: not 'quales facti simus,' see above on this note: nor as vulg., 'quales fuerimus;' the point of the fact appealed to is, the proof given, what manner of men they were, by the manner of their preaching. "The ποιότης was evinced in the power and confidence with which they delivered their message." Ellic.: the proof given by the manner of their preaching.

It is somewhat difficult here to fix exactly the point of comparison, in which they imitated their ministers and Christ. Certainly it is not merely, in receiving the word—for to omit other objections, this would not apply at all to Him:—and therefore, not in any qualifying detail of their method of reception of the word - not in δύναμις, nor in πν. ἁγ., nor in πληρ. πολλ. So far being clear, we have but one particular left, and that respects the circumstances under which, and the spirit with which: and here we find a point of comparison even with Christ Himself: viz. joyful endurance even in spirit under sufferings. This it was in which they imitated the Apostles, and their divine Master, and which made them patterns to other churches (see below). nians' Christian character. τύπον, of the whole church as one: see Bernhardy, p. 60. πᾶσιν τοῖς πιστεύουσιν] to the whole of the believers. οἱ πιστεύοντες, like ὁ πειράζων, designates the kind. Chrys. understands this participle as if it were πιστεύσασιν:—καὶ μὴν ἐν ὑστέρῳ ἦλθε πρὸς αὐτούς· ἀλλ' οὕτως ἐλάμψατε, φησίν, ὡς τῶν προλαβόντων γενέσθαι διδασκάλους . . . . οὐ γὰρ εἶπεν, ὥστε τύπους γενέσθαι πρὸς τὸ πιστεῦσαι, ἀλλὰ τοῖς ἤδη πιστεύουσι τύπος ἐγένεσθε. But it was not so: for the only church in Europe which was in Christ before the Thessalonian, was the Philippian (Acts xvi. 12—xvii. 1, see ch. ii. 2). Μακ. κ. Ἀχ.] Cf. Rom. xv. 26; Acts xix. 21: the two Roman provinces, comprehending Northern and Southern Greece. There is no reference, as Thdrt., to the Greeks being ἔθνη μέγιστα κ. ἐπὶ σοφίᾳ θαυμαζόμενα, and so their praise being the greater: these are mentioned simply because the Apostle had been, since their conversion, in Macedonia, and had left Silvanus and Timotheus there,—and was now in Achaia. 8.] Proof of the praise in ver. 7. ἀφ' ὑμῶν is merely local, from you, as in ref.; not 'by you' (as preachers) (ὑφ' ὑμῶν), as Rückert, "locorum Paulinorum 1 Thess. i. 8 et 1 Thess. iii. 1—3 explanatio:" nor 'by your means,' viz. in saving Silas and myself from danger of our lives and so enabling us to preach (δι' ὑμῶν), as Storr, and Flatt. ἐξήχηται] δηλῶν ὅτι ὥσπερ σάλπιγγος λαμπρὸν ἠχούσης ὁ πλησίον ἅπας πληροῦται τόπος, οὕτω τῆς ὑμετέρας ἀνδρείας ἡ φήμη καθάπερ ἐκείνη σαλπίζουσα ἱκανὴ τὴν οἰκουμένην ἐμπλῆσαι. Chrys. ὁ λόγ. τ. κυρίου, cannot be as De W. 'the fame of the reception of the Gospel by you:' the sense seems to be that your ready reception and faith as it were sounded forth the λόγον τοῦ κυρίου, the word of the Lord, the Gospel message, loudly and clearly, through all parts. The logical construction of this verse is somewhat difficult. After the οὐ μόνον ἐν τ. Μακ. κ. Ἀχ., we expect merely ἀλλ' ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ: but these words appear, followed by a new subject and a new predicate. Either then we must regard this new subject and predicate as merely an epexegesis of the former, ἐξήχηται ὁ λόγ. τοῦ κυρ., or, with Lünemann, we must place a colon at κυρίου, and begin a new sentence with οὐ μόνον. This last is very objectionable, for it leaves ἀφ' ὑμ. . . . . κυρίου standing alone in the most vapid and spiritless manner, with the strong rhetorical word ἐξήχηται unaccounted for and unemphatic. The other way then must be our refuge, and I cannot see those objections to it which Lün. has found. It is quite according to the versatile style of St. Paul, half to lose sight of the οὐ μόνον ἀλλ', and to go on after ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ with a new sentence; and especially as that new sentence explains the somewhat startling one preceding. πρός, towards, directed towards God as its object (and here, as contrasted with idols, see next verse)—not = the more usual εἰς, to and into, as Ellic. correcting my previous on (ἐπί).

De Wette, al., suppose with some probability that the report of the Thessalonians' faith may have been spread by Christian travelling merchants, such as Aquila and Priscilla. ὥστε μὴ . . . .]

The report being already rife, we found no occasion to speak of your faith, or in your praise. 9.] αὐτοί, the people ἐν τ. Μακ. κ. Ἀχ., κ. ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ: see reff., and Bernhardy, p. 288. περὶ ἡμῶν] concerning us, Paul and Silvanus and Timotheus; not as Lün., 'us both,' including the Thessalonians. This he does, to square the following clauses, which otherwise are not correspondent: but there are two objections to his view: (1) the emphatic position of περὶ ἡμῶν, which seems to necessitate its keeping its strict meaning: (2) that it would in this case have been much more naturally ὑμῶν than ἡμῶν, as the second person has prevailed throughout, and our εἴσοδος to you was quite as much a matter happening to you as to us. That καὶ περὶ ὑμῶν, πῶς should be abbreviated as we find it, will surely not surprise any one familiar with the irregularities, in point of symmetry, of St. Paul's style. The ἀπαγγελλόμενα here correspond to the two members of the above proof, verses 5 and 6. ὅτολαν has no reference to danger, as Chrys., al. εἴσοδος, merely access, in the way of coming to them: see ch. ii. 1: not of itself facilis aditus, as Pelt. πῶς, merely how that, introducing matter of fact,—not 'how,' 'in what manner,' how joyfully and energetically, as Lünem.: if so, the long specification (πρὸς . . . . ἐρχομένης), which follows the (thus) unemphatic verb, drags wearily: whereas, regarded as indicating matter of fact only, the πῶς is unemphatic, and the matter of fact itself, carrying the emphasis, justifies the full statement which is made of it. ζῶντι κ. ἀληθινῷ] ζῶντα μὲν αὐτὸν ὠνόμασεν, ὡς ἐκείνων οὐ ζόντων. ἀληθινὸν δέ, ὡς ἐκείνων ψευδῶς θεῶν καλουμένων. Thdrt. 10.] The especial aspect of the faith of the Thessalonians was hope: hope of the return of the Son of God from heaven: a hope, indeed, common to them with all Christians in all ages, but evidently entertained by them as pointing to an event more immediate than the church has subsequently believed it to be. Certainly these words would give them an idea of the nearness of the coming of Christ: and perhaps the misunderstanding of them may have contributed to the notion which the Apostle corrects, 2 Thess. ii. 1 ff.: see note there. By ὃν ἤγ. ἐκ τῶν νεκρῶν, that whereby (Rom. i. 4) Jesus was declared to be the Son of God with power, is emphatically prefixed to His name. τὸν ῥυόμενον] who delivereth: not = τ. ῥυσάμενον,—still less as E. V., past, 'who delivered,' but descriptive of His office, = 'our Deliverer,' as ὁ πειράζων, &c. τῆς ἐρχ.—which is coming: cf. Eph. v. 6; Col. iii. 6. CH. II. 1–16.] He reminds the Thessalonians of his manner of preaching among them (1—12, answering to ch. i. 9 a): praises them for their reception of the Gospel, and firmness in persecution (13—16, answering to ch. i. 9 b). 1.] γάρ refers back to ὅτολαν, ch. i. 9: 'not only do strangers report it, but you know it to be true.' He makes use now of that knowledge to carry out the description of his preaching among them, with a view, by recapitulating these details, to confirm them, who were as yet but novices, in the faith. κενή] It is evident from vv. 2 ff., that this does not here apply to the fruits, but to the character of his preaching: the result does not appear till ver. 13. And within this limitation, we may observe that the verb is γέγονεν, not ἐγένετο; to be understood therefore not of any mere intent of the Apostle at the time of his coming among them, but of some abiding character of his preaching. It cannot then be understood as Koppe, —'veni ad vos eo consilio .... ut vobis prodessem, non ut otiose inter vos viverem:' and nearly so Rosenm. It probably expresses, that his εἴσοδος was and continued 'no empty scheme' ('no light matter,' as we say; οὐχ ἡ τυχοῦσα, Chrys.), but an earnest, bold, self-denying endeavour for their good. This he proceeds to prove. 2.] προπαθόντες, having previously suffered: reff. On the fact, see Acts xvi. ἐπαρρησιασ.] Lünemann seems to be right (against De W.) in rendering it we were confident, not 'we were free of speech.' See however, on the other side, Ellic.'s note.

ἡμῶν, because all true confidence is in God as our God. This word reproduces the feeling with which Paul and Silas opened their ministry among them: διὰ τὸν ἐνδυναμοῦντα θεὸν τοῦτο ποιῆσαι τεθαρρήκαμεν. Œcum. λαλῆσαι is infinitive of the object after ἐπαρρησ.— we had the confidence to speak: as E. V., were bold to speak. This seems more probable than with De W., Mey. on Eph. vi. 20, and Ellic., to regard it as the epexegetical inf. "defining still more clearly the oral nature of the boldness." Chrys. can hardly be quoted on that side, as Ellic. doubtfully. τοῦ θεοῦ, for solemnity, to add to the weight of their εἴσοδος. ἐν πολλῷ ἀγῶνι] in (amidst) much conflict, viz. under outward circumstances conflicting much with our work: and therefore that work could be no κενόν, which was thus maintained.

3, 4.] Reasons why he ἐπαρρησιάσατο λαλῆσαι .... ἐν πολλῷ ἀγῶνι:—viz. the true and single-minded character of his ministry, and his duty to God as the steward of the Gospel. 3. παράκλησις] exhortation to you, viz. our whole course of preaching. Supply is, not 'was;' cf. λαλοῦμεν below. "The two senses of παράκλησις, exhortation and consolation, so easily passing into one another (compare ver. 11), are suggestive of the external state of the early church, sorrowing amid the evils of the world, and needing as its first lesson to be comforted; and not less suggestive of the first lesson of the Gospel to the individual soul, of peace in believing." Jowett. ἐκ] having its source in. πλάνης] here probably error. "The word is used transitively and intransitively. In the former case, it is 'imposture' (Matt. xxvii. 64) or 'seduction' (Eph. iv. 14): in the latter and more usual, error." Lünem. ἀκαθαρσίας] hardly, as Chrys., ὑπὲρ μυσαρῶν πραγμάτων οἷον γοήτων κ. μάγων, —though such a reference is certainly possible, considering the vile degradation of that class at the period,—but here apparently of the impure desire of gain, cf. ver. 5, where ἐν προφάσει πλεονεξίας seems to correspond with ἐξ ἀκαθαρσίας. Still such a meaning seems to want example. If it be correct, this represents (Lün.) the subjective side, the motive, as ἐκ πλάνης the objective side, the ground. ἐν δόλῳ] this of the manner, or perhaps, as Ellic., the ethical sphere, in which: 'nor did we make use of deceit to win our way with our παράκλησις.' answers not to the following ὡς, but to the preceding καθώς, and is emphatic—'even so.' ἀρέσκοντες, in the strict sense of the present tense,—going about to please,—striving to please. ὡς belongs to the whole sentence, not merely to ἀνθρ. ἀρέσκ. As Lünem. justly observes against De W., τὰς καρδίας here and τὰς ἑαυτ. ψυχάς below, are conclusive against imagining that St. Paul in this place is speaking of himself alone. Yet Conyb. renders it, 'my heart,' and τὰς ἑ. ψ., 'my own life.'

5 ff.] Proofs again of the assertions of vv. 3, 4. For neither did we become conversant (see reff. γενέσθαι ἔν τινι, in re quadam versari; so οἱ μὲν ἐν τούτοις τοῖς λόγοις ἦσαν, Xen. Lün. qnotes Theophrastus, Charr. 2,—τὴν δὲ κολακείαν ὑπολάβοι ἄν τις ὁμιλίαν αἰσχρὰν εἶναι, συμφέρουσαν δὲ τῷ κολακεύοντι,—and Ellic. remarks, "It seems more specifically to illustrate the ἐν δόλῳ of ver. 3, and forms a natural transition to the next words, the essence of κολακεία being self-interest: ὁ δὲ ὅπως ὠφέλειά τις αὐτῷ γίγνηται εἰς χρήματα καὶ ὅσα διὰ χρημάτων, κόλαξ. Aristot. Eth. Nic. iv. 12 ad fin.") as ye know, nor (ἐγενήθημεν) in pretext (employed in that which was meant to be a pretext, not 'in occasione avaritiæ,' as vulg. and Le Clerc; nor is πρόφασις 'species,' as Wolf) of (serving to conceal) avarice; God is witness (τῆς μὲν κολακείας αὐτοὺς ἐκάλεσε μάρτυρας, δῆλα γὰρ τοῖς ἀκούουσι τῶν κολάκων τὰ ῥήματα· τῆς δὲ πλεονεξίας οὐκέτι αὐτούς, ἀλλὰ τὸν τῶν ὅλων ἐπόπτην. Thdrt., and similarly Chrys. But perhaps it is simpler, seeing that no ὑμεῖς is expressed with οἴδατε, to refer θεὸς μάρ. to the whole). 6.] ζητοῦντες belongs to ἐγενήθημεν above. ἐξ ἀνθρώπων, emphatic: τὴν γὰρ ἐκ θεοῦ καὶ ἐζήτουν κ. ἐλάμβανον. Œc. The real distinction here between ἐκ and ἀπό seems to be, that ἐκ belongs more to the abstract ground of the δόξα, ἀπό to the concrete object from which it was in each case to accrue. This is strictly correct, not, as Ellic., who has misunderstood my distinction, 'artificial and precarious:' nor is it ever safe to assume identity of meaning, in St. Paul's style, of different prepositions, except where the form of the sentence absolutely requires it. The glory which they sought was not at all to come out of human sources, whether actually from the Thessalonians or from any others.

δυνάμενοι] though we had the power. ἐν βάρει εἶναι] Thdrt., Est., Grot., Calov., all., refer this to πλεονεξ. mentioned above, and understand it of using the power of living by the gospel, which St. Paul, &c. might have done, but did not: so ἐπιβαρεῖν, ver. 9: 2 Thess. iii. 8; καταβαρεῖν, 2 Cor. xii. 16; ἀβαρῆ ἐμαυτὸν ἐτήρησα, ib. xi. 9. But the words are separated from the πλεονεξία by the new idea beginning at ζητοῦντες, to which, and not to the former clause, this is subordinated. I therefore take them with Chrys. (Œc., Thl., undecided), Ambrst., Erasm., Calv., &c., Olsh., De W., Lün.,—as equivalent to ἐν τιμῇ εἶναι—εἰκὸς γὰρ τοὺς παρὰ θεοῦ πρὸς ἀνθρώπους ἀποσταλέντας, ὡσανεὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ νῦν ἥκοντας πρέσβεις, πολλῆς ἀπολαῦσαι τιμῆς. Chr. βάρος is used of importance, dignity,—'weight,' as we say: e. g. Diod. Sic. iv. 61, ἀπὸ τούτων τῶν χρόνων Ἀθηναῖοι, διὰ τὸ βάρος τῆς πόλεως, φρονήματος ἐνεπίμπλαντο, κ. τῆς τῶν Ἑλλήνων ἡγεμονίας ὠρέχθησαν, and in this sense St. Paul's Epistles were called βαρεῖαι, 2 Cor. x. 10. Cf. also βάρος δόξης, where however βάρος is used sensu proprio, as opposed to ἐλαφρόν, 2 Cor. iv. 17. Render therefore, when we might have stood on our dignity. Heins., Pisc., Hamm., understand the words of ecclesiastical censures—'quum severitatem exercere apostolicam posset,'—and oppose them to ἐγεν. ἤπιοι below: but see there.

ὡς χρ. ἀπ.] not: 'as the other Apostles' (Grot., Pelt, referring to 1 Cor. ix. 5, but ungrammatical), but as (being) Apostles of Christ. It is simpler to take ἀπόστολοι here in its wider sense, than to limit the sentence to St. Paul alone.

7.] ἀλλά contrasts, not with the mere subordinate clause of the last verse (δυνάμ. κ.τ.λ), but with its whole sense, and introduces the positive side of their behaviour – q. d. 'so far from being any of the aforesaid, we were . . .' ἐγενήθ., as before, with a reference to God enabling us.

ἤπιοι, mild: so Od. β. 47, πατὴρ δ' ὡς ἤπιος ἦεν: Herodian iv. 1, ἤπιον ἄρχοντα κ. πατέρα: Pausan. Eliac. ii. 18, βασιλέα γὰρ οὐ τὰ πάντα ἤπιον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὰ μάλιστα θυμῷ χρώμενον Ἀλέξανδρον τοῦ Φιλίππου (Wetst.): see also Herod. iii. 89: and Ellic.'s note here. Surely the reading νήπιοι, being (1) by far the commoner word, (2) so easily introduced by the final ν of the preceding word, can hardly, in the teeth of the sense, come under consideration: seeing too that the primary authorities are not unanimous. ἐν μέσ. ὑμ.] i. e. 'in our converse with you;' but with an allusion to our not lifting ourselves above you;—ὡς εἷς ἐξ ὑμῶν, Œc. It is best to retain the comma after ὑμῶν, not as Lün., to place a colon: for though there is a break in the construction, it is one occasioned by the peculiar style of the Apostle, which should not be amended by punctuation. The emphasis on ἑαυτῆς should not be lost sight of—as when a nurse (a suckling mother) cherishes (reff.) her own children. See Gal. iv. 19, for the same figure. 8.] οὕτως belongs to εὐδοκοῦμεν, and is the apodosis to ὡς above. ὁμειρόμενοι] ὁμείρεσθαι is found in reff. only (and in both, the MSS. differ), except in the glossaries. Hesych., Phavor., and Phot. explain it by ἐπιθυμεῖν. Thl. says, τουτέστι, προσδεδεμένοι ὑμῖν, κ. ἐχόμενοι ὑμῶν, παρὰ τὸ ὁμοῦ κ. τὸ εἴρω, τὸ συμπλέκω: and Phot. gives ὁμοῦ ἡρμόσθαι as its meaning. But as Lünem. observes after Winer, edn. 6, § 16. B), "This is suspicious, 1) because the verb here governs a genitive and not a dative, 2) because there is no instance of a similar verb compounded with ὁμοῦ or ὁμός. Now as in Nicander (Theriaca, ver. 402) the simple form μείρεσθαι occurs in the sense of ἱμείρεσθαι, it can hardly be doubted that μείρεσθαι is the original root, to which ἱμείρεσθαι and ὁμείρεσθαι (having the same meaning) are related, having a syllable prefixed for euphony. Cf. the analogous forms κέλλω and ὀκέλλω,—βύρομαι and ὀδύρομαι,—φλέω and ὀφλέω,—αὔω and ἰαύω, &c., and see Kühner, i. p. 27." It will thus perhaps be best rendered by loving you, earnestly desiring you. εὐδόκ.] not present, but imperfect, without an augment, as is also generally the aorist εὐδόκησα in N. T.: see Winer, § 12. 3. a: we delighted; 'it was my joy to . . . .'

Conyb. τὰς ἑαυτ. ψυχάς, as remarked above, shews beyond doubt that he is including here Silas and Timotheus with himself. μεταδοῦναι will not strictly apply to τὰς ἑαυ. ψυχ., but we must borrow from the compound verb the idea of giving, or offering. The comparison is exceedingly tender and beautiful: as the nursing-mother, cherishing her children, joys to give not only her milk, but her life, for them,—so we, bringing up you as spiritual children, delighted in giving, not only the milk of the word, but even (and here it was matter of fact) our own lives, for your nourishment in Christ. And that, because ye became (the passive form ἐγενήθητε must not be pressed to a passive meaning, as in my earlier editions: see on ch. i. 5) very dear to us. 9.] Proof of the dearness of the Thessalonians to Paul and his companions: not of ἐγενήθ. ἠπιοι, to which it would be irrelevant,—nor of their readiness to give their lives, &c. (as Ellic.), for this verse does not refer to dangers undergone, but to labour, in order not to trouble any. It is no objection to this (Ellic.) that διότι κ.τ.λ. is a subordinate causal member of the preceding sentence, seeing that it is precisely St. Paul's habit to break the tenor of his style by inserting confirmations of such clauses. μνημ. is indic. (γάρ).

Acts xx. 31. ἐργαζόμενοι (reff.) in its strict meaning of manual labour—viz., at tent-cloth making, Acts xviii. 3. πρ. τὸ μὴ ἐπιβ.] in order not to burden any of you, viz. by accepting from you the means of sustenance. One can hardly say with Chrys., ἐνταῦθα δείκνυσιν ἐν πενίᾳ ὄντας τοὺς ἄνδρας: for we know St. Paul's strong feeling on this point, 2 Cor. xi. 9, 10. εἰς ὑμᾶς, to you—not quite = ὑμῖν: the latter represents the preaching more as a thing imparted, this as a thing diffused. On the supposed inconsistency of the statement here with the narrative in Acts xvii., see Prolegomena, § ii. 3, and note.

σπουδάσατε ἄσπιλοι κ. ἀμώμητοι αὐτῷ εὑρεθῆναι. For otherwise we lose the force of the slight emphasis on ὑμ. τοῖς πιστ., q. d. 'whatever we may have seemed to the unbelieving:' "tametsi aliis non ita videremur," Bengel. See Bernhardy, p. 337 f. The charge of want of point, brought by Jowett against the words τοῖς πιστεύουσιν, hence appears to be unfounded. The former verse having referred to external occupation, in which he must have consorted with unbelievers, he here narrows the circle, to speak of his behaviour among the brethren themselves.

11, 12.] Appeal to the detailed judgment of each one, that this was so. This ὁσίως κ. δικαίως κ. ἀμέμπτως in their judgment is substantiated by the fact, that οἱ περὶ τὸν Παῦλον busied themselves in establishing every one of them in the faith.

11.] καθάπερ refers what follows to what has gone before, as co-ordinate with it. ὡς ἕνα ἕκαστ. . . . ὑμᾶς] The construction is that of nouns in apposition, in cases where the one designates the individuals of whom the other is the aggregate. In this case the noun of larger designation generally comes first. The simplest instance that can be given is ταῦτα πάντα, where ταῦτα is the aggregate, πάντα the individualizing noun (whereas in πάντα ταῦτα, ταῦτα is the individuals, and πάντα merely the adjective designation of their completeness): so here ἕνα ἕκαστον ὑμῶν . . . ὑμᾶς differs very little from πάντας ὑμᾶς. As regards the participles, the simplest way of constructing them is to supply ἐγενήθημεν, which has just preceded. Ellicott would rather regard them as an instance of St. Paul's common participial anacolutha, which may also be: but here the construction is simple without such a supposition. Both παρακλ. and παραμυθ. seem here best taken, with Lünem., as applying to exhortation, but in a sense nearly allied to consolation: see note on ver. 3. The subject of the exhortation follows, εἰς τὸ κ.τ.λ.: and this would be closely connected with their bearing up under trouble and persecution: cf. vv. 14 ff. 12. μαρτυρόμ.] see reff.: it strengthens the two former participles; conjuring. This is the sense of the verb not only in later but in earlier writers also: see reff. εἰς τὸ . . . belongs to all three participles preceding: the εἰς implying the direction, and, of course, in a subjective sentence, consequently the purpose of their action. καλοῦντες, pres. because the action is extended on to the future by the following words. βασιλείαν and δόξαν must not be incorporated by the silly ἐν διὰ δυοῖν: God calls us to His kingdom, the kingdom of our Lord Jesus, which He shall establish at His coming: and He calls us to His glory,—to partake of that glory in His presence, which our Lord Jesus had with Him before the world began; John xvii. 5, 24. See Rom. v. 2. 13.] διὰ τοῦτο is best and most simply referred, with Lünem., to the fact announced in the preceding words—viz. that God καλεῖ ὑμᾶς εἰς, &c. Seeing that He is thus calling you, your thorough reception of His word is to us a cause of thanksgiving to Him. That διὰ τοῦτο is made thus 'to refer to a mere appended clause' (Ellic.) is no objection: see above on ver. 9. It is surely not possible with Jowett, to refer διὰ τοῦτο 'to the verses both before and after.' καὶ ἡμεῖς] We also, i. e. as well as πάντες οἱ πιστεύοντες ἐν τ. Μακεδ. κ. ἐν τ. Ἀχ., ch. i. 7. παραλαβόντες . . . . ἐδέξασθε] The former verb denotes only the hearing, as objective matter of fact: the latter, the receiving into their minds as subjective matter of belief: see reff. ἀκοῆς παρ' ἡμῶν is perhaps to be taken together—of hearing (genitive of apposition) from us—i. e. 'which you heard from us.' So Est., Pelt, Olsh., Lünem., all. Or παραλ. παρ' ἡμῶν may be taken together, as De W., strongly objecting to the construction ἀκοῆς παρ' ἡμῶν, and understanding by λόγος ἀκοῆς the preached word (Wort der Kunde). Lünem. answers,—that the construction ἀκοῆς παρ' ἡμῶν is unobjectionable, as ἀκούειν παρά τινος occurs John i. 41, al., and substantives and adjectives often retain in construction the force of the verbs from which they are derived (Kühner, ii. 217, cites from Plat. Alcib. ii. p. 141, οἶμαι δὲ οὐκ ἀνήκοον εἶναι ἐνιά γε χθιζά τε καὶ πρώιζα γεγενημένα):—that De W.'s rendering is objectionable, because thus no reason is given for separating παρ' ἡμῶν from παραλ., and because ἀκοῆς is superfluous and vapid if the same is already expressed by παραλαβ. παρ' ἡμῶν. On the other rendering which is adopted and defended also by Ellicott, there is a significant contrast, St. Paul distinguishing himself and his companions, as mere publishers, from God, the great Source of the Gospel.

τ. θεοῦ] of (i. e. 'belonging to,' 'coming from,' not 'speaking of,' as Grot., al., see below) God (i. e. which is God's. But we must not supply 'as,' with Jowett: no subjective view of theirs being implied in these words, but simply the objective fact of their reception of the word from Paul, Silvanus, and Timotheus). ἐδέξ.] See above on παραλ. Ye received it (being) not (no 'as' must be inserted: he is not speaking of the Thessalonians' estimate of the word, but [see above] of the fact of their receiving it as it really was) the word of men (having man for its author), but as it is in reality, the word of God, which (Bengel, al., take ὅς as referring to θεός: but the Apostle uses always the active ἐνεργεῖν of God, cf. 1 Cor. xii. 6: Gal. ii. 8; iii. 5: Eph. i. 11: Phil. ii. 13 al.,—and [reff.] the middle [not passive] of things) is also (besides being merely heard) active in you that believe.

14.] Proof of this ἐνεργεῖται,—that they had imitated in endurance the Judæan churches. ὑμεῖς γάρ resumes ὑμῖν above. μιμηταί] not in intention, but in fact. (On ἐγενήθητε, see on ch. i. 5.) Calvin suggests the following reason for his here introducing the conflict of the Judæan churches with the Jews: 'Poterat illis hoc venire in mentem: Si hæc vera est religio, cur eam tam infestis animis oppugnant Judæi, qui sunt sacer Dei populus? Ut hoc offendiculum tollat, primum admonet, hoc eos commune habere cum primis Ecclesiis, quæ in Judæa erant: postea Judæos dicit obstinatos esse Dei et omnis sacræ doctrinæ hostes.' But manifestly this is very far-fetched, and does not naturally lie in the context: as neither does Olsh.'s view, that he wishes to mark out the judaizing Christians, as persons likely to cause mischief in the Thessalonian church. The reason for introducing this character of the Jews here was because (Acts xvii. 5 ff.) they had been the stirrers up of the persecution against himself and Silas at Thessalonica, to which circumstance he refers below. By the mention of them as the adversaries of the Gospel in Judæa he is carried on to say that there, as well as at Thessalonica, they had ever been its chief enemies. And this is a remarkable coincidence with the history in the Acts, where we find him at this time, in Corinth, in more than usual conflict with the Jews (Acts xviii. 5, 6, 12). On ἐν χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ Œc. remarks, εὐφυῶς διεῖλεν· ἐπειδὴ γὰρ καὶ αἱ συναγωγαὶ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐν θεῷ εἶναι δοκοῦσι, τὰς τῶν πιστῶν ἐκκλησίας καὶ ἐν τῷ θεῷ καὶ ἐν τῷ υἱῷ αὐτοῦ λέγει

εἶναι. συμφυλέτης, ὁμοεθνής, Hesych. Herodian says, πολίτης, δημότης, φυλέτης, ἄνευ τῆς σύν, συνέφηβος δὲ καὶ συνθιασότης κ. συμπότης μετὰ τῆς σύν ὅτι καὶ πρόσκαιρος αὐτῶν ἡ κοινωνία, ἐπὶ δὲ τῶν προτέρων οὐχ ὁμοίως. And this criticism seems just: the Latins also using civis meus not concivis, of the enduring relation of fellow-citizen,—but commilito meus, not miles meus, of the temporary relation of fellow-soldier. See Scaliger, in Lobeck on Phrynichus, p. 471 (also p. 172). Ellicott would regard these words merely as supererogatory compounds belonging to later Greek. These συμφυλέται were not Jews wholly nor in part, but Gentiles only. For they are set in distinct contrast here to οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι. τὰ αὐτὰ . . . . καθώς] The proper apodosis to τὰ αὐτά would be ἅ, or ἅπερ. But such inaccuracies are found in the classics: Kühner (ii. 571) cites from Plat. Phæd. p. 86 A, εἴ τις διϊσχυρίζοιτο τῷ αὐτῷ λόγῳ ὅπερ σύ: so also Legg. p. 671 C; Xen. An. i. 10. 10. αὐτοί, not 'we ourselves,' as Erasm., al.: but the members of the Judæan churches mentioned above. The same construction occurs in Gal. i. 22, 23. 15, 16.] Characterization of the Jews as enemies of the Gospel and of mankind. Jowett's note is worth quoting: "Wherever the Apostle had gone on his second journey, he had been persecuted by the Jews: and the longer he travelled about among Gentile cities, the more he must have been sensible of the feeling with which his countrymen were regarded. Isolated as they were from the rest of the world in every city, a people within a people, it was impossible that they should not be united for their own self-defence, and regarded with suspicion by the rest of mankind. But their inner nature was not less repugnant to the nobler as well as the baser feelings of Greece and Rome. Their fierce nationality had outlived itself: though worshippers of the true God, they knew Him not to be the God of all the nations of the earth: hated and despised by others, they could but cherish in return an impotent contempt and hatred of other men. What wonder that, for an instant (? on all this see below), the Apostle should have felt that this Gentile feeling was not wholly groundless? or that he should use words which recall the expression of Tacitus: 'Adversus omnes alios hostile odium?' Hist. v. 5." 15. τῶν καί] The repeated καί serves for enumeration. τὸν κύρ. ἀποκτ. Ἰησ. is thus arranged to give prominence to τὸν κύρ., and thus enhance the enormity of the deed: it should be rendered who killed Jesus the Lord, τὸν κύρ. being in a position of emphasis. κ. τοὺς προφήτας] belongs to ἀποκτεινάντων (see Matt. xxiii. 31—37; Acts vii. 52), not to ἐκδιωξ. as De W. His objection, that all the prophets were not killed, is irrelevant: neither were they all persecuted. The ἰδίους of rec. appears to have been an early insertion: Tert. ascribes it to Marcion. ἐκδιωξ.] drove out by persecution, viz. from among you, Acts xvii. 5 ff.,—not for the simple verb διωξ. (De W.), nor does the preposition merely strengthen the verb (Lünem.),—but it retains its proper meaning (ὁ δῆμος αὐτῶν ἐξεδίωξε τοὺς δυνατούς, οἱ δὲ ἀπελθόντες . . . Thuc. i. 24), and the aorist refers it to a definite event, as in the case of ἀποκτεινάντων: when their habit is spoken of, the participles are present, e. g. ἀρεσκόντων and κωλυόντων below. ἡμᾶς refers to Paul and Silas. θεῷ μὴ ἀρεσκ.] The μή gives a subjective sense: not exactly that of Bengel, al., 'Deo placere non quærentium.' For in strictness, as Ellicott, the shade of subjectivity is only to be found in the aspect in which the subject and the participle is presented to the reader: and therefore can hardly be reproduced in English. Compare on the usage, Winer, edn. 6, § 55. 5, g. β, and Ellicott's note here. In πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις ἐναντίων, most Commentators, and recently Jowett (see above), have seen the odium humani generis ascribed to the Jews by Tacitus (Hist. v. 5), and by several other classic authors (Juv. Sat. xiv. 103 ff. Diod. Sic. xxxiv. p. 524, &c.). But it is hardly possible that St. Paul, himself a Jew, should have blamed an exclusiveness which arose from the strict monotheism and legal purity of the Jew: and besides this, the construction having been hitherto carried on by copulæ, but now dropping them, most naturally goes on from ἐναντίων to κωλυόντων, in that they prevent, and thus κωλ. specifies

But (this their opposition to God and men shall not avail them: for) the (predestined, or predicted, or merited) wrath (of God) came upon them (he looks back on the fact in the divine counsels as a thing in past time, q. d. 'was appointed to come:' not 'has come.' No sense of anticipation need be sought in ἔφθασεν in later Greek, except when it governs an accusative of the person, as ch. iv. 15; see reff.) to the utmost (to the end of it, i. e. the wrath: so that it shall exhaust all its force on them: not 'at last' Wahl, al.: nor to be taken with ἡ ὀργή, the wrath which shall endure to the end [ἡ εἰς τ. ?], as Thl., Œc., al.: nor to be referred to the Jews, 'so as to make an end of them,' De W.).

17—III. 13.] He relates to them how he desired to return after his separation from them: and when that was impracticable, how he sent Timotheus: at whose good intelligence of them he was cheered, thanks God for them, and prays for their continuance in love and confirmation in the faith.

17.] ἡμεῖς δέ resumes the subject broken off at ver. 13: the δέ introducing a contrast to the description of the Jews in vv. 15, 16. ἀπορφανισθέντες] ὀρφανός is properly used, as with us, of children who have lost their parents. But it is found in a wider sense, e. g. John xiv. 8,—Pind., Isthm. vii. 16, ὀρφανὸν μυρίων ἑτάρων,—Olymp. ix. 92, ὀρφανοὶ γενεᾶς (ὀρφ. τέκνων, Dion. Hal. Antt. i. p. 69, Kypke): Hesych.: ὀρφανός, ὁ γονέων ἐστερημένος καὶ τέκνων (compare the similitude, ver. 7). The word ἀπορφανίζω occurs Æsch. Choëph. 247, of the eagles' brood deprived of their parents. Here it is used in deep affection, the preposition giving the sense of local severance, which is further specified by ἀφ' ὑμῶν following. There is no occasion to press the metaphor, as Chrys., al.

πρὸς καιρὸν ὥρας] for the space of an hour, i. e. for a very short time: it is a combination of the expressions πρὸς καιρὸν and πρὸς ὥραν, see reff.. It refers, not to his present impression that the time of separation would still be short (as Flatt and De W.), for this the past participle ἀπορφανισθέντες forbids, but to the time alluded to in that past participle — when we had been separated from you for the space of an hour.

προσώπ. οὐ κ.] datives of the manner in which (i. e. as Ellic. 'marking, with the true limiting power of the case, the metaphorical place,' which in the interpretation of the metaphor would be manner or form, 'to which the sense is restricted') no separation in heart took place.

περισσοτ. ἐσπ] the more abundantly (because our separation was so short. Lünem. says well: "Universal experience testifies, that the pain of separation from friends and the desire of return to them are more vivid, the more freshly the remembrance of the parting works in the spirit, i. e. the less time has elapsed since the parting." Therefore the explanation of Œc. and Thl., after Chrys., is unpsychological: περισσοτέρως ἐσπουδάσαμεν, ἢ ὡς εἰκὸς ἦν τοὺς πρὸς ὥραν ἀπολειφθέντας. Luth., Bretschn., De W., and Ellic. understand it 'the more,' i. e. than if I had been separated from you in heart: but the above seems both simpler and more delicate in feeling) endeavoured (implies actual setting on foot of measures to effect it) in much desire (i. e. very earnestly) to see your face. 18.] Wherefore (as following up this earnest endeavour) we would have come (had a plan to come: "not ἐβουλόμεθα, which would indicate merely the disposition: see Philem. 13, 14" [Lün.]) to you, even I Paul (the introduction of these words here, where he is about to speak of himself alone, is a strong confirmation of the view upheld above [on ch. i. 9] that he has hitherto been speaking of himself and his companions. The μέν answers to a suppressed δέ, q. d. περὶ δὲ τῶν ἄλλων οὐ νῦν ὁ λόγος, or the like. Grot., al., think the suppressed δέ refers to the rest having intended it once only, but the Apostle more times, taking κ. ἅπ. κ. δίς with ἐγ. μ. Παῦ.), not once only but twice (literally, 'both once and twice:' not used widely [ἅπ. κ. δίς], but meaning that on two special occasions he had such a plan: see ref. The words refer to ἐσπουδάσ., not to ἐγὼ μ. Π.,—see above), and (not 'but:' the simple copula, as in Rom. i. 13, gives the matter of fact, without raising the contrast between the intention and the hindrance) Satan (i. e. the devil: not any human adversary or set of adversaries, as De W., al.; whether Satan acted by the Thessalonian Jews or not, is unknown to us, but by whomsoever acting, the agency was his) hindered us (reff.). 19.] accounts for this his earnest desire to see them, by the esteem in which he held them. The words ἔμπρ. τ. κυρ. ἡμ. Ἰησ. κ.τ.λ. must not be transposed in the rendering ("construi hæc sic debent, τίς γ. ἡμ. ἐλπ. . . . . ἔμπρ. τ. κυρ. . . . . ἢ οὐχὶ κ. ὑμ." Grot.): for the Apostle, after having asked and answered the question τίς γὰρ κ.τ.λ., breaks off, and specifies that wherein this hope and joy mainly consisted, viz. the glorious prospect of their being found in the Lord at His appearing. But he does not look forward to this as anticipating a reward for the conversion of the Thessalonians (Est., al.), or that their conversion will compensate for his having persecuted the Church before, but from generous desire to be found at that day with the fruits of his labour, and that they might be his boast and he theirs before the Lord: see 2 Cor. i. 14; Phil. ii. 16. On στέφ. καυχ., see reff. and Soph. Aj. 460. ἢ οὐχὶ καὶ ὑμεῖς] The ἤ, as Ellic., 'introduces a second and negative interrogation, explanatory and confirmatory of what is implied in the first:' see Winer, edn. 6, § 57. 1. b. καί, 'as well as others my converts.' ἐν τῇ αὐτ. παρ. further specifies the ἔμπρ. τοῦ κυρίου. 20.] γάρ sometimes serves to render a reason for a foregoing assertion, by asserting it even more strongly, q. d. 'it must be so, for the fact is certain.' So Soph. Philoct. 746, "δεινόν γε τοὐπίσαγμα τοῦ ποσήματος." "δεινὸν γάρ, οὐδὲ ῥητόν:" see Hartung, Partikell. i. p. 474. I should be inclined to ascribe to ver. 20, on this very account, a wider range than ver. 19 embraces: q. d. you will be our joy in the day of the Lord: for ye are (at all times, ye are, abstractedly) our glory and joy. This seems to me far better than, were a further specification of ὑπὲρ τῆς πίστεως ὑμῶν, it would not be accusative but genitive. 4) It only remains that we should take τὸ μ. σ. as in apposition with the whole foregoing sentence, εἰς τὸ στ. ὑ. κ. παρ. ὑπ. τ. πίστ. ὑμ.—so that τὸ μηδ. σαίν. serves only to repeat the same thought, which was before positively expressed, in a negative but better defined form: τό being nearly = τουτέστι. So that the sense is: to confirm you and exhort you on behalf of your faith, that is, that no one may be shaken in these troubles: τὸ μηδ. being dependent, not on a second εἰς understood, as in (1), but on the first εἰς, which is expressed. With this view I entirely agree, only adding, that instead of making τό = τουτέστι, I would rather say that τουτέστι might have been inserted before τὸ μηδένα. αὐτοὶ γὰρ . . .] Reason why no one should be shaken. Griesb., al., parenthesize αὐτοὶ—οἴδατε ver. 4: but wrongly, for διὰ τοῦτο ver. 5, connects with this sentence immediately. οἴδατε; probably not for Theodoret's reason: ἄνωθεν ἡμῖν ταῦτα προηγόρευσεν ὁ δεσπότης χριστός,—but for that given in ver. 4. εἰς τοῦτο, viz. to θλίβεσθαι, contained in θλίψεις above: the subject to κείμεθα being 'we Christians.' 4.] reason for οἴδατε. πρὸς ὑμ., see reff.

μέλλομεν may be taken either as the recit. present, or better as representing the counsel of God, as in ὁ ἐρχόμενος and the like. The subject to μέλλ., as above, being 'we Christians.' οἴδατε, viz. by experience. 5.] διὰ τοῦτο, because tribulation had verily begun among you (καθὼς καὶ ἐγένετο). κἀγώ seems to convey a delicate hint that Timotheus also was anxious respecting them: or it may have the same reference as καὶ ἡμεῖς, ch. ii. 13, —viz. to the other Christians who had heard of their tribulation. De W. would render, not, 'therefore I also &c.'—but 'therefore also, I &c.' But this would require (as Lün.) διὰ καὶ τοῦτο—or καὶ διὰ τ. εἰς τὸ γν.] that I (not 'he') might know (be informed about): belongs to the subject of the verb ἔπεμψα. μή πως κ.τ.λ.] lest perchance the tempter (ref.) have tempted (not, as Whitby, al., 'seduced') you (indicative betokening the fact absolute), and our labour might be (subjunctive, betokening the fact conditional) to no purpose (reff.). Fritz. and De W. rather harshly take μή πως in two different meanings,—with the first clause as 'an forte,' and with the second as 'ne forte.'

6—8.] Of the good news brought by Timotheus. 6.] ἄρτι δέ is by Lünem. (and De W. hesitatingly) separated by a comma from ἐλθόντος, and joined to παρεκλήθημεν ver. 7. But the direct connexion of ἄρτι with an aorist verb is harsher than with an aorist participle, and παρεκλ. has already its διὰ τοῦτο, which refers back to the whole preceding clause as contained in the τοῦτο. I would therefore join ἄρτι with ἐλθόντος. But Timotheus having just now come &c. εὐαγγ.] having brought good news of: see reff. οὐκ εἶπεν ἀπαγγείλαντος, ἀλλὰ εὐαγγελισαμένου· τοσοῦτον ἀγαθὸν ἡγεῖτο τὴν ἐκείνων βεβαίωσιν κ. τὴν ἀγάπην. πάντοτε belongs more naturally to the foregoing: see 1 Cor. i. 4; xv. 58; Gal. iv. 18; Eph. v. 20. "ἐπιποθεῖν τι (huc etiam redire structuram ἐπιποθεῖν sq. infinitivo nemo nescit) idem valet quod πόθον ἔχειν ἐπί τι, desiderium ferre in aliquid versum, cf. LXX. Ps. xlii. (xli.) 1, ὃν τρόπον ἐπιποθεῖ ἡ ἔλαφος ἐπὶ τὰς πηγὰς τῶν ὑδάτων." Fritz. in Rom. i. 11. So that direction, not intensity (which as Fritz. also remarks, after the analogy of περιπόθητος, should be expressed by περι-, not ἐπιποθεῖν) is the force of the preposition. ἡμᾶς ὑμᾶς] scil. ἰδεῖν ἐπιποθοῦμεν. 7.] διὰ τοῦτο, viz. on account of what has just been mentioned, from ὅτι . . . .;—τοῦτο combining the whole of the good news in one. ἐφ' ὑμῖν, with reference to you: as we say, over you. You were the object of our consolation: the faith which you shewed was the means whereby that object was applied to our minds. ἐπὶ πάσ. τῇ ἀνάγ. κ. θλ. ἡμ.] in (reff., i. e. We may well imagine such external trouble, from Acts xviii. 5—10: 8.] for now (not so much an adverb of time, here, as implying the fulfilment of the condition [ἐάν] which follows: so Eur. Iph. in Aul. 644: "συνετὰ λέγουσα μᾶλλον εἰς οἰκτόν μ' ἄγεις." "ἀσύνετα νῦν ἐροῦμεν, εἰ σέ γ' εὐφρανῶ." See more examples in Hartung, Partikell. ii. p. 25; Kühner, ii. p. 185) we live (the ἀνάγκη and θλῖψις being conceived as a death: but not to be referred to everlasting life, as Chrys. [ζωὴν λέγων τὴν μέλλουσαν], nor weakened to 'vivit qui felix est' [Pelt], but with direct reference to the infringement of the powers of life by ἀνάγκ. and θλ., as Lünem., "we are in full strength and freshness of life, we do not feel the sorrows and tribulations with which the outer world surrounds us") if ye stand fast in the Lord. The conditional form of this last sentence, with ἐάν, not ἐπεί, carries it forward as an exhortation for the future also; while the solœcistic indicative gives the Apostle's confident expectation that such would be the case. The reading must not be dismissed, as Ellic., by taking refuge in Scrivener's assertion that permutations of similar vowels are occasionally found even in the best MSS. I have examined the Vatican Codex through the greater part of the N. T., and can safely say that these permutations are found only in such cases as H, I, and EI, and O and Ω in doubtful inflexions, as ἐωρακ. and ἑορακ.; not in cases like the present, nor in any ordinary occurrences of long and short vowels. See remarks on Rom. v. 1; and prolegg. to Vol. I. ch. vi. § i. 36, 37. There were (ver. 10) ὑστερήματα in their faith, requiring κατάρτισις. 9.] And this vigour of life shews itself in the earnest desire of abundant thanksgiving: so the γάρ accounts for, and specifies the action of, the ζωή just mentioned.

Mark vi. 51. δεόμενοι belongs to the question of ver. 9—q. d., 'what thanks can we render, &c., proportioned to the earnestness of our prayers, &c.?' So that δεόμενοι would best be rendered praying as we do. εἰς τό—direction, or aim, of the prayers. καταρτίσαι τὰ ὑστ.] τὰ ἐλλείποντα πληρῶσαι, Thdrt.: cf. 2 Cor. ix. 12. These ὑστερήματα were consequences of their being as yet novices in the faith: partly theoretical, e. g. their want of stability respecting the παρουσία, and of fixed ideas respecting those who had fallen asleep in Christ,—partly practical, ch. iv. 1. One can hardly conceive a greater perverseness than that of Baur, who takes this passage for a proof that the Thessalonian church had been long in the faith. 11—13.] Good wishes, with respect to this his earnest desire, and to their continued progress in love and holiness. 11. αὐτός] Not as De W. in contrast with the δεόμενοι just spoken of,—but as Chrys., αὐτὸς δὲ ὁ θεὸς ἐκκόψαι τοὺς πειρασμοὺς τοὺς πανταχοῦ περιέλκοντας ἡμᾶς, ὥστε ὁρθὴν ἐλθεῖν πρὸς ὑμᾶς,—i. e. it exalts the absolute power of God and the Lord Jesus,—if He expedites the way, it will be accomplished. αὐτός then is in contrast with ourselves, who have once and again tried to come to you, but have been hindered by Satan. Lünem. remarks that ὁ θεός is best taken absolute, and ἡμῶν referred to πατήρ only. More majesty is thus given to the αὐτὸς ὁ θεός, although αὐτός refers to the whole. Cf. 2 Thess. ii. 16, 17. κατευθύναι] not infinitive, but third person singular optative aorist. It certainly cannot be passed without remark, that the two nominatives should thus be followed, here and in 2 Thess. ii. 16, 17, by a singular verb. It would be hardly possible that this should be so, unless some reason existed in the subjects of the verb. Mere unity of will between the Father and the Son (Lünem.) would not be enough, unless absolute unity were also in the writer's mind. Athanasius therefore seems to be right in drawing from this construction an argument for the unity of the Father and the Son. πρὸς ὑμᾶς more naturally belongs to κατευθύναι than to τὴν ὁδὸν ἡμῶν, in which case it should be τὴν ὁδ. ἡμ. τὴν πρὸς ὑμ. 12.] ὑμᾶς δέ—emphatic—'sive nos veniemus sive minus,' Bengel. ὁ κύριος may refer either to the Father, or to Christ. It is no objection to the former, that τ. θεοῦ κ. πατρ. ἡμ. is repeated below, any more than it is to the latter that τ. κυρ. ἡμ. Ἰ. is so repeated. I should rather understand [still, notwithstanding Ellic.'s note] it of the Father: see 2 Cor. ix. 8. πλεονάσαι] transitive, see reff.: enlarge you—not merely in numbers, as Thdrt., but in yourselves, in richness of gifts and largeness of faith and knowledge—fill up your ὑστερήματα, ver. 10. περισσεύσαι (reff.), make you to abound. εἰς πάντας] toward all men, not, as Thdrt., πάντας τοὺς ὁμοπίστους, but as Est., 'etiam infideles et vestræ salutis inimicos.' καθ. κ. ἡμεῖς, viz. περισσεύομεν τῇ ἀγάπῃ:—ἔχετε γὰρ μέτρον κ.

περισσεύητε. Evidently the Apostle would originally have written ἵνα, καθ. παρ. παρ' ἡμ. τὸ πῶς κ.τ.λ. . . . ., οὕτως καὶ περισσεύητε: but while writing, altered this his intended expression, that he might not say too little, wishing to notice the good beginning already made by the Thessalonians. The repetition of ἵνα after so long an intervening clause is too natural to have given rise [as De W. thinks] to the insertion) that ye abound yet more, viz.: ἐν τῷ οὕτως περισσεύειν: not, as Chrys., ἵνα ἐκ πλείονος περιουσίας, μὴ μέχρι τῶν ἐντολῶν ἵστασθε, ἀλλ' ἵνα καὶ ὑπερβαίνητε. 2.] takes up the καθὼς παρελάβετε of the former verse, and appeals to their memory in its confirmation. See similar appeals in Gal. iv. 13; 1 Cor. xv. 1. παραγγ.] commands, see reff. The stress is on τίνας, to which τοῦτο answers, ver. 3. διὰ τ. κ. Ἰησ.] by, i. e. coming from, παραγγελθείσαι διά. So τὰς διὰ τῶν ὀλίγων πολιτείας, Demosth. p. 489: δι' ἑαυτοῦ, of himself, Xen. Cyr. viii. 1. 43: see Bernhardy, p. 236. 3.] further specification (γάρ) of the παραγγελίαι: see above. τοῦτο is the subject, not the predicate (as De W.): see Rom. ix. 8: Gal. iii. 7: not superfluous, as Pelt, but emphatically prefixed (so Lünem.). θέλημα τ. θεοῦ serves to take up again the διὰ τ. κυρ. Ἰησοῦ.

The article may be omitted, because the predicate θέλημα τ. θ. is not distributed (?): but in this case, τὸ θέλ. would be equally applicable, there being no danger of τὸ θέλ. being mistaken for 'the whole will,' but rather specifying 'that which forms part of the will.' This explanation is not to be abandoned, as Ellic., on account of the merely occasional omission of the article after a noun substantive, mentioned by Middleton and Ellic.: for the reason of that omission is to be sought rather in logic than in idiom. Rather perhaps should we say that there is in Greek a tendency to omit articles before predicates, even where such an omission cannot be logically pressed. ὁ ἁγ. ὑμ. is in apposition with θέλ. τ. θ. as a 'locus communis,' the will of God respecting us being known to be, our sanctification, and then this sanctification being afterwards specified as consisting in ἀπέχεσθαι, &c. Therefore ἁγιασμός must be taken in the most general sense, and that which is afterwards introduced, ἀπέχεσθαι, &c., as a part of our ἁγιασμός. ὑμῶν is the objective genitive, of you.

ἀπέχεσθαι and εἰδέναι are not the negative and positive sides of ὁ ἁγ. ὑμ. as Lünem. and Ellic.,—for the negative comes in again in verses 5, 6,—but the latter (εἰδέναι to διεμαρτυράμεθα, ver. 6) further specifies and ensures the former.

4.] εἰδέναι, know how (reff.). On the meaning of τὸ σκεῦος, there has been much difference. Very many Commentators understand it of 'the body.' (So, among others, Chrys. [see below], Thdrt., Œc., Thl., Tert., Pelag., Calv., Corn.-a-Lap., Beza, Grot., Calov., Ham., Beng., Macknight, Pelt, Olsh., Baumg.-Crus.) But it is fatal to this interpretation, (1) that it must force an untenable meaning on κτᾶσθαι, which can only mean 'to acquire,' not 'to possess.' Chrys., whose sense of Greek usage led him to feel this, tries to fit the meaning 'to acquire' into the sense: ἡμεῖς αὐτὸ κτώμεθα, ὅταν μέχρι καθαρὸν κ. ἔστιν ἐν ἁγιασμῷ· ὅταν δὲ ἀκάθαρτον, ἁμαρτία—(so Olsh. also); but this is lame enough, and would not, as De W. remarks, answer for the other member of the sentence, μὴ ἐν πάθει ἐπιθυμίας. (2) that the mere use of σκεῦος, without any explanation, could hardly point at the body. In all the passages ordinarily quoted to support it, the metaphor is further explained by the context:—e. g., Barnab., ep. 7, 11, pp. 744, 760, τὸ σκεῦος τοῦ πνεύματος αὐτοῦ,—Philo, quod det. pot. insid. § 46, vol. i. p. 223, τῆς ψυχῆς ἀγγεῖον τὸ σῶμα,—de migr. Abr. § 36, vol. i. p. 467, τοῖς ἀγγείοις τῆς ψυχῆς σώματι κ. αἰσθήσει,—Cic. disp. Tusc. i. 22: 'corpus quidem quasi vas est aut aliquod animi receptaculum,'—Lucret. iii. 441: 'corpus, quod vas quasi constitit ejus (sc. animæ).' 2 Cor. iv. 7 is evidently no case in point, ὀστρακίνοις being there added, and the body being simply compared to an earthen vessel. (3) that the order of the words is against it. In τὸ ἑαυτοῦ σκεῦος, the emphasis must lie on ἑαυτοῦ—cf. 1 Cor. vii. 2, ἕκαστος τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα ἐχέτω. Had the body been meant, this would be without import, and it would more naturally have been τὸ σκεῦος ἑαυτοῦ (or αὐτοῦ). (4) But a more fatal objection than any of the former is, that the context is entirely against the meaning. The ἁγιασμός has been explained to consist in ἀπέχεσθαι ἀπὸ τῆς πορνείας. And now this πορνεία comes to be specified, wherein it consists, and how it may be guarded against: viz. in carrying on the divinely-appointed commerce of the sexes in holiness and honour. In fact, the thought is exactly as in 1 Cor. vii. 2, διὰ τὰς πορνείας ἕκαστος τὴν ἑαυτοῦ γυναῖκα ἐχέτω, κ. ἑκάστη τὸν ἴδιον ἄνδρα ἐχέτω. Many have therefore understood σκεῦος in its literal meaning as applied to τὸ πρᾶγμα, —i. e. the woman (or indeed the man, on the other side, inasmuch as the woman has ἐξουσία over his body, see 1 Cor. vii. 4. So that thus it would be an exhortation to the woman also: so De Wette). Thus the context would be satisfied, and the emphatic position of ἑαυτοῦ (as in 1 Cor. vii. 2);—and κτᾶσθαι would retain its proper meaning: that each of you should know how to acquire his own vessel (for this purpose) in sanctification (κτᾶσθαι ἐν ἁγ. belong together) and honour. This sense of σκεῦος is found in the Jewish books (Megill. Esth. i. 11: "In convivio dixerunt aliqui: mulieres Medicæ sunt pulcriores: alii, Persicæ sunt pulcriores. Dixit Ahasuerus: Vas meum, quo ego utor, nec Persicum est nec Medicum, sed Chaldaicum"). And the expression κτᾶσθαι γυναῖκα is common: cf. Xen. Symp. ii. 10: ταύτην (ἣν θεὸς ἔπεμψε) κέκτημαι: Ruth iv. 10; Sir. xxxvi. 24. And so Thdr. Mops. (σκεῦος τὴν ἰδίαν ἑκάστου γαμετὴν ὀνομάζει), some in Thdrt. (τινὲς τὸ ἑαυτοῦ σκεῦος τὴν ὁμόζυγα ἡρμήνευσαν), Aug. (contr. Jul. iv. 10, [56,] vol. x. p. 765,—'ut sciret unusquisque possidere vas suum, hoc est, uxorem:' cf. also ib. v. 9 [35], p. 805: de nupt. et conc. i. 8 [9], p. 418,—'non solum igitur conjugatus fidelis vase non utatur alieno, quod faciunt a quibus uxores alienæ appetuntur: sed nec ipsum proprium in concupiscentiæ carnalis morbo possidendum sciat.' But he mistakes κτᾶσθαι for possidere, and so understands the command as given conjugatis fidelibus), Thom. Aquin., Zwingle, Est., Heins., Wetst., Schöttg., Michaelis, Koppe, Schott, De Wette, Lünem., al. (Much of the foregoing note is from De W. and Lün.) The objection to the above view, that thus only men would be addressed (Calv., al.) is easily answered (besides as above, under 4) by observing that in other places also, where πορνεία is in question, the male only is exhorted, e. g. 1 Cor. vi. 15—18: the female being included by implication, and bound to interpret on her side that which is said of the other. 5.] ἐν πάθει ἐπιθ.,—πάθει having the emphasis,—'in the mere passio of lust,'—as Thdr. Mops. (Lün.), ὡς ἂν τοῦτο ποιοῦντος οὐκέτι ταύτῃ ὡς γυναικὶ συνόντος ἀλλὰ διὰ μίξιν μόνην ἁπλῶς, ὅπερ πάθος ἐπιθυμίας ἐκάλεσεν. καθ. καί] καί so usual after particles of comparison, points to the association in the same category which the particle supposes: καὶ ἡμῖν ταὐτὰ δοκεῖ ἅπερ καὶ βασιλεῖ, Xen. Anab. ii. 1. 22. See examples in Hartung, Partikell. ii. 127: and cf. ch. ii. 13; iii. 6, 12, &c. τὰ μὴ εἰδ. τ. θ.] μή, because the Gentiles are spoken of by the writer from this point of view. It is not a mere fact which is stated, but that fact as logically interwoven with the course of the context: and hence the subjective negative. See reff. 6.] I cannot help regarding it as most unnatural, to interpret this verse of a new subject introduced, viz. the not wronging one another in the business of life. How such Commentators as De Wette and Lünem. can have entertained this view, I am at a loss to imagine. For (1) the sense is carried on from vv. 4, 5, without even the repetition of ἕκαστον ὑμῶν to mark the change of topic: and (2) when the Apostle sums up the whole in ver. 7, he mentions merely impurity, without the slightest allusion to the other. To say that more than one kind of sin must be mentioned because of περὶ πάντων τούτων, is mere trifling: the πάντα ταῦτα (not ταῦτα πάντα, which would collect many individuals into a whole) generalizes from the sin mentioned to a wider range. The interpretation which I impugn, is also that of Zwingle, Calv., Grot., Calov., Le Clerc, Wolf, Koppe, Flatt. I understand the verse, with Chrys., Thdrt., Œc., Thl., Jer., Erasm., Est., Corn.-a-Lap., Heins., Whitby, Wetst., Kypke, Beng., Michaelis, Pelt, Olsh., all., to refer to the sins of uncleanness, and continue vv. 4, 5:—that he should not (viz. τινά, contained in the αὐτοῦ following: so that τὸ μὴ . . . is a further specification of ὁ ἁγιασμός, rather than parallel with εἰδέναι) set at nought (the order of the sentence requires that ὑπερβ. should not stand absolutely, as De W., Lün., al., for 'transgress' [μὴ νῦν ὑπέρβαιν', ἀλλ' ἐναισίμως φέρε, Eur. Alc. 1077: ὅτε κέν τις ὑπερβήῃ κ. ἁμάρτῃ, Il. ι. 497], but transitively: otherwise τινα would have occurred after ὑπερβαίνειν to mark the distinction of construction: and ὑπερβ. with an accusative of person signifies either 'to pass by' or 'take no notice,' 'posthabere,' as Herod. iii. 89, ὑπερβαίνων τοὺς προσεχέας: or 'to go beyond' or 'surpass,' as Plat. Tim. 24 D, πάσῃ πάντας ἀνθρώπους ὑπερβεβηκότες ἀρετῇ. Of these, the former seems most applicable here: see below) or overreach his brother in the matter (viz. of τὸ ἑαυτοῦ σκεῦος κτᾶσθαι—that there should be among you none of those strifes on account of the πάθη ἐπιθυμίας, the 'teterrima belli causa' in the heathen world. As Jowett rightly observes, "It is not necessary to suppose that any idea of unchastity is conveyed by the term πλεονεκτεῖν, any more than in the tenth commandment, 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife.' The meaning exclusively arises from the connexion and application of the word." How τῷ πράγματι can ever signify τοῖς πράγμασιν, 'business affairs' [De W., alt.], I cannot imagine; and it is equally futile [with E. V. arm.] to take τῷ for τῳ = τινι in the N. T. "It is probable that the obscurity of the passage arises partly from the decency in which the Apostle clothes it." Jowett), because God is the avenger ('righter,' in such cases of setting at nought and overreaching) of all these things (viz. cases of ὑπερβασία and πλεονεξία, and by inference, lustful sins like them) as also (see on ver. 5) we before told you and constantly testified. 7.] This verse (see above) is in my view decisive for the above rendering of ver. 6. There is no mention here of avarice: nor is it possible to understand ἀκαθαρσία, when ver. 3 has gone before, of any thing but carnal impurity. Chap. ii. 3, which is adduced to shew that it may here represent covetousness, is a very doubtful example: see there. ἐπί, for the purpose of,—on condition of:—ἐν, in, 'in the element of,' not = εἰς, the aim: but ἁγιασμός is the whole sphere of our Christian life. 3.] Hence, the sin of (rejecting) setting at nought such limitations and rules is a fearful one—no less than that of setting at nought God the giver of the Holy Spirit. In ἄνθρωπον ἀθετεῖ there is an obvious allusion to ὑπερβαίνειν κ. πλεονεκτεῖν τ. ἀδελφόν above. There is no need to supply any thing after ἀθετῶν—ὁ ἀθετῶν simply describes him who commits the act of rejecting; q. d. the rejecter—what he rejects, is not to be supplied in the construction, but is clear from the context—viz. τὸν ἀδελφὸν αὐτοῦ. The distinction between ἄνθρωπον (anarthrous) and τὸν θεόν, seems to be, that the former is indefinite; not (any) man, but (definite) God. τὸν [καὶ] δόντα] q. d. who also is the AUTHOR of our sanctification. [καί—'novum hic additur momentum,' Bengel. It introduces a climax, whereby the sin is intensified.] δόντα, as being one great definite act of God by His Son. τὸ πν. αὐτοῦ τὸ ἅγ.] This form of expression (q. d. 'His own [αὐτοῦ emphatic] Spirit, the Holy One') is probably chosen, and not τὸ ἅγ. πν. αὐτοῦ, for precision, to bring out τὸ ἅγιον as connected with ἁγιασμός preceding. εἰς ὑμᾶς is not = ὑμῖν, but gives the idea of direction: see Gal. iv. 6; ch. ii. 9. 9—12.] Exhortations to brotherly love (9, 10 a), and to honest diligent lives (10 b—12). 9.] δέ is transitional, the implied contrast being to the sin last spoken of. φιλαδελφία (reff.) here refers more immediately (cf. ποιεῖτε αὐτό below) to deeds of kindness by way of relief to poor brethren. οὐ χρείαν ἔχετε] This is a not unusual touch of delicate rhetoric with St. Paul (cf. 2 Cor. ix. 1: Philem. 19: ch. v. 1). It conveys tacit but gentle reproof. The knowledge and the practice already exist: but the latter is not quite in proportion to the former. τῷ εἰπεῖν, οὐ χρεία ἐστί, μεῖζον ἐποίησεν ἢ εἰ εἶπεν. Chrys. The construction οὐ χρείαν ἔχετε γράφειν ὑμῖν (defended by De Wette and Winer), has been pronounced inadmissible by Lünemann, such use of the infinitive active being only found where no special personal reference is attached to the verb, as ὑμῖν here: so that this would require ἐμὲ γρ. or γράφεσθαι. He therefore reads ἔχομεν. But with so many corrections (see var. readd.), and with the known irregularities of St. Paul's style in such constructions, it surely is not safe to speak so positively. I should regard the construction, not as analogous with χῶρον οὐχ ἁγνὸν πατεῖν, Soph. Œd. Col. 37; ἄξιος θαυμάσαι, Thuc. i. 38, and the like,—but as a mixed one between ἔχομεν γράφειν and ἔχετε γράφεσθαι. αὐτοὶ ὑμεῖς, in opposition to ἡμᾶς, the subject to be supplied from γράφειν: but αὐτοί is not sponte, which would not agree with θεοδίδακτοι. The stress of the sentence is on αὐτοὶ ὑμεῖς, not on the θεο- in θεοδίδακτοι, as Olsh.,—"where God teaches, there, the Apostle says, he may be silent:" but as Lün. observes, the θεο- comes in over and above as it were; διδακτοί would convey the fact: θεοδίδακτοι = διδακτοί, κ. ταῦτα παρὰ θεοῦ. And this teaching is practical—its tendency and object being εἰς τὸ ἀγ. ἀλλ.,—to produce mutual love. 10.] follows up the θεοδίδακτοί ἐστε by a matter of fact, shewing: the teaching to have been in some measure effectual. καὶ γάρ] the καί belongs to ποιεῖτε—'besides being taught it, ye do it,'—ποιεῖτε carrying the emphasis of the sentence. αὐτό, scil. τὸ ἀγαπᾶν ἀλ. περισσεύειν, viz. in this ἀγάπη. αὐτῷ naturally and forcibly referring back to Ἰησοῦς and διὰ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, in the preceding clauses. In other words, the logical construction of the sentence seems to me so plainly to require the connexion of διὰ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ with κοιμηθέντας, that it must be a grammatical impossibility only, which can break that connexion. But let us see whether there be such an impossibility present. οἱ κοιμηθέντες are confessedly the Christian dead, and none else. They are distinguished by the Apostle's use of and adhesion to the word, from the merely θανόντες. What makes this distinction? Why are they asleep, and not dead? By whom have they been thus privileged? Certainly, διὰ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ. We are said πιστεύειν δι' αὐτοῦ (Acts iii. 16),—εὐχαριστεῖν δι' αὐτοῦ (Rom. i. 8), εἰρήνην ἔχειν δι' αὐτοῦ (ib. v. 1), καυχᾶσθαι δι' αὐτοῦ (ib. 11), παρακαλεῖσθαι δι' αὐτοῦ (2 Cor. i. 5), &c. &c.: why not also κοιμᾶσθαι δι' αὐτοῦ? And when Lünem. objects, that the extent of the idea οἱ κοιμηθέντες is understood from the former part of the sentence, εἰ πιστεύομεν κ.τ.λ.,—this very reason seems to me the most natural one for the specification—If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, then even thus also those, of whom we say that they sleep, just because of Jesus, will God, &c.: the emphasis being on the διά. Jowett keeps this connexion, merely saying however, "nor will the order of the words allow us to connect them with ἄξει;" a reason surely insufficient for it. He is certainly in error when he continues, "The only remaining mode is to take διά for ἐν (?), 'those that are asleep in Christ.'" ἄξει σὺν αὐτῷ] will bring (back to us) with Him (Jesus): i. e. when Jesus shall appear, they also shall appear with Him, being (as below) raised at His coming. Of their disembodied souls there is here no mention: nor is the meaning, as often understood, that God will bring them (their disembodied souls, to be joined to their raised bodies) with Him: but the bringing them with Jesus = their being raised when Jesus appears. 15.] Confirmation of last verse by direct revelation from the Lord. τοῦτο—this which follows: taken up by ὅτι. ἐν λόγῳ κυρ., in (virtue of: an assertion made within the sphere and element of that certainty, which the word of the Lord gives) the word of the Lord,—i. e. by direct revelation from Him made to me. τουτέστιν, οὐκ ἀφ' ἑαυτῶν, ἀλλὰ παρὰ τοῦ χριστοῦ μαθόντες λέγομεν, Chr.: ἐκ θείας ἡμῖν ἀποκαλύψεως ἡ διδασκαλία γεγένηται, Thdrt. ἡμεῖς οἱ ζῶντες] Then beyond question, he himself expected to be alive, together with the majority of those to whom he was writing, at the Lord's coming. For we cannot for a moment accept the evasion of Theodoret (cf. also Chrys. and the majority of ancient Commentators, down to Bengel, and even some of the best of the moderns, warped by their subjectivities: cf. Ellicott here), —οὐκ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ προσώπου τέθεικεν, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τῶν κατ' ἐκεῖνον τὸν καιρὸν περιόντων ἀνθρώπων:—nor the ungrammatical rendering of Turretin and Pelt—'we, if we live and remain' (ἡμεῖς ζῶντες, περιλειπόμενοι):—nor the idea of Œc., al., that οἱ ζῶντες are the souls, οἱ κοιμηθέντες the bodies:—but must take the words in their only plain grammatical meaning, that οἱ ζῶντες οἱ περιλ. are a class distinguished from οἱ κοιμηθέντες, by being yet in the flesh when Christ comes, in which class, by prefixing ἡμεῖς, he includes his readers and himself. That this was his expectation, we know from other passages, especially from 2 Cor. v. 1—10, where see notes. It does not seem to have been so strong towards the end of his course; see e. g. Phil. i. 20—26. Nor need it surprise any Christian, that the Apostles should in this matter of detail have found their personal expectations liable to disappointment, respecting a day of which it is so solemnly said, that no man knoweth its appointed time, not the angels in heaven, nor the Son (Mark xiii. 32), but the Father only. At the same time it must be borne in mind, that this inclusion of himself and his hearers among the ζῶντες and περιλειπόμενοι, does not in any way enter into the fact revealed and here announced, which is respecting that class of persons only as they

Cyneg. vi. 20. Here it seems to include in it the two which follow and explain it), viz. with the voice of an archangel (Christ shall be surrounded with His angels, Matt. xxv. 31 al. To enquire, which archangel, is futile: to understand the word of Christ Himself [Ambrst., Olsh.], or the Holy Spirit [al.], impossible), and with the trumpet of God (θεοῦ as in reff., the trumpet especially belonging to and used in the heavenly state of God; not commanded by God [Pelt, Olsh., al.],—nor does θεοῦ import size or loudness [Bengel, al.], although these qualities of course are understood. On the trumpet as summoning assemblies, cf. Christ is on His way to this earth: and when De W. says that there is no plain trace in St. Paul of Christ's kingdom on earth,—and Lün., that the words shew that the Apostle did not think of Christ as descending down to the earth, surely they cannot suppose him to have been so ignorant of O. T. prophecy, as to have allowed this, its plain testimony, to escape him. εἰς ἀπάντησιν occurs [reff.] twice more in the N. The rest of the great events of that time—His advent on this earth, His judgment of it, assisted by His saints (1 Cor. vi. 2, 3),—His reign upon earth,—His final glorification with His redeemed in heaven,—are not treated here, but not therefore to be conceived of as alien from the Apostle's teaching. 18.] ὥστε, so then: reff. παρακ., comfort: cf. ἵνα μὴ λυπῆσθε, ver. 13. λόγοις, not things, here or any where: but words: these words, which I have by inspiration delivered to you. It will be manifest to the plain, as well as to the scholar-like reader, that attempts like that of Mr. Jowett, to interpret such a passage as this by the rules of mere figurative language, are entirely beside the purpose. The Apostle's declarations here are made in the practical tone of strict matter of fact, and are given as literal details, to console men's minds under an existing difficulty. Never was a place where the analogy of symbolical apocalyptic language was less applicable. Either these details must be received by us as matter of practical expectation, or we must set aside the Apostle as one divinely empowered to teach the Church. It is a fair opportunity for an experimentum crucis: and such test cannot be evaded by Mr. Jowett's intermediate expedient of figurative language.

1.] On χρόν. and καιρ., see Acts i. 7, note. They had no need, for the reason stated below: that St. Paul had already by word of mouth taught them as much as could be known. 2.] [ἡ] ἡμέρα κυρίου is not the destruction of Jerusalem, as Hammond, Schöttg., al.,—nor the day of each man's death, as Chrys., Œc., Thl., Lyr., al.,—but the day of the Lord's coming, the παρουσία, which has been spoken of, in some of its details, above. So Thdrt.—ἡ δεσποτικὴ παρουσία. This is plain, by comparing 2 Thess. ii. 2: 1 Cor. i. 8; v. 5: 2 Cor. i. 14: Phil. i. 6, 10;

ii. 16. It is both the suddenness, and the terribleness (surely we cannot with Ellic. omit this element, in the presence of the image in the next verse) of the Day's coming, which is here dwelt on: cf. next verse. οὕτως fills up the comparison —as a thief in the night (comes), so . . it comes (not for future, but expressing, as so often by the present, the absolute truth and certainty of that predicated—it is its attribute, to come). 3.] Following out of the comparison ὡς κλ. ἐν νυκτί, into detail. λέγωσιν, viz. men in general —the children of the world, as opposed to the people of God: cf. ὄλεθρος below. The vivid description dispenses with any copula. εἰρ. κ. ἀσφ., scil. ἐστιν, see ref. Ezek. αἰφνίδ. has the emphasis, becoming a kind of predicate. ἐφίστανται, generally used of any sudden unexpected appearance: see reff., and Acts iv. 1. It is pressing too close the comparison ὅπερ ἡ ὠδὶν κ.τ.λ., when De W. says that it "assumes the day to be near,—for that such a woman, though she does not know the day and the hour, yet has a definite knowledge of the period:" for it is not the woman, nor her condition, that is the subject of comparison, but the unexpected pang of labour which comes on her. 4, 5.] But the Thessalonians, and Christians in general, are not to be thus overtaken by it. 4.] ἐν σκότει refers back to ἐν νυκτί above—in the ignorance and moral slumber of the world which knows not God. τῷ παραβολικῷ ἐπέμεινε σχήματι, κ. σκότος μὲν καλεῖ τὴν ἄγνοιαν, ἡμέραν δὲ τὴν γνῶσιν, Thdrt. τὸν σκοτεινὸν κ. ἀκάθαρτον βίον φησί, Chrys. Both combined give the right meaning. ἵνα] not 'so that,' here or any where else: but that,—in order that: it gives the purpose in the divine arrangement: for with God all results are purposed. ἡ ἡμέρα] not, 'that day,' but the DAY—the meaning of ἡμέρα as distinguished from σκότος being brought out, and ἡ ἡμέρα being put in the place of emphasis accordingly. This not having been seen, its situation was altered, to throw the first stress on ὑμᾶς, which properly has the second. That this is so, is plain from what follows, ver. 5. 5.] You (a) and all we Christians (b) have no reason to fear, and no excuse for being surprised by, the DAY of the Lord; for we are sons of light and the day (Hebraisms, see reff.: signifying that we belong to, having our origin from, the light and the day), and are not of (do not supply 'sons' —the genitives are in regular construction after ἐσμεν, signifying possession— we belong not to) night nor darkness. See, on the day of the Lord as connected

6—8.] Exhortation to behave as such: i. e. to watch and be sober—ἐπίτασις ἐγρηγόρσεως τὸ νήφειν· ἵνι γὰρ καὶ ἐγρηγορέναι καὶ μηδὲν διαφέρειν καθεύδοντος, Œc. (after Chrys.) 6.] οἱ λοιποί—i.e. the careless world. 7.] Explanation of the assertion regarding οἱ λοιποί above from the common practice of men. There is no distinction, as Macknight pretends, between μεθυσκόμενοι and μεθύουσιν ('the former denoting the act of getting drunk, the latter the state of being so'), but they are synonymous, answering to καθεύδοντες and καθεύδουσιν. Nor are the expressions to be taken in a spiritual sense, as Chrys., al. (μέθην ἐνταῦθά φησιν, οὐ τὴν ἀπὸ τοῦ οἴνου μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τὴν ἀπὸ πάντων τῶν κακῶν: 'Spiritual sleep and intoxication belong to the state of darkness,' Baum.-Crus.): the repetition of the same verbs as subjects and predicates (Lün.) shews that νυκτός is merely a designation of time, and to be taken literally. 8.] Contrast (δέ) of our course, who are of the day. And this not only in being awake and sober, but in being armed—not only watchful, but as sentinels, on our guard, and guarded ourselves. Notice, that these arms are defensive only, as against a sudden attack—and belong therefore not so much to the Christian's conflict with evil, as (from the context) to his guard against being surprised by the day of the Lord as a thief in the night. The best defences against such a surprise are the three great Christian graces, Faith, Hope, Love,—which are accordingly here enumerated: see ch. i. 3, and 1 Cor. xiii. 13. In Eph. vi. 13—17, we have offensive as well as defensive weapons, and the symbolism is somewhat varied, the θώραξ being δικαιοσύνη, πίστις being the θυρεός; while the helmet remains the same. See on the figure, Isa. lix. 17; Wisd. v. 17 ff. We must not perhaps press minutely the meaning of each part of the armour, in the presence of such variation in the two passages. 9.] Epexegesis of ἐλπίδα σωτηρίας—'and we may with confidence put on such an hope as our helmet'—for God set us not ('appointed us not' [reff.]; keep the aorist meaning,—referring to the time when He made the appointment) to ('with a view to'—so as to issue in, become a prey to) wrath, but to acquisition (περιποιέω, 'to make to remain over and above,' hence 'to keep safe:' opp. to διαφθείρω, Herod. i. 110; vii. 52, &c. Thuc. iii. 102 [L. and S.]. Hence περιποίησις, 'a keeping safe:' Plat. Def. 415 c, σωτηρία, περιποίησις ἀβλαβής. If this last remarkable coincidence be taken as a key to our passage, σωτηρίας will be a genitive of apposition, 'a keeping safe, consisting in salvation.' But [reff.] it seems more according to the construction to understand περιπ. simply as acquisition, as it undoubtedly is in ref. 2 Thess. Jowett's note, "περιποιεῖν, to make any thing over: hence περιποίησις, possession," if I understand it rightly, alleges a meaning of the verb which has no existence. 'To make to remain over' is as different as possible from 'to make over [to another person]') of salvation through (διὰ . . . refers to περιπ. σωτ. not to ἔθετο) our Lord Jesus Christ,

10.] who died for us, that whether we wake or sleep (in what sense? surely not in an ethical sense, as above: for they who sleep will be overtaken by Him as a thief, and His day will be to them darkness, not light. If not in an ethical sense, it must be in that of living or dying, and the sense as Rom. xiv. 8. [For we cannot adopt the trifling sense given by Whitby, al.,—'whether He come in the night, and so find us taking our natural rest, or in the day when we are waking.'] Thus understood however, it will be at the sacrifice of perspicuity, seeing that γρηγορεῖν and καθεύδειν have been used ethically throughout the passage. If we wish to preserve the uniformity of metaphor, we may [though I am not satisfied with this] interpret in this sense: that our Lord died for us, that whether we watch [are of the number of the watchful, i. e. already Christians] or sleep [are of the number of the sleeping, i. e. unconverted] we should live, &c. Thus it would = 'who died that all men might be saved:' who came, not to call the righteous only, but sinners to life. There is to this interpretation the great objection that it confounds with the λοιποί, the ἡμᾶς who are definitely spoken of as set by God not to wrath but to περιποίησιν σωτηρίας. So that the sense live or die, must, I think, be accepted, and the want of perspicuity with it. The construction of a subjunctive with εἴτε . . . εἴτε is not classical: an optative is found in such cases, e. g. Xen. Anab. ii. 1. 14, καὶ εἴτε ἄλλο τι θέλοι χρῆσθαι εἴτ' ἐν' Αἴγυπτον στρατεύειν . . . . See Winer, edn. 6, § 41, p. 263, Engl. transl. 310, note.

ἅμα] all together: not to be taken with σύν, see reff. 11.] Conclusion from the whole—διό, 'quæ cum ita sint'—since all this is so: or perhaps in literal strictness, as Ellic., quamobrem: which however is exceedingly close to the above meaning. παρακαλεῖτε, more naturally comfort, as in ch. iv. 18, than 'exhort.' For as Lün. remarks, the exhortation begun ver. 6 has passed into consolation in vv. 9, 10. οἰκ. εἷς τὸν ἕνα] edify the one the other: see ref.: and cf. (Kypke) Theocr. Idyl. xxii. 65, εἷς ἐνὶ χεῖρας ἄειρον—Lucian, Asin. p. 169, ἐγὼ δὲ ἓν' ἐξ ἑνὸς ἐπιτρέχων—Arrian, Epict. i. 10, ἓν ἐξ ἑνὸς ἐπισσωρεύκειν. Whitby, Rückert, al., would read εἰς τὸν ἕνα, and render 'edify yourselves into one body' (Whitb. εἰς ἕν)—or 'so as to shew the One, Christ, as your foundation, on whom the building should be raised' (Rückert: but this should be ἐπὶ τῷ ἑνί). The only allowable meaning of εἰς τὸν ἕνα would be, 'into the One,' viz., Christ, as in Eph. iv. 13. But the use of τὸν ἕνα for Christ, without any further designation, would be harsh and unprecedented. 12—24.] Miscellaneous exhortations, ending with a solemn wish for their perfection in the day of Christ. 12, 13.] In reference to their duties to the rulers of the church among them. The connexion (δέ, a slight contrast with that which has just passed) is perhaps as Chrys., but somewhat too strongly—ἐπειδὴ εἶπεν οἰκοδομεῖτε εἷς τὸν ἕνα, ἵνα μὴ νομίσωσιν ὅτι εἰς τὸ τῶν διδασκάλων ἀξίωμα αὐτοὺς ἀνήγαγε, τοῦτο ἐπήγαγε, μονονουχὶ λέγων, ὅτι κ. ὑμῖν ἐπέτρεψα οἰκοδομεῖν ἀλλήλους· οὐ γὰρ δυνατὸν πάντα τὸν διδάσκαλον εἰπεῖν. Rather, as the duty of comforting and building up one another has just been mentioned, the transition to those whose especial work this is, is easy, and one part of forwarding the work is the recognition and encouragement of them by the church.

12.] εἰδέναι in this sense is perhaps a Hebraism: the LXX (in ref. Prov.) express יָדַע by ἐπιγινώσκειν. The persons indicated by κοπιῶντας, προϊσταμένους, and νουθετοῦντας, are the same, viz. the πρεσβύτεροι or ἐπίσκοποι: see note on Acts xx. 17, 28. ἐν ὑμ. is among you, not as Pelt, al. '(bestowing labour) on you.' ἐν κυρίῳ, as the element in which, the matter with regard to which, their presidency takes place: = 'in divine things:' οὐκ ἐν τοῖς κοσμικοῖς, ἀλλ' ἐν τοῖς κατὰ κύριον. Thl. 13.] ἡγεῖσθαι ἐν ἀγάπῃ is an unusual expression for to esteem in love; for such seems to be its meaning. Lün. compares ἔχειν τινὰ ἐν ὀργῇ (Thuc. ii. 18). We have περὶ πολλοῦ ἡγεῖσθαι, Herod. ii. 115 (Job xxxv. 2 does not apply). ὑπερεκπερισσῶς is best taken with ἐν ἀγάπῃ: it will not form a suitable qualification for ἡγεῖσθαι, which is merely a verbum medium. And so Chrys., all. διὰ τὸ ἔργ. αὐτ. may mean, because of the nature of their work, viz. that it is the Lord's work, for your souls: or, on account of their activity in their office, as a recompense for their work. Both these motives are combined in Heb. xiii. 17. The reading εἰρηνεύετε ἐν αὐτοῖς (see var. readd.) can hardly mean, as Chrys., al.,—μὴ ἀντιλέγειν τοῖς παρ' αὐτῶν λεγομένοις (Thdrt.), —but is probably, as De W., a mistaken correction from imagining that this exhortation must refer to the presbyters as well as the preceding: whereas it seems only to be suggested by the foregoing, as enforcing peaceful and loving subordination without party strife: cf. ἀτάκτους below. ἑαυτοῖς not = ἀλλήλοις (see ref. Col. and note there, and cf. Mark ix. 50). 14—22.] General exhortations with regard to Christian duties. There appears no reason for regarding these verses as addressed to the presbyters, as Conybeare in his translation (after Chrys., Œc., Thl., Est., al.). They are for all: for each to interpret according to the sphere of his own duties. By the ἀδελφοί, he continues the same address as above. The attempt to give a stress to ὑμᾶς ('you, brethren, I exhort,' Conyb.) is objectionable: (1) because in that case the order of the words would be different (ὑμᾶς δέ, ἀδ., παρ., or ὑμᾶς δὲ παρ., ἀδ.), —(2) because the attention has been drawn off from οἱ προϊστάμενοι by εἰρηνεύετε ἐν ἑαυτοῖς intervening. 14. ἀτάκτους] This as ch. iv. 11, 2 Thess. iii. 6, 11, certainly implies that there was reason to complain of this ἀταξία in the Thessalonian church. "ἄτακτος is especially said of the soldier who does not remain in his rank: so inordinatus in Livy." Lün.: hence disorderly. ὀλιγοψύχους] such e. g. as needed the comfort of ch. iv. 13 ff. ἀντέχεσθε] keep hold of (reff.)—i. e. support. οἱ ἀσθενεῖς must be understood of the spiritually weak, not the literally sick: see reff. πρὸς πάντας] not, 'all the foregoing' (ἀτάκτους, ὀλιγοψύχους, ἀσθενῶν); but all men: cf. next verse. 15.] ὁρᾶτε μή gives a slight warning that the practice might creep on them unawares. It is not addressed to any particular section of the church, but to all; to each for himself, and the church for each. 16.] Chrys. refers this to ver. 15: ὅταν γὰρ τοιαύτην ἔχωμεν ψυχὴν ὥστε μηδένα ἀμύνεσθαι, ἀλλὰ πάντας εὐεργετεῖν, πόθεν, εἰπέ μοι, τὸ τῆς λύπης κέντρον παρεισελθεῖν δυνήσεται; ὁ γὰρ οὕτω χαίρων τῷ παθεῖν κακῶς, ὡς κ. εὐεργεσίαις ἀμύνεσθαι τὸν πεποιηκότα κακῶς, πόθεν δυνήσεται ἀνιαθῆναι λοιπόν; But perhaps this is somewhat far-fetched. The connexion seems however to be justified as he proceeds: καὶ πῶς οἷόν τε τοῦτό, φησιν; ἂν ἐθέλωμεν, δυνατόν. εἶτα καὶ τὴν ὁδὸν ἔδειξεν. ἀδιαλείπτως προσεύχεσθε κ.τ.λ. And Thl.: ὁ γὰρ ἐθισθεὶς ὁμιλεῖν τῷ θεῷ κ. εὐχαριστεῖν αὐτῷ ἐπὶ πᾶσιν ὡς συμφερόντως συμβαίνουσι, πρόδηλον ὅτι χαρὰν ἕξει διηνεκῆ. 17.] See Chrys. and Thl. above. προσεύχεσθε, not of the mere spirit of prayer, as Jowett: but, as in parallel, Eph. vi. 18, of direct supplications to God. These may be unceasing, in the heart which is full of his presence and evermore communing with Him.

18. ἐν παντί] in every thing,—every circumstance: see reff., and cf. ὑπὲρ πάντων, Eph. v. 20: κατὰ πάντα, Col. iii. 22, 23. Chrys., al., explain it 'on every occasion' (καιρῷ); but 2 Cor. ix. 8, ἐν παντὶ πάντοτε, precludes this. τοῦτο perhaps refers back to the three—χαίρ., προσεύχ., εὐχαρ., or perhaps, as Ellic. and most modern expositors, to εὐχαρ. alone.

After γάρ, supply ἐστίν, and understand θέλημα, not 'decree,' but will, in its practical reference to your conduct. ἐν χρ. Ἰησ.] in, as its medium; Christ being the Mediator. 19.] Chrys., Thl., Œc., understand this ethically: σβέννυσι δ' αὐτὸ βίος ἀκάθαρτος. But there can be no doubt that the supernatural agency of the Spirit is here alluded to,—the speaking in tongues, &c., as in 1 Cor. xii. 7 ff. It is conceived of as a flame, which may be checked and quenched: hence the ζέων τῷ πνεύματι of Acts xviii. 25, Rom. xii. 11. The word is a common one with the later classics applied to wind: e.g. Plut. de Is. and Osir. p. 366 E,—τὰ βόρεια πνεύματα κατασβεννύμενα κομιδῇ τῶν νοτίων ἐπικρατούντων. Galen. de Theriaca i. 17, uses the expression of the spirit of life in children: speaking of poison, he says, τὸ ἔμφυτον πνεῦμα ῥᾳδίως σβέννυσιν. See more examples in Wetst. 20.] On προφητείας, see 1 Cor. xii. 10, note. They were liable to be despised in comparison with the more evidently miraculous gift of tongues: and hence in 1 Cor. xiv. 5, &c., he takes pains to shew that prophecy was in reality the greater gift. 21.] πάντα δὲ δοκιμάζετε refers back to the foregoing: but try all (such χαρίσματα): see 1 Cor. xii. 10; xiv. 29; 1 John iv. 1.

τὸ καλὸν κατέχετε is best regarded as beginning a new sentence, and opposed to ἀπὸ παντ. εἴδ. κ.τ.λ. which follows: not however as disconnected from the preceding, but suggested by it. In this, and in all things, hold fast the good.

22. ἀπὸ π. εἴδ. πον. ἀπέχ.] These words cannot by any possibility be rendered as in E. V., 'abstain from all appearance of evil.' For (1) εἶδος never signifies 'appearance' in this sense: (2) the two members of the sentence would thus not be logically correspondent, but a new idea would be introduced in the second which has no place in the context: for it is not against being deceived by false appearance, nor against giving occasion by behaviour which appears like evil, that he is cautioning them, but merely to distinguish and hold fast that which is good, and reject that which is evil. εἶδος is the species, as subordinated to the genus. So Porphyr. (in Lünem.) isagoge de quinque vocibus 2: λέγεται δὲ εἶδος καὶ τὸ ὑπὸ τὸ ἀποδοθὲν γένος· καθ' ὃ εἰώθαμεν λέγειν τὸν μὲν ἄνθρωπον εἶδος τοῦ ζώου, γένους ὄντος τοῦ ζώου· τὸ δὲ λευκὸν τοῦ χρώματος εἶδος· τὸ δὲ τρίγωνον τοῦ σχή-

ματος εἶδος. And πονηροῦ is not an adjective, but a substantive:—from every species (or form) of evil. The objection which Bengel brings against this, 'species mali esset εἶδος τοῦ πονηροῦ,' is null, as such articles in construction are continually omitted, and especially when the genitive of construction is an abstract noun. Lün. quotes πρὸς διάκρισιν καλοῦ τε κ. κακοῦ, Heb. v. 14: πᾶν εἶδος πονηρίας, Jos. Antt. x. 3. 1. 23, 24.] αὐτὸς δέ—contrast to all these feeble endeavours on your own part. εἰρήνη here most probably in its wider sense, as the accomplishment of all these Christian graces, and result of the avoidance of all evil. It seems rather far-fetched to refer it back to ver. 13. ὁλοτελεῖς seems to refer to the entireness of sanctification, which is presently expressed in detail. Jerome, who treats at length of this passage, ad Hedibiam (ep. cxx.) quæst. xii., vol. i. p. 1004, explains it, 'per omnia vel in omnibus, sive plenos et perfectos:' and so Pelt, 'ut fiatis integri:' and the reviewer of Mr. Jowett in the Journal of S. Lit., April, 1856: 'sanctify you [to be] entire.' But I prefer the other interpretation: in which case it = ὅλους. καί introduces the detailed expression of the same wish from the lower side—in its effects. ὁλόκληρον] emphatic predicate, as its position before the article shews: entire—refers to all three following substantives, though agreeing in gender with πνεῦμα, the nearest. Cf. besides reff., Levit. xxiii. 15, ἑπτὰ ἑβδομάδας ὁλοκλήρους. τὸ πν. κ. ἡ ψυχ. κ. τ. σῶμα] τὸ πνεῦμα is the SPIRIT, the highest and distinctive part of man, the immortal and responsible soul, in our common parlance: ἡ ψυχή is the lower or animal soul, containing the passions and desires (αἰτία κινήσεως ζωικῆς ζώων, Plato, Deff. p. 411), which we have in common with the brutes, but which in us is ennobled and drawn up by the πνεῦμα. That St. Paul had these distinctions in mind, is plain (against Jowett) from such places as 1 Cor. ii. 14. The spirit, that part whereby we are receptive of the Holy Spirit of God, is, in the unspiritual man, crushed down and subordinated to the animal soul (ψυχή): he therefore is called ψυχικὸς πνεῦμα μὴ ἔχων, Jude 19: see also note on 1 Cor. as above. ἀμέμπτως defines and fixes ὁλόκληρον τηρηθ.: that, as Ellic., regarding quantity, this defining quality. ἐν, for it will be in that day that the result will be seen,—that the ὁλόκληρον τηρηθῆναι will be accomplished. 24.] Assurance from God's faithfulness, that it will be so. πιστός (reff.)—true to His word and calling: ἀντὶ τοῦ ἀληθής, Thdrt.

ὁ καλῶν] not = ὁ καλέσας, but bringing out God's office, as the Caller of his people: cf. Gal. v. 8. ποιήσει, viz. that which was specified in the last verse. 25—28.] CONCLUSION.

25.] Cf. Rom. xv. 30; Eph. vi. 19; Col. iv. 3; 2 Thess. iii. 1. περί is not so definite as ὑπέρ—pray concerning us—make us the subject of your prayers—our person—our circumstances—our apostolic work. Ellic. however remarks, that this distinction is precarious; and hardly appreciable. 26.] From this verse and the following, it would appear that this letter was given into the hands of the elders. ἐν, simply 'in,'—the kiss being the vehicle of the salutation: in our idiom, 'with.' 27.] The meaning of this conjuration is, that an assembly of all the brethren should be held, and the Epistle then and there publicly read. The aorist, ἀναγνωσθῆναι, referring to a single act, shews this (but consult Ellic.'s note). On the construction τὸν κύρ. see reff. Jowett offers various solutions for the Apostle's vehemence of language. I should account for it, not by supposing any distrust of the elders, nor by the other hypotheses which he suggests, but by the earnestness of spirit incidental to the solemn conclusion of an Epistle of which he is conscious that it conveys to them the will and special word of the Lord.

you,—see 1 Thess. i. 8. There is ample reason (against Jowett) for the emphasis on αὐτοὺς ἡμᾶς. The same faith which was receiving so rich increase, was manifesting itself by its fruit in the midst of persecutions and afflictions. πᾶσιν belongs only to τοῖς διωγμοῖς (ὑμῶν), as is shewn by the article before θλίψεσιν, and by αἷς ἀνέχεσθε, which is parallel with ὑμῶν. αἷς ἀνέχεσθε] attr. for ἐν ἀνέχεσθε,—not for ἃς ἀνέχεσθε, as De W., al., for ἀνέχομαι always governs a genitive in the N. [Ellic. denies this, and would take εἰς τό of the object to which the δικαία κρίσις tended. But surely when we are speaking of the divine proceedings, the tendency involves the purpose, and there is no need for a semi-telic force]) your being counted worthy of the Kingdom of God, on behalf of which (for this meaning of ὑπέρ, see Acts v. 41; jx. 16; Rom. i. 5; xv. 8; 2 Cor. xii. 10; xiii. 8, al.) ye also (καί, as in ref., points out the connexion—q. d. al., who also take ἐπιστ. as a future, 'for in that day our testimony with regard to you will be substantiated.' Most unwarrantable—requiring also ἐπιστάθη instead of -σθη. Calvin says, 'repetit in die illa .... ideo autem repetit, ut fidelium vota cohibeat, ne ultra modum festinent.' I should rather say, to give more fixity and definiteness to the foregoing). We may observe, as against Jowett's view of the arguments here being merely "they suffer now; therefore their enemies will suffer hereafter; therefore they will be comforted hereafter,"—that the arguments are nothing of the kind, resting entirely on the word δίκαιον, bringing in as it does all the relations of the Christian covenant, of them to God, and God to them,—and by contrast, of God to their enemies and persecutors. 11.] With a view to which (consummation, the ἐνδοξασθῆναι, &c., above, in your case, as is shewn below: not 'wherefore,' as E. V., Grot., Pelt, &c.) we pray also (as well as wish: had the καί imported [as Lün.] that the prayer of the Apostle was added on behalf of the Thessalonians to the fact (?) of the ἐνδοξασθῆναι, it would have been καὶ ἡμεῖς περ.) always concerning you, that (see note on 1 Cor. xiv. 13) our God may count YOU (emphatic) worthy (not—'make you worthy,' as Luth., Grot., Olsh., al., which the word cannot mean. The verb has the secondary emphasis: see below) of your calling (just as we are exhorted to walk ἀξίως τῆς κλήσεως ἧς ἐκλήθημεν, Eph. iv. 1—the calling being taken not merely as the first act of God, but as the enduring state produced by that act [see especially 1 Cor. vii. 20], the normal termination of which is, glory. So that κλῆσις is not 'the good thing to which we are called,' as Lün.: which besides would require τῆς κλήσεως ἀξιώσῃ: now that τῆς κλήσεως is sheltered behind the verb, it is taken as a matter of course, 'your calling,' an acknowledged fact), and may fulfil (complete,—bring to its fulness in you) all (possible) right purpose of goodness (it is quite impossible, with many ancient Commentators, E. V., &c., to refer εὐδοκίαν to God—'His good pleasure.' In that case we must at least have τὴν εὐδοκίαν—and ἀγαθωσ. will not refer with any propriety either to God, of whom the word is never used [occurring Rom. xv. 14; Gal. v. 22; Eph. v. 9 only, and always of MAN], or to the Thessalonians [κ. ἀγαθωσύνην εὐδοκίας]. It [εὐδοκία] must then apply to the Thessalonians, as it does to human agents in Phil. i. 15. And then ἀγαθωσύνης may be either a gen. objecti, 'approval of that which is good,'—or a gen. appositionis, a εὐδοκία consisting in ἀγαθωσύνη. The latter I own seems to me [agst Ellic.] far the best: as ἀγαθωσύνη is in all the above citations a subjective quality, and the approval of that which is good would introduce an element here which seems irrelevant) and (all) work of faith (activity of faith: see ref. 1 Thess. note. The genitive is again one of apposition), in power (belongs to πληρώσῃ, q. d. mightily),—that &c. On ὄνομα, cf. Phil. ii. 9 ff. Lünemann refers ἐν αὐτῷ to ὄνομα, 'and ye in it:' but surely the expression is one too appropriated in sacred diction, for it to refer to any but our Lord Himself: cf. 1 Cor. i. 5; 2 Cor. xiii. 4; Eph. i. 4; iv. 21; Col. ii. 10, al.

CH. II. 1—12.] DOGMATICAL PORTION OF THE EPISTLE. Information (by way of correction) concerning the approach of the day of the Lord: its prevenient and accompanying circumstances. This passage has given rise to many separate treatises: the principal of which I have enumerated in the Prolegomena, § v. 1.] But (passing from those things which he prays for them, to those which he prays of them) we entreat (reff.) you, brethren (to win their affectionate attention), in regard of (the Vulg., E. V., and many ancient Commentators, render ὑπέρ, 'per,' 'by,' and understand it as introducing a formula jurandi, as in Il. ω. 466, καί μιν ὑπὲρ πατρὸς . . . λίσσεο. But this construction is not found in the N. T.; and it is most unnatural that the Apostle should thus conjure them by that, concerning which he was about to teach them. It is best therefore to take ὑπέρ, as so often, not quite = περί, but very nearly so, the meaning 'on behalf of' being slightly hinted—for the subject had been misrepresented, and justice is done to it by the Apostle; and so Chrys. [περὶ τῆς παρουσίας τ. χριστοῦ ἐνταῦθα διαλέγεται κ. περὶ τῆς ἐπισυναγ. ἡμῶν] al.: see reff.) the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, and our gathering together (i. e. the gathering together of us, announced in 1 Thess. iv. 17) to Him (Lün. condemns to, and would render 'up to' as 1 Thess. iv. 17: but so much does not seem to lie in the preposition), 2.] in order that (aim of ἐρωτῶμεν) ye should not be lightly (soon and with small reason) shaken (properly of the waves agitated by a storm) from (see reff.) your mind (νοῦς here in its general sense—your mental apprehension of the subject:—not 'your former more correct sentiment,' as Est., Corn.-a-lap., Grot., al.) nor yet troubled (reff.), neither (on μηδέ, which is disjunctive [δέ], and separates negative from negative, — and μήτε, which is adjunctive [τε], and connects the separate parts of the same negation, see Winer, Gr. edn. 6, § 55. 6; and cf. Luke ix. 3) by spirit (by means of spiritual gift of prophecy or the like, assumed to substantiate such a view) nor by word (of mouth: belongs closely to μήτε δι' ἐπιστ. following, as is shewn by ver. 15, where they again appear together) nor by epistle as by (agency of) us (pretending to be from us. Let no pretended saying, no pretended epistle of mine, shake you in this matter. That there were such, is shewn by this parallel position of the clauses with διὰ πνεύματος, which last agency certainly was among them. Sayings, and an epistle, to this effect, were ascribed to the Apostle. So Chrys.: ἐνταῦθα δοκεῖ μοι αἰνίττεσθαι περῖιδέναι τινὰς ἐπιστολὴν πλάσαντας δῆθεν ἀπὸ τοῦ Παύλου, κ. ταύτην ἐπιδεικνυμένους λέγειν ὡς ἄρα ἐφέστηκεν ἡ ἡμέρα τοῦ κυρίου, ἵνα πολλοὺς ἐντεῦθεν πλανήσωσιν. However improbable this may seem, our expression would seem hardly to bear legitimately any other meaning. Cf. also ch. iii. 17, and note. It is impossible to understand the ἐπιστολὴ ὡς δι' ἡμῶν of the first Epistle, wrongly understood, which certainly would have been more plainly expressed, and the Epistle not as here disowned, but explained. Jowett says, "The most probable hypothesis is, that the Apos-

T., and always in the sense of being present: in two of those places, Rom. viii. 38, 1 Cor. iii. 22, τὰ ἐνεστῶτα are distinguished expressly from τὰ μέλλοντα. Besides which, St. Paul could not have so written, nor could the Spirit have so spoken by him. The teaching of the Apostles was, and of the Holy Spirit in all ages has been, that the day of the Lord is at hand. But these Thessalonians imagined it to be already come, and accordingly were deserting their pursuits in life, and falling into other irregularities, as if the day of grace were closed. So Chrys., — ὁ διάβολος . . . . . ἐπειδὴ οὐκ ἴσχυσε πεῖσαι ὅτι ψευδῆ τὰ μέλλοντα, ἑτέραν ἦλθεν ὁδόν, καὶ καταθεὶς ἀνθρώπους τινὰς λυμεῶνας, ἐπεχείρει τοὺς πειθομένους ἀπατᾷν, ὅτι τὰ μεγάλα ἐκεῖνα καὶ λαμπρὰ τέλος εἴληφε. τότε μὲν οὖν ἔλεγον ἐκεῖνοι τὴν ἀνάστασιν ἤδη γεγονέναι· νῦν δὲ ἔλεγον ὅτι ἐνέστηκεν ἡ κρίσις καὶ ἡ παρουσία τοῦ χριστοῦ, ἵνα τὸν χριστὸν αὐτὸν ψεύδει ὑποβάλωσι, καὶ πείσαντες ὡς οὐκ ἔστι λοιπὸν ἀντίδοσις οὐδὲ δικαστήριον καὶ κόλασις καὶ τιμωρία τοῖς κακῶς πεποιηκόσιν, ἐκείνους τε θρασυντέρους ἐργάσωνται, καὶ τούτους ταπεινοτέρους. καὶ τὸ δὴ πάντων χαλεπώτερον, ἐπεχείρουν οἱ μὲν ἁπλῶς ῥήματα ἀπαγγέλλειν ὡς παρὰ τοῦ Παύλου ταῦτα λεγόμενα, οἱ δὲ καὶ ἐπιστολὰς πράττειν ὡς παρ' ἐκείνου γραφείσας. Hom. in 2 Thess. i. 1, vol. xi. p. 469).

3.] Let no man deceive you in any manner (not only in either of the foregoing, but in any whatever): for (that day shall not come) (so E. V. supplies, rightly. There does not seem to have been any intention on the part of the Apostle to fill up the ellipsis: it supplies itself in the reader's mind. Knatchbull connects ὅτι with ἐξαπατήσῃ, and supplies ἐνέστηκεν after it: but this is very harsh) unless there have come the apostasy first (of which he had told them when present, see ver. 5: and probably with a further reference still to our Lord's prophecy in Matt. xxiv. 10—12. There is no need, with Chrys., Thdrt., Thl., Aug., to suppose ἀποστασία to mean Antichrist himself [τί ἐστιν ἡ ἀποστασία; αὐτὸν καλεῖ τὸν ἀντίχριστον ἀποστασίαν, Chr.], nor to regard him as its only cause: rather is he the chief fruit and topstone of the apostasy), and there have been revealed (ref. ch. i. As Christ in his time, so Antichrist in his time, is 'revealed' — brought out into light: he too is a μυστήριον, to be unfolded and displayed: see vv. 8, 9) the man of sin (in whom sin is as it were personified, as righteousness in Christ. The gen. is called by Ellicott that of the predominating quality), the son of perdition (see ref. John, where our Lord uses the expression of Judas. It seems merely to refer to Antichrist himself, whose essence and inheritance is ἀπώλεια,—not to his influence over others, as Thdrt.[both: ὡς κ. αὐτὸν ἀπολλύμενον, κ. ἑτέροις πρόξενον τούτου γενόμενον], Œc., Pelt, al.), he that withstands (the construction is not to be carried on by zeugma, as if ἐπὶ πάντα κ.τ.λ. belonged to ἀντικείμενος as well as to ὑπεραιρόμενος [the omission of the second article is no proof of this, as Pelt supposes, but only that both predicates belong to one and the same subject], but ἀντικείμενος is absolute, 'he that withstands CHRIST,' the ἀντίχριστος, 1 John ii. 18), and exalts himself above (in a hostile sense, reff.) every one that is called God (cf. λεγόμενοι θεοί, 1 Cor. viii. 5. "The expression includes the true God, as well as the false ones of the heathen—but λεγόμενον is a natural addition from Christian caution, as πάντα θεόν would have

The aor. usually denotes that one definite act and not a series of acts is spoken of: but here, from the peculiar nature of the verb, that one act is the setting himself down, and the session remains after it: cf. Matt. v. 1; xix. 28, &c.) the temple of God (this, say De W. and Lünemann after Irenæus, Hær. v. 30. 4, p. 330 [cited in Prolegg. § v. 3 note],—cannot be any other than the temple at Jerusalem: on account of the definiteness of the expression, ὁ ναὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, and on account of καθίσαι. But there is no force in this. ὁ ναὸς τοῦ θεοῦ is used metaphorically by St. Paul in 1 Cor. iii. 17 bis: and why not here? see also 1 Cor. vi. 16; Eph. ii. 21. From these passages it is plain that such figurative sense was familiar to the Apostle. And if so, καθίσαι makes no difficulty. Its figurative sense, as holding a place of power, sitting as judge or ruler, is more frequent still: see in St. Paul, 1 Cor. vi. 4: and Matt. xxiii. 2: Rev. xx. 4: to which indeed we might add the many places where our Lord is said καθίσαι on the right hand of God, e. g. Heb. i. 3; viii. 1; x. 12; xii. 2; Rev. iii. 21. Respecting the interpretation, see Prolegomena, § v.) shewing himself (πειράμενον ἀποδεικνύναι, Chrys. The construction is an attraction, for ἀποδ. ὅτι αὐτὸς . . .; and the emphasis is on ἐστιν, 'that he IS God'). 5.] conveys a reproach—they would not have been so lightly moved, if they had remembered this. 6.] And now (not temporal, but as νυνὶ δέ in 1 Cor. xiii. 13, 'rebus sic stantibus'—'now' in our argument. We must not for a moment think of the ungrammatical rendering of Whitby, Masker., Heydenr., Schrader, Olsh., B.-Crus., and Wieseler, 'that which at present hinders,' which must be τὸ νῦν κατέχον: and for which ver. 7, Rom. xii. 3, 1 Cor. vii. 17, are no precedent whatever, not presenting any case of inversion of an adverb from its emphatic place between an article and a participle. νῦν is a mere adverb of passage, and the stress is on τὸ κατέχον) ye know that which hinders (viz. recognize God's law—see reff. The genitive is one of apposition: the ἀνομία is that wherein the μυστήριον consists:—not a genitive of the working cause, as Thdrt. [ὡς κεκρυμμένην ἔχοντας τῆς ἀνομίας τὴν πάγην],—nor must we understand by the words, Antichrist himself, as Olsh., comparing τὸ τῆς εὐσεβείας μυστήριον, 1 Tim. iii. 16,—nor the unexampled depths of ungodliness, as Krebs, al., from Joseph. B. J. in reff. As to the order of the words, cf. Arrian, exp. Alex. i. 17. 6, κ. εὑρέσθαι συγγνώμην τῷ πλήθει τῶν Θηβαίων τῆς ἀποστάσεως, Lün.) only until he that now hinders (ὁ κατέχων is placed before ἕως for emphasis, as in ref. Gal., μόνον τῶν πτωχῶν ἵνα μνημονεύωμεν) be removed (the phrase is used of any person or thing which is taken out of the way, whether by death or other removal. So in reff.: and Plut. Timol. p. 238. 3 [Wetst.]: ἔγνω ζῆν καθ' ἑαυτὸν ἐκ μέσου γενόμενος,—Ter. Phorm. v. 9. 40, 'ea mortem obiit, e medio abiit.' See also Herod. viii. 22: and for the opposite, ἐν μέσῳ εἶναι, Xen. Cyr. v. 2. 26. Various erroneous arrangements and renderings of this sentence have been current: of which the principal have arisen from fancying that the participle κατέχων requires some verb to be supplied after it. So Vulg. ['tantum ut qui tenet nunc, teneat, donec de medio fiat:' so Syr., Erasm., Est., all.], and E. V. ['only he who now letteth, will let,' so Beza, Whitby, al.],—κατέχει [so Bengel, Pelt, al.]:—ἐστίν [so Knatchb., Burton, al.]): 8.] and then (when he that hinders shall have been removed: the emphasis is on τότε) shall be revealed the lawless one (the same as the αὐτόν of ver. 6: viz. the ἄνθρωπος τῆς ἁμαρτίας), whom (by this relative clause is introduced his ultimate fate at the coming of the Lord. To this the Apostle is carried on by the fervency of his spirit, and has to return again below to describe the working of Antichrist previously) the Lord Jesus will destroy by the breath of His mouth (from Isa. xi. 4,—πατάξει γῆν τῷ λόγῳ τοῦ στόματος αὐτοῦ, κ. ἐν πνεύματι διὰ χειλέων ἀνελεῖ ἀσεβῆ. It is better to keep the expression in its simple majesty, than to interpret it, as Thdrt.,—φθάσεται μόνον, κ. παυσλεθρίᾳ παραδώσει τὸν ἀλιτήριον. — Thdr-mops, — μόνον ἐπιβοήσας. Chrys. on this is fine: καθάπερ γὰρ τῦφ ἐπελθὸν ἁπλῶς τὰ μικρὰ ζωύφια καὶ πρὸ τῆς παρουσίας αὐτῆς πόρρωθεν ὄντα ναρκᾶν ποιεῖ κ. ἀναλίσκει· οὕτω καὶ ὁ χριστὸς τῷ ἐπιτάγματι μόνον (but see above) κ. τῇ παρουσίᾳ τὸν ἀντίχριστον ἀναλώσει. ἀρκεῖ παρεῖναι αὐτόν, καὶ ταῦτα πάντα ἀπόλωλε) and annihilate (not, as Olsh., 'deprive of his influence,' nor can Rev. xix. 19 be brought to bear here) by the appearance of His coming (not 'the brightness of his coming,' as very many Commentators, and E. V.; but as Beng.: 'apparitio adventus ipso adventu prior est, vel certe prima ipsius adventus emicatio, uti ἐπιφάνεια τῆς ἡμέρας:' the mere outburst of His presence shall bring the adversary to nought. Cf. the sublime expression of Milton,—'far off His coming shone') : 9, 10.] whose (refers back to the ὃν above—going back in time, to describe the character of his agency) coming is (the present is not used for the future, nor is the Apostle setting himself at the time prophesied of,—but it describes the essential attribute, as so often) according to (such as might be expected from,—

It is a LXX expression: see reff. ἀπ' ἀρχῆς must be taken in the general sense, as in reff.: not in the special, 'from the beginning of the gospel,' as Phil. iv. 15. It answers to πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων 1 Cor. ii. 7, πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου Eph. i. 4, πρὸ χρόνων αἰωνίων 2 Tim. i. 9, all of which are spoken of the decrees of God. εἰς σωτηρίαν] in contrast to the ἀπώλεια lately spoken of. ἐν ἁγ. πν. κ. π. ἀλ.] the elements in which the εἵλατο εἰς σωτ. takes place: not, as De W., the aim (ἐν for εἰς) of the εἵλατο. πνεύματος is the Holy Spirit—the sanctification of (wrought by) the Spirit: not, 'sanctification of (your) spirit.' This is the divine side of the element: the human side follows, the πίστις ἀληθείας, 'your own reception, by faith, of the truth.' 14. εἰς ὅ] to which (i. e. the being saved in sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth) He (God) called you through our Gospel (our preaching of the Gospel to you), in order to (your) acquisition (see on 1 Thess. v. 9) of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ (i. e. your sharing in the glory which He has; see ref. John: Rom. viii. 17, 29: not the glory of which He is the bestower or source, as Pelt, al. Equally wrong is the interpretation of Œc., Thl., Corn.-a-Lap., al. — ἵνα δόξαν περιποιήσῃ τῷ υἱῷ αὐτοῦ: of Luther, al., "zum herrlichen Eigenthum,"—'ut essetis gloriosa possessio domini nostri J. C.:' for, not to mention other objections, the whole context has for its purpose the lot of the Thessalonians as contrasted with that of those spoken of, vv. 10—12;—and the sense of περιποίησις is indicated by the parallel 1 Thess. v. 9). 15.] Therefore—seeing that such is God's intent respecting you. Mr. Jowett here describes the Apostle as being "unconscious of the logical inconsistency" of appealing to them to do any thing, after he has just stated their election of God. Rather we should say, that he was deeply conscious, as ever, of the logical necessity of the only practical inference which man can draw from God's gracious purposes to him. No human reasoning powers can connect the two,—God's sovereignty and man's free-will: all we know of them is, that the one is as certain a truth as the other. In proportion then as we assert the one strongly, we must ever implicate the other as strongly: a course which the great Apostle never fails to pursue: cf. Phil. ii. 12, 13, al. freq. στήκ. is a contrast to σαλευθῆναι, ver. 2. On the sense of παραδόσεις, as relating to matters of doctrine, see Ellic.'s note, and the reff. given by him. ἃς is the accusative of second reference. ἐπιστ. ἡμῶν, as contrasted with the ἐπιστ. ἃς δι' ἡμῶν of ver. 2, refers to 1 Thess. 16, 17.] αὐτός, as a majestic introduction, in contrast with ἡμῶν, see 1 Thess. iii. 11, and as ensuring the efficacy of the wish—q. d. 'and then you are safe.' Our Lord Jesus Christ is placed first, not merely because He is the mediator between men and God (Lün.), but because the sentence is a climax. ὁ ἀγ. ἡμ. κ.τ.λ. probably refers to ὁ θεὸς κ. ὁ πατ. ἡμ. alone: and yet when we consider how impossible it would have been for the Apostle to have written οἱ ἀγαπήσαντες, and that the singular verb following undoubtedly refers to both, I would not too hastily pronounce this. See note on 1 Thess. iii. 11.

ἀγαπήσας—who loved us—refers to a single fact—the love of the Father in sending His Son—or the love of the Father and Son in our accomplished Redemption.

κ. δούς—and gave—by that act of Love. παράκλ. αἰων.] consolation, under all trials, and that eternal,—not transitory, as this world's consolations: sufficient in life, and in death, and for ever: cf. Rom. viii. 38 f. This for all time present: and then ἐλπ. ἀγ. for the future.

ἐν χάριτι belongs, not to ἐλπ. ἀγ., but to δούς, and is the medium through, or element in which, the gift is made. Better thus than to refer it to both the participles ἀγαπ. κ. δούς; for ὁ ἀγαπήσας as applied to God (or the Lord Jesus) usually stands absolute, cf. Rom. viii. 37; Gal. ii. 20; Eph. v. 2.

παρακαλέσαι] as in 1 Thess. iii. 11, 3 pers. sing. opt. aor. comfort, with reference to your disquiet respecting the παρουσία. After στηρ. understand ὑμᾶς, which has been supplied—see var. readd.,—better than τὰς καρδ. ὑμῶν, which are not the agents in ἔργον and λόγος. This latter is not 'doctrine,' as Chrys., Calv. ('tam in piæ et sanctæ vitæ cursu, quam in sana doctrina'),—for ἔργον (work) and λόγος (word), seeing that παντί applies to both, must be correlative, and both apply to matters in which the man is an agent. Still less must we understand ἐν as = διά (Chrys., Thl. 2, Beng., al.): the sphere, and not the instruments, of the consolation and confirmation, is spoken of.

CH. III. 1—5.] Exhortation to pray for him and his colleagues (1, 2). His confidence that the Lord will keep them (3)—and that they will obey his commands (4). Prayer for them (5).

does or says that which is inappropriate under the circumstances. Thus it answers to ineptus in Latin (Cic. de Orat. ii. 4). From 'aptitude,' it passes to its wider ethical meaning, and is used of men who act contrary to divine or human laws. Thus it gets the general signification of bad or ungodly. See examples in Kypke, Obss. ii. p. 145,—in Lösner and Wetst." Who are these men? It is obvious that the key to the answer will be found in Acts xviii. They were the Jews at Corinth, who were at that time the especial adversaries of the Apostle and his preaching. And this is confirmed by the clause which he has added to account for their ἀτοπία and πονηρία: οὐ γὰρ πάντων ἡ πίστις—for to all men the (Christian) faith does not belong—all men do not receive it—have no receptivity for it—obviously pointing at Jews by this description. It is more natural to understand the article here as definite, the faith, than as abstract: for faith, as such, would not bear much meaning here.

3.] Calvin says, "Ceterum de aliis magis quam de se anxium fuisse Paulum, ostendunt hæc ipsa verba. In eum maligni homines improbitatis suæ aculeos dirigebant, in eum totus impetus irruebat: curam interea suam ad Thessalonicenses convertit, nequid hæc illis tentatio nocceat." πιστός seems to be chosen in allusion to πίστις which has just preceded; but the allusion cannot be more than that of sound, as the things spoken of are wholly different. ὁ κύριος is our Lord: see ch. ii. 16, and ver. 5.

δέ, in contrast with the men just mentioned. στηρίξει] in reference to his wish, ch. ii. 17. τοῦ πονηροῦ may mean 'the evil one,' as in Matt. xiii. 19: Eph. vi. 16, al.: and so Ellic. But here the assurance seems, as before said, to correspond to the wish ch. ii. 17: and thus στηρίξαι ἐν παντὶ ἔργῳ κ. λόγῳ ἀγαθῷ = στηρίξει κ. φυλάξει ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ: in which case τ. πον. is neuter. We may observe that the words are nearly a citation from the Lord's prayer.

ἐν κυρίῳ, as the element in which his confidence is exercised, shews it to be one assuming that they will act consistently with their Christian profession: and so gives the expectation the force of an exhortation, but at the same time of a hopeful exhortation. ἐφ' ὑμᾶς (reff.), with reference to you—the direction of his confidence. καὶ ποιεῖτε κ. ποιήσετε is all the apodosis—not ὅτι ἃ παραγγ. κ. ποιεῖτε, καὶ ποιήσετε, as Erasm.

5.] There does not appear to be any distrust of the Thessalonians implied by this repeated wish for them, as De W. supposes. Rather is it an enlargement, taken up by the δέ (not only so, but) of the ἃ παραγγέλλομεν κ. ποιεῖτε κ. ποιήσετε. ὁ κύρ. is our Lord, as before. ἡ ἀγάπη τ. θεοῦ here, from the fact of his wishing that their hearts may be directed into it, must be subjective, the love of man to God. The objective meaning, God's love, is out of the question. The other subjective meanings, the love which God works (Pelt), ... which God commands (Le Clerc), are far-fetched. ἡ ὑπομονὴ τ. χριστοῦ has very generally been understood as in E. V., 'the patient waiting for

Christ.' So Œc., Ambr., Erasm., Corn.-a-lap., Beza, all. But ὑπομονή will not bear this meaning. It occurs thirty-four times in the N. T., and always in the sense of endurance,—patience. Nor again can the expression mean 'endurance for Christ's sake,' which the simple genitive will not convey: but it must be, as Chrys. (1) ἵνα ὑπομένωμεν, ὡς ἐκεῖνος ὑπέμεινεν, the patience of Christ (gen. possess.),—which Christ shewed. 6—15.] Dehortation from disorderly, idle habits of life. He had given a hint in this direction before, in the first Epistle (v. 14, 15): he now speaks more plainly, doubtless because their restlessness and excitement concerning the παρουσία had been accompanied by an increase of such habits. His dissuading them from associating with such persons, seems to shew that the core of the Church (as Lün.) was as yet sound in this respect. 6.] παραγγέλλομεν δέ takes up the assurance of ver. 4, and tests its general form by a special command. ἐν ὀνόμ. κ.τ.λ. strengthens the παραγγ., and does not belong to the following. στέλλεσθαι] lit. 'to take in, or shorten sail:' ἱστία μὲν στείλαντο, θέσαν δ' ἐν νηὶ μελαίνῃ, Il. α. 433: hence, to draw in or shorten, generally: πότερά σοι παῤῥησίᾳ | φράσω τὰ κεῖθεν, ἢ λόγον στειλώμεθα, Eur. Bacch. 625;—to conceal: ἐβουλεύετο μὲν στέλλεσθαι, οὐ μὴν ἠδύνατό γε κρύπτειν τὸ γεγονός, Polyb. Frag. hist. 39 (from Suidas, voc. στείλασθαι),—οὐ δυναμένων τὴν ἐκ τῆς συνηθείας καταξίωσιν στέλλεσθαι ('cohibere consuetam reverentiam'), ib. viii. 22. 4. So here, 'cohibere vos'—to keep yourselves from: see reff.: obviously without allusion as yet to any formal excommunication, but implying merely avoidance in intercourse and fellowship. The accusative is repeated before the infinitive, probably because the clause ἐν ὀνόμ., &c., intervenes. The παράδοσις refers to the oral instruction which the Apostle had given them when he was present, and subsequently confirmed by writing (1 Thess. iv. 11, 12). παρελάβοσαν] plural, as belonging to the πάντες implied in παντός; so in ἔβαν οἰκόνδε ἕκαστος. On the form -οσαν, which is said to have been originally Macedonian, and thence is found in the Alexandrian (ἐσχάζοσαν, Lycophr. 21), Lobeck remarks (Phryn. p. 349), "ex modorum et temporum metaplasmis, quos conjunctim tractare solent dialectorum scriptores, nullus diutius viguit eo quo tertiæ aoristi secundi personæ plurales ad similitudinem verborum in μι traducuntur,—εἶδοσαν Niceph., ἐφεύροσαν Anna Comnena, μετήλθοσαν Nicet. (and παρῆλθοσαν)." We have ἤλθοσαν ἕως ἠ, Ps. lxxviii. 1; see other examples from LXX in Winer, edn. 6, § 13. 2. f. 7.] πῶς δεῖ μιμ. ἡμ. is a concise way of expressing 'how ye ought to walk in imitation of us.'

ἀτακτέω also occurs in Lysias κατὰ Ἀλκιβ. α. p. 141. 18, in this sense, of 'leading a disorderly life.' 8.] ἄρτον ἐφάγομεν, a Hebraistic expression for 'got our sustenance:' παρά τινος, 'at any one's expense,' from any one as a gift: there seems to be an allusion in the construction to the original sense of δωρεάν. ἐργαζόμ. belongs to ἄρτον ἐφ. as a contrast to δωρεάν: but by working, &c.

Calov., Le Clerc, Beng., Pelt, Winer, al.) have joined διὰ τῆς ἐπιστολῆς with what follows, and explained it (usually, see below),—'note that man by an Epistle (to me).' But τῆς is decidedly against this rendering,—unless we suppose that it signifies 'your' answer to this. [Bengel and Pelt, taking τῆς ἐπ. for this Epistle, would render, 'notate nota censoria, hanc Epist., ejus admonendi causa, adhibentes eique incultantes' (Beng.),—'Eum hac epistola freti severius tractate' (Pelt): but both these require σημειοῦσθε to be diverted from its simple meaning.] The great objection to the above connexion is that St. Paul has already pointed out the manner of treating such an one, ver. 6, and is not likely to enjoin a further reference to himself on the subject. It is far better therefore, with Chrys. (there seems no reason for qualifying this by apparently, as Ellic.), Est., Corn.-a-Lap., Beza, Hamm., Whitby, Schott, Olsh., De W., Baum.-Crus., Lün., Ellic., all., to join διὰ τῆς ἐπ. with the preceding τῷ λόγ. ἡμ., and render it our word by this Epistle, as ἡ ἐπιστολή is undoubtedly used in reff., and the word is that in ver. 12. σημειοῦσθε] mark, see ref. Polyb.: the ordinary meaning of the word: put a σημεῖον on him, by noticing him for the sake of avoidance. On what is called the dynamic middle, see Krüger, Sprachlehre, § 52. 8. 4.

15.] καί is more delicate than ἀλλά or δέ would be: q. d. 'and I know that it will follow as a consequence of your being Christians, that ye will, &c.' ὡς in the first clause seems superfluous: it is perhaps inserted to correspond with the other clause, or still further to soften the ἐχθρὸν ἡγεῖσθε. So ὅπερ, Job xix. 11; xxxiii. 10. 16.] Concluding wish.

ὁ κύριος τῆς εἰρήνης] As the Apostle constantly uses ὁ θεὸς τῆς εἰρ. for the God of Peace (see Rom. xv. 33; xvi. 20: 2 Cor. xiii. 11, al.), we here must understand our Lord Jesus Christ. ἡ εἰρήνη must not be understood only of peace with one another: for there has been no special mention of mutual disagreement in this Epistle: but of peace in general, outward and inward, here and hereafter, as in Rom. xiv. 17. See Fritz. on Romans, vol. i. p. 22.

The stress is on ὑμῖν—May the Lord of Peace give you (that) Peace always in every way (whether it be outward or inward, for time or for eternity). μετὰ πάντων ὑ.] therefore with the ἀτάκτως περιπατοῦντες also (Lün.): not as Jowett, pleonastic. The man who was to be admonished as an ἀδελφός, would hardly be excluded from the Apostle's parting blessing. 17, 18.] CONCLUSION.

17.] Autographic salutation. The Epistle, as it follows from this, was not written with the Apostle's own hand, but dictated. So with other Epistles; see Rom. xvi. 22: 1 Cor. xvi. 21: Col. iv. 18. ὅ] which circumstance: not attraction for ὅς. The whole of vv. 17, 18, not merely the benediction, are included. By the words οὕτως γράφω, we must not conceive that any thing was added, such as his signature,—or as Œc., οἷον τὸ ἀσπάζομαι ὑμᾶς, ἢ τὸ ἔῤῥωσθε, ἤ τι τοιοῦτον: they are said of that which he is writing at the time. His reason for this caution evidently was, the ἐπιστολὴ ὡς δι' ἡμῶν, spoken of ch. ii. 2. And the words ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ must not, with Lün., be limited to any future Epistles which he might send to the Thessalonians, but understood of a caution which he intended to practise in future with all his Epistles: or at least with such as required, from circumstances, this identification. Thus we have (1 Thess. being manifestly an exception, as written before the rule was established) Gal. written with his own hand (see note on Gal.

CHAP. I. 1, 2.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. 1. κατ' ἐπιτ.] See reff., especially Tit.: a usual expression of St. Paul, and remarkably enough occurring in the doxology at the end of the Epistle to the Romans, which there is every reason to think was written long after the Epistle itself. It is a more direct predication of divine command than διὰ θελήματος θεοῦ in the earlier Epistles. θεοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμ.] Apparently an expression belonging to the later apostolic period,—one characteristic of which seems to have been the gradual dropping of the article from certain well-known theological terms, and treating them almost as proper names (see, however, Ellicott's note). Thus in Luke i. 47 it is ἐπὶ τῷ θεῷ τῷ σωτῆρί μου: and indeed in almost every place in the pastoral Epistles except this, σωτήρ has the article. In ref. Jude, the expression is the same as here. καὶ χρ. Ἰησ.] See a similar repetition after δοῦλος χρ. Ἰησοῦ in Rom. i. 4 & 6. The Apostle loves them in his more solemn and formal passages—and the whole style of these Epistles partakes more of this character, as was natural in the decline of life. τῆς ἐλπίδος ἡμῶν] It is not easy to point out the exact reference of this word here, any further than we may say that it gives utterance to the fulness of an old man's heart in the near prospect of that on which it naturally was ever dwelling. It is the ripening and familiarization of χριστὸς ἐν ὑμῖν ἡ ἐλπὶς τῆς δόξης of ref. Col. See also Tit. i. 2. I am persuaded that in many such expressions in these Epistles, we are to seek rather a psychological than a pragmatical explanation. Theodoret notices the similar occurrence of words in Ps. lxiv. (lxv.) 6, ἐπάκουσον ἡμῶν ὁ θεὸς ὁ σωτὴρ ἡμῶν, ἡ ἐλπὶς πάντων τῶν περάτων τῆς γῆς—which is interesting, as it might have suggested the expression here, familiar as the Apostle was with O. T. diction. Ellic. refers, for the same expression, to Ignat. Trall. § 2, p. 676.

ἐν πίστει] When Conyb. says, "'in faith,' not 'in the faith,' which would require τῇ" (so Ellic., without the protest),—he forgets (1) the constant usage by which the article is omitted after prepositions in cases where it is beyond doubt in the mind of the writer and must be expressed in translation: (2) the almost uniform anarthrousness of these Epistles. He himself translates the parallel expression in Tit. i. 4, 'mine own son according to our common faith,' which is in fact supplying the article. Render therefore in the faith: joining it with γνησίῳ τέκνῳ: and compare reff. ἔλεος and εἰρήνη are found joined in Gal. vi. 16, in which Epistle are so many similarities to these (see Prolegg. to these Epistles, § i. 32, note).

The expression θεὸς πατήρ, absolute, is found in St. Paul, in Gal. i. 1, 3: Eph. vi. 23: Phil. ii. 11: Col. iii. 17 (τῷ θ. π.): 1 Thess. i. 1: 2 Thess. i. 1: 2 Tim. i. 2: Tit. i. 4. So that it belongs to all periods of his writing, but chiefly to the later.

3—20.] From specifying the object for which Timotheus was left at Ephesus (vv. 3, 4), and characterizing the false teachers (5—7), he digresses to the true use of the law which they pretended to teach (8—10), and its agreement with the gospel with which he was entrusted (11): thence to his own conversion, for the mercies of which he expresses his thankfulness in glowing terms (12—17). Thence he returns to his exhortations to Timotheus (18—20). On these repeated digressions, and the inferences from them, see Prolegg. ch. vii. § i. 36 f. 3.] The sentence begins As I exhorted thee, &c., but in his negligence of writing, the Apostle does not finish the construction: neither verse 5, nor 12, nor 18, will form the apodosis without unnatural forcing.

παρεκάλεσα] Chr. lays stress on the word, as implying great mildness—ἄκουε τὸ προσηνές, πῶς οὐ διδασκάλου κέχρηται ῥωμῇ, ἀλλ' οἰκέτου σχεδόν· οὐ γὰρ εἶπεν ἐπέταξα οὐδὲ ἐκέλευσα, οὐδὲ παρῄνεσα, ἀλλὰ τί; παρεκάλεσά σε. This has been met (Huther, al.), by remarking that he says διεταξάμην to Titus, Tit. i. 5. The present word however was the usual one to his fellow-helpers, see reff.: and διεταξάμην there refers rather to a matter of detail—'as I prescribed to thee.' The sense of προσμεῖναι, to tarry, or stay at a place, is sufficiently clear from ref. Acts. The προσ- implies a fixity when the word is absolutely used, which altogether forbids the joining προσμεῖναι with πορευόμενος understood of Timotheus, as some have attempted to do. The aorist προσμεῖναι refers to the act of remaining behind when the Apostle departed; the present would have marked an endurance of stay. Various endeavours have been made to escape from the difficulties of the fact implied. Schneckenburger would read προσμείνας: others would take προσμεῖναι as imperative, most unnaturally. No one can doubt, that the straightforward rendering is, As I besought thee to tarry in Ephesus, when I was going to Macedonia . . . . . And on this straightforward rendering we must build our chronological considerations. See the whole subject discussed in the Prolegomena, ch. vii. § ii.: and cf. Ellicott's note here.

τισὶν] so constantly (reff.) in these Epistles: sometimes οἱ ἀντιλέγοντες Tit. i. 9, or πολλοί ib. 10. Huther infers from τισί, that the number at this time was not considerable: but this is hardly safe. "The indefinite pronoun is more probably slightly contemptuous: 'le mot τινες a quelque chose de méprisant,' see Arnaud, on Jude 4, compare Gal. ii. 12." Ellicott. ἑτεροδιδασκαλεῖν] There seems to be in ἑτερο-, as in ἑτεροζυγοῦντες

2 Cor. vi. 14, the idea of strange, or incongruous, not merely of different: cf. also ἑτερόγλωσσος, 1 Cor. xiv. 21. And the compound -διδασκαλεῖν, not -διδάσκειν, brings in the sense of 'acting as a teacher:' not to be teachers of strange things. Eusebius has the substantive, H. E. iii. 32 —διὰ τῆς τῶν ἑτεροδιδασκάλων ἀπάτης,— in the sense of heretical teachers—which however is too fixed and developed a meaning to give here. We have καλοδιδάσκαλος, Tit. ii. 3. The meanings of 'other teaching' and 'false teaching,' when we remember that the faith which St. Paul preached was incapable (Gal. i. 8, 9) of any the least compromise with the errors subsequently described, lie very close to one another. προσέχειν, to give attention to: see reff.: "as it were, a mean term between ἀκούειν and πιστεύειν, compare Polyb. iv. 84. 6, διακούσαντες οὐδὲν προσέσχον; Jos. B. J. vii. 5. 3, οὔτε προσεῖχον οὔτε ἐπίστευον." Ellicott.

μύθοις] We can only judge from the other passages in these Epistles where the word occurs, what kind of fables are alluded to. In Tit. i. 14, we have μὴ προσέχοντες Ἰουδαϊκοῖς μύθοις. In our ch. iv. 7, they are designated as βέβηλοι καὶ γραώδεις. In 2 Tim. iv. 4, they are spoken of absolutely, as here. If we are justified in identifying the 'fables' in Tit. with these, they had a Jewish origin: but merely to take them, as Thdrt., for the Jewish traditional comments on the law (μύθους δὲ οὐ τὴν τοῦ νόμου διδασκαλίαν ἐκάλεσεν, ἀλλὰ τὴν Ἰουδαϊκὴν ἑρμηνείαν τὴν ὑπ' αὐτῶν καλουμένην δευτέρωσιν [מִשְׁנֶה, mischna]), does not seem to satisfy the βέβηλοι καὶ γραώδεις. And consequently others have interpreted them of the gnostic mythology of the Æons. So Tert. adv. Valentinianos, ch. 3, vol. ii. p. 545: 'qui ex alia conscientia venerit fidei, si statim inveniat tot nomina æonum, tot coniugia, tot genimina, tot exitus, tot eventus, felicitates, infelicitates dispersae atque concisae divinitatis, dubitabiturne ibidem pronuntiare, has esse fabulas et genealogias indeterminatas, quas apostoli spiritus his iam tunc pullulantibus seminibus haereticis damnare praevenit?' And Iren., in his præf., p. 1, assumes these words in the very outset, almost as his motto—ἐπεὶ τὴν ἀλήθειαν παραπεμπόμενοί τινες ἐπεισάγουσι λόγους ψευδεῖς κ. γενεαλογίας ματαίας αἵτινες ζητήσεις μᾶλλον παρέχουσι, καθὼς ὁ ἀπόστολός φησιν, ἢ οἰκοδομὴν θεοῦ τὴν ἐν πίστει .... Others again (as Suidas's definition, μῦθος, λόγος ψευδής, εἰκονίζων τὴν ἀλήθειαν) would give an entirely general meaning to the word,—'false teaching' of any kind. But this is manifestly too lax: for the descriptions here (ver. 7, e. g.) point at a Jewish origin, and a development in the direction of γενεαλογίαι ἀπέραντοι. It does not seem easy to define any further these μῦθοι, but it is plain that any transitional state from Judaism to gnosticism will satisfy the conditions here propounded, without inferring that the full-blown gnosticism of the second century must be meant, and thus calling in question the genuineness of the Epistle. On the whole subject, see Prolegg. ch. vii. § i. 8 ff. γενεαλ. ἀπερ.] De W. in his note on Tit. i. 14, marks out well the references which have been assigned to this expression: "γενεαλογίαι cannot be 1) properly genealogical registers,—either for a pure genealogico-historical end (Chr., Œc., Thl, Ambr., Est., Calov., Schöttg., Wolf), or for a dogmatico-historical one, to foster the religious national pride of Jews against Gentiles, cf. Phil. iii. 4 f. (Storr, Flatt, Wegsch., Leo), or to ascertain the descent of the Messiah (Thdrt., Jer., Wegsch.: according to Nicol. Lyr., to shew that Jesus was not the Messiah), least of all genealogies of Timotheus himself (Wetst.),—for all this does not touch, or too little touches religious interests: nor are they 2) gentile theogonies (Chr. gives this as well as the former interpretation: also Œc., Thl., Elsn.); nor again 3) pedigrees of the cabalistic sephiroth (Vitring. Obss. 1, v. 13: see Wolf), which will hardly suit γενεαλ.: nor 4) Essenian genealogies of angels (Mich., Heinr., al.), of the existence of which we have no proof; nor 5) allegorizing genealogies, applications of psychological and historical considerations to the genealogies contained in the books of Moses; as in Philo (Dähne, Stud. u. Krit. 1853, 1008),—a practice too peculiar to Philo and his view: but most probably 6) lists of gnostic emanations (Tert. contr. Val. 3,—præscr. 33, Iren. præf. [see above], Grot., Hamm., Chr., Mosh., Mack, Baur, al.), &c." But again, inasmuch as γενεαλογίαι are coupled in Tit. iii. 9 with μάχαι νομικαί, it seems as if we must hardly understand the ripened fruits of gnosticism, but rather the first beginnings of those genealogies in the abuse of Judaism. See Prolegg. "It is curious that Polybius uses both terms in similarly close connexion, Hist. ix. 2. 1." Ellicott. ἀπεράντους may be used merely in popular hyperbole to signify the tedious length of such genealogies. The meaning 'profitless' (Chr., ἤτοι πέρας μηδὲν ἔχουσαι, ἢ οὐδὲν χρήσιμον, ἢ δυσκατάληπτον ἡμῖν, and so Thdrt.; see below) would be a natural deduction from the other, and is therefore hardly to be so summarily set aside as it has been by De W., al.

αἵτινες, of the kind which. ζητήσεις] objective, questions: not subjective, 'questionings:' see reff. in these Epistles, in which ζητήσεις are not themselves, but lead to, ἔριες, μάχαι, &c. παρέχουσιν] minister, as E. V., is the best rendering: 'afford,' 'give rise to,' 'furnish:' see below. μᾶλλον ἤ is a mild way of saying καὶ οὐ: see reff. οἰκονομίαν θεοῦ . . . .] This has been taken two ways: 1) objectively: the dispensation (reff.) of God (towards man) which is (consists) in (the) faith: in which case παρέχουσιν must bear something of a transferred meaning,—zeugmatic, as the grammarians call it,—as applied to οἰκονομίαν, implying, "rather than they set forth," &c. And to this there can be no objection, as the instances of it are so common. This meaning also suits that of οἰκονομία in the reff., even 1 Cor. ix. 17, where the οἰκονομία is the objective matter wherewith the Apostle was entrusted, not his own subjective fulfilment of it. 2) subjectively:—'the exercising of the stewardship of God in faith:' so Conyb.: or as paraphrased by Storr (in Huther) ζητοῦντας αὐτοὺς ποιοῦσι, μᾶλλον ἢ οἰκονόμους θεοῦ πιστούς. But to this there is the serious objection, that οἰκονομία in this subjective sense, 'the fulfilment of the duty of an οἰκονόμος,' wants example: and even could this be substantiated, οἰκονομίαν παρέχειν, in the sense required, would seem again questionable. I would therefore agree with Huther and Wiesinger (and Ellicott) in the objective sense—the dispensation of God. Then τὴν ἐν πίστει has also been variously taken. Chrys. says, καλῶς εἶπεν, οἰκονομίαν θεοῦ· μεγάλα γὰρ ἡμῖν δοῦναι ἠθέλησεν ὁ θεός, ἀλλ' οὐ δέχεται ὁ λογισμὸς τὸ μέγεθος αὐτοῦ τῶν οἰκονομιῶν. διὰ πίστεως οὖν τοῦτο γίνεσθαι δεῖ. And Thdrt.: αἱ μὲν περιττολογίαι ζητήσεις ἀνόητοι, ἡ δὲ πίστις φωτίζει τὸν νοῦν, καὶ ἐπιδείκνυσι τὰς θείας οἰκονομίας. But the words will hardly bear either of these. The only legitimate meaning seems to be—which is in faith, i. e. finds its sphere, and element, and development among men, in faith. Thus ἐν πίστει stands in contrast to ζητήσεις, in which the οἰκονομία θεοῦ does not consist; and the way for the next sentence is prepared, which speaks of πίστις ἀνυπόκριτος as one of the means to the great end of the gospel. 5.] But (contrast to the practice of these pretended teachers of the law) the end (purpose, aim: Chrys. quotes τέλος ἰατρικῆς ὑγιεία) of the commandment (viz. of the law of God in [ver. 11] the gospel: not, although in the word there may be a slight allusion to it,—of that which Timothy was παραγγέλλειν, ver. 3. This commandment is understood from the οἰκονομία just mentioned, of which it forms a part) is Love (as Rom. xiii. 10. We recognize, in the restating of former axiomatic positions, without immediate reference to the subject in hand, the characteristic of a later style of the Apostle) out of (arising, springing from, as its place of birth—the heart being the central point of life: see especially ref. 1 Pet.) a pure heart (pure from all selfish views and leanings: see Acts xv. 9: on the psychology, see Ellicott's note: and Delitzsch, Biblische Psychologie, iv. 12, p. 204) and good conscience (is this συνειδησις ἀγαθή, 1) a conscience good by being freed from guilt by the application of Christ's blood,—or is it 2) a conscience pure in motive, antecedent to the act of love? This must be decided by the usage of this and similar expressions in these Epistles, where they occur several times [reff. and 1 Tim. iii. 9. 2 Tim. i. 3. 1 Tim. iv. 2. Tit. i. 15]. From those examples it would appear, as De W., that in the language of the pastoral Epistles a good conscience is joined with soundness in the faith, a bad conscience with unsoundness. So that we can hardly help introducing the element of freedom from guilt by the effect of that faith on the conscience. And the earlier usage of St. Paul in Acts xxiii. 1, compared with the very similar one in 2 Tim. i. 3, goes to substantiate this) and faith unfeigned (this connects with τὴν ἐν πίστει above; it is faith, not the pretence of faith, the mere 'Scheinglaube' of the hypocrite, which, as in Acts xv. 9, καθαρίζει τὰς καρδίας, and as in Gal. v. 6, δι' ἀγάπης ἐνεργεῖται: Wiesinger well remarks that we see from this, that the general character of these false teachers, as of those against whom Titus is warned, was not so much error in doctrine, as leading men away from the earnestness of the loving Christian life, to useless and vain questionings, ministering only strife): 6.] (the connexion is—it was by declining from these qualities that these men entered on their paths of error) of which (the καθαρὰ καρδία, — συνείδησις ἀγαθή, and πίστις ἀνυπόκριτος—the sources of ἀγάπη, which last they have therefore missed by losing them) some having failed (reff.: 'missed their mark:' but this seems hardly precise enough: it is not so much to miss a thing at which a man is aiming, as to leave unregarded one at which he ought to be aiming: as Schweigh. Lex. Polyb., 'rationem alicujus rei non habere, et respectu ejus sibi male consulere.' Thus Polyb. i. 33. 10, τῆς μὲν πρὸς τὰ θηρία μάχης δεόντως ἦσαν ἐστοχασμένοι, τῆς δὲ πρὸς τοὺς ἵππεῖς, πολλαπλασίους ὄντας τῶν παρ' αὐτοῖς, ὁλοσχερῶς ἠστόχησαν: v. 107. 2, πρὸς μὲν τὸ παρὸν ἐνδεχομένως ἐβουλεύσατο, τοῦ δὲ μέλλοντος ἠστόχησε: see also vii. 14. 3) turned aside to (ἐξ-, away from the path leading to the τέλος, ver. 5, in which they should have been walking: the idiom is often found in the examples cited by Wetst.: e. g. Plat. Phædr., δεῦρ' ἐκτραπόμενος κατὰ τὸν Ἰλισσὸν ἴωμεν,—Thuc. v. 65, τὸ ὕδωρ ἐξέτρεπε κατὰ τὴν Μαντινικήν,—and in Polyb., ἐκτρέπεσθαι εἰς ὀλιγαρχίαν, vi. 4. 9,—εἰς τὴν συμφυῆ κακίαν, ib. 10. 2 and 7: and in Hippocr. de temp. morbi, even nearer to our present phrase,—εἰς μακρολογίαν ἐξετράποντο) foolish speaking (of what kind, is explained ver. 7, and Tit. iii. 9, which place connects this expression with our ver. 4. It is the vain questions arising out of the law which he thus characterizes. Herod. [ii. 118] uses μάταιος λόγος of an idle tale, an empty fable:—εἰρομένου δέ μευ τοὺς ἱρέας, εἰ μάταιον λόγον λέγουσι οἱ Ἕλληνες τὰ περὶ Ἴλιον γενέσθαι), wishing to be (giving themselves out as, without really being: so Paus. i. 4 6, αὐτοὶ δὲ Ἀρκάδες ἐθέλουσιν εἶναι τῶν δμοῦ Τηλέφῳ διαβάντων ἐς τὴν Ἀσίαν. Cf. Palm and Rost's Lex. sub voce) teachers of the law (of what law? and in what sense? To the former question, but one answer can be given. The law is that of Moses; the law, always so known. The usage of νομοδιδάσκαλος (reff.) forbids our giving the word, as coming from a Jew, any other meaning. That this is so, is also borne out by Tit. i. 14. Then as to the sense in which these men professed themselves teachers of the law. (1) Clearly not, as Baur, by their very antinomianism,—teachers of the law by setting it aside: this would at best be an unnatural sense to extract from the word, and it is not in any way countenanced by vv. 8 ff. as Baur thinks: see below. (2) Hardly, in the usual position of those Judaizing antagonists of St. Paul against whom he directs his arguments in Rom., Gal., and Col. Of these he would hardly have predicated ματαιολογία, nor would he have said μὴ νοοῦντες κ.τ.λ. Their offence was not either of these things, promulgating of idle fables, or ignorance of their subject, but one not even touched on here—an offence against the liberty of the Gospel, and its very existence, by re-introducing the law and its requirements. (3) We may see clearly by the data furnished in these pastoral Epistles, that it was with a different class of adversaries that the Apostle had in them to deal: with men who corrupted the material enactments of the moral law, and founded on Judaism not assertions of its obligation, but idle fables and allegories, letting in latitude of morals, and unholiness of life. It is against this abuse of the law that his arguments are directed: no formal question arises of the obligation of the law: these men struck, by their interpretation, at the root of all divine law itself, and therefore at that root itself does he meet and grapple with them. [See more in Prolegg.] Hence the following description), understanding neither (notice μήτε . . . . μήτε, making the two branches of the negation parallel, not progressively exclusive, as would be the case with μηδέ: they understand as little about the one as about the other) the things which they say (the actual diatribes which they themselves put forth, they do not understand: they are not honest men, speaking from conviction, and therefore lucidly: but men depraved in conscience [Tit. i. 14, 15], and putting forth things obscure to themselves, for other and selfish purposes), nor concerning what things they make their affirmations (nor those objective truths which properly belong to and underlie the matters with which they are thus tampering. This explanation of the sentence is called in question by De W., on the ground of the parallel expression in Tit. iii. 8, περὶ τούτων βούλομαί σε διαβεβαιοῦσθαι, in which he maintains that in διαβεβαιοῦσθαι περί τινος, περί τινος represents the mere thing asserted, not the objective matter concerning which the assertion is made,—and he therefore holds our sentence to be a mere tautology, —ἃ λέγουσιν answering exactly to περὶ τίνων διαβεβαιοῦνται. But in reply we may say, that there is not the slightest necessity for such a construction in the passage of Titus: see note there. And so Huth., Wies. Cf. Arrian. Epict. ii. 21, τί δ' ἐροῦσι καὶ περὶ τίνων ἢ πρὸς τίνας, καὶ τί ἔσται αὐτοῖς ἐκ τῶν λόγων τούτων, οὐδὲ καταβραχὺ πεφροντίκασι).

8 ff.] On the other hand the law has its right use:—not that to which they put it, but to testify against sins in practice: the catalogue of which seems to be here introduced, on account of the lax moral practice of these very men who were, or were in danger of, falling into them: not, as Baur imagines, because they were antinomians and set aside the (moral) law. They did not set it aside, but perverted it, and practised the very sins against which it was directed. Now (slight contrast to last verse, taking up the matter on general grounds) we know (see ref.: especially Rom. vii. 14: a thoroughly pauline expression) that the law is good (Rom. vii. 16: not only, as Thdrt., ὠφέλιμον, but in a far higher sense, as in Rom. vii. 12, 14: good abstractedly,—in accordance with the divine holiness and justice and truth; see ver. 18, ch. iv. 4) if a man (undoubtedly, in the first place, and mainly, a teacher: but not [as Bengel, De W., and Ellic.] to be confined to that meaning: all that is here said might apply just as well to a private Christian's thoughts and use of the law, as to the use of it by teachers themselves) use it lawfully (i. e. not, as most expositors, according to its intention as law [ἐάν τις ἀκολουθῇ αὐτοῦ τῷ σκόπῳ, Thdrt.], and as directed against the following sins in Christians: but clearly, from what follows, as De W. insists [see also Ellic.], and as Chrys. obscurely notices amongst other interpretations, νομίμως in the Gospel sense: i. e. as not binding on, nor relevant to Christian believers, but only a means of awakening repentance in the ungodly and profane. Chr.'s words are: τίς δὲ αὐτῷ νομίμως χρήσεται; ὁ εἰδὼς ὅτι οὐ δεῖται αὐτοῦ. His further references of νομίμως, 'as leading us to Christ,'—as 'inducing to piety not by its injunctions but by purer motives,' &c., are not in place here), being aware of this (belongs to τις, the teacher, or former of a judgment on the matter. εἰδώς implies both the possession and the application of the knowledge: 'heeding,' or 'being aware of'), that for a just man (in what sense? in the mere sense of 'virtuous,' 'righteous,' in the world's acceptation of the term?

in Chrys.'s third alternative, δίκαιον ἐνταῦθα καλεῖ τὸν κατωρθωκότα τὴν ἀρετήν? or as Thl., ὃς δι' αὐτὸ τὸ καλὸν τὴν τε πονηρίαν μισεῖ καὶ τὴν ἀρετὴν περιπτύσσεται? All such meanings are clearly excluded by ver. 11, which sets the whole sentence in the full light of Gospel doctrine, and necessitates a corresponding interpretation for every term used in it. δίκαιος therefore can only mean, righteous in the Christian sense, viz. by justifying faith and sanctification of the Spirit,—'justitia per sanctificationem,' as De Wette from Croc.,—one who is included in the actual righteousness of Christ by having put Him on, and so not forensically amenable to the law,—partaker of the inherent righteousness of Christ, inwrought by the Spirit, which unites him to Him, and so not morally needing it) the law (as before: not, 'a law' in general, as will be plain from the preceding remarks: nor does the omission of the article furnish any ground for such a rendering, in the presence of numerous instances where νόμος, anarthrous, is undeniably 'the Law' of Moses. Cf. Rom. ii. 25 bis; ib. 27; iii. 28, 31 bis; v. 20; vii. 1; x. 4: Gal. ii. 19; vi. 13,—to say nothing of the very many examples after prepositions. And of all parts of the N. T. anarthrousness need least surprise us in these Epistles, where many theological terms, having from constant use become technical words, have lost their articles. No such compromise as that of Bishop Middleton's, that the Mosaic law is comprehended in νόμος, will answer the requirements of the passage, which strictly deals with the Mosaic law and with nothing else: cf. on the catalogue of sins below. As De Wette remarks, this assertion = that in Rom. vi. 14, οὐ γάρ ἐστε ὑπὸ νόμον, ἀλλὰ ὑπὸ χάριν,—Gal. v. 18, εἰ πνεύματι ἄγεσθε, οὐκ ἐστὲ ὑπὸ νόμον) is not enacted (see very numerous instances of νόμος κεῖται in Wetst. The following are some: Eur. Ion 1046, 7, ὅταν δὲ πολεμίους δρᾶσαι κακῶς | θέλῃ τις, οὐδεὶς ἐμποδὼν κεῖται νόμος: Thucyd. ii. 37, νόμων . . . ὅσοι τε ἐπ' ὠφελείᾳ τῶν ἀδικουμένων κεῖνται: Galen. a. Julian. (Wetst.), νόμος οὐδεὶς κεῖται κατὰ τῶν ψευδῶς ἐγκαλούντων), but for lawless (reff.: not as in 1 Cor. ix. 21) and insubordinate (reff. Tit.: it very nearly = ἀπειθής, see Tit. i. 16; iii. 3,—this latter being more subjective, whereas ἀνυποτάκτ. points to the objective fact. This first pair of adjectives expresses opposition to the law, and so stands foremost as designating those for whom it is enacted), for impious and sinful (see especially ref. 1 Pet. This second pair expresses opposition to God, whose law it is—ἀσεβής being the man who does not reverence Him, ἁμαρτωλός the man who lives in defiance of Him), for unholy and profane (this last pair betokens separation and alienation from God and His law alike—those who have no share in His holiness, no relation to things sacred. "The ἀσεβής is unholy through his lack of reverence: the ἀνόσιος, through his lack of inner purity." Ellic.), for father-slayers and mother-slayers (or it may be taken in the wider sense, as Ellic., 'smiters of fathers:' so Hesych.: ὁ τὸν πατέρα ἀτιμάζων, τύπτων ἢ κτείνων. In Demosth. κατὰ Τιμοκράτους, p. 732. 14, the word is used of ἡ τῶν γονέων κάκωσις: cf. the law cited immediately after. And Plato, Phæd. 114 a, apparently uses it in the same wide sense, as he distinguishes πατράλοιαι and μητράλοιαι from ἀνδροφόνοι.

Hitherto the classes have been general, and [see above] arranged according to their opposition to the law, or to God, or to both: now he takes the second table of the decalogue and goes through its commandments, to the ninth inclusive, in order. πατρολῴαις καὶ μητρολῴαις are the transgressors of the fifth), for man-slayers (the sixth), for fornicators, for sodomites (sins of abomination against both sexes: the seventh), for slave-dealers (εἴρηται ἀνδραποδιστὴς παρὰ τὸ ἄνδρα ἀποδίδοσθαι, τουτέστι πωλεῖν, Schol.

Aristoph. Plut. ver. 521. The etymology is wrong, but the meaning as he states: cf. Xen. Mem. i. 2. 6, τοὺς λαμβάνοντας τῆς ὁμιλίας μισθὸν ἀνδραποδιστὰς ἑαυτῶν ἀπεκάλει: and Pollux, Onomast. iii. 78, ἀνδραποδιστής, ὁ τὸν ἐλεύθερον καταδουλούμενος ἢ τὸν ἀλλότριον οἰκέτην ὑπαγόμενος. [Ellic.] The Apostle puts the ἀνδραποδιστής as the most flagrant of all breakers of the eighth commandment. No theft of a man's goods can be compared with that most atrocious act, which steals the man himself, and robs him of that free will which is the first gift of his Creator. And of this crime all are guilty, who, whether directly or indirectly, are engaged in, or uphold from whatever pretence, the making or keeping of slaves), for liars, for perjurers (breakers of the ninth commandment. It is remarkable that he does not refer to that very commandment by which the law wrought on himself when he was alive without the law and sin was dead in him, viz. the tenth. Possibly this may be on account of its more spiritual nature, as he here wishes to bring out the grosser kinds of sin against which the moral law is pointedly enacted. The subsequent clause however seems as if he had it in his mind, and on that account added a concluding general and inclusive description), and if any thing else (he passes to sins themselves from the committers of sins) is opposed (reff.) to the healthy teaching (i. e. that moral teaching which is spiritually sound: = ἡ κατ' εὐσέβειαν διδασκαλία, ch. vi. 3, where it is parallel with ὑγιαίνοντες λόγοι οἱ τοῦ κυρ. ἡμ. Ἰησ. χριστοῦ. "The formula .... stands in clear and suggestive contrast to the sickly [ch. vi. 4] and morbid [2 Tim. ii. 17] teaching of Jewish gnosis." Ellic.)—according to (belongs, not to ἀντίκειται, which would make the following words a mere flat repetition of τῇ ὑγιαιν. διδασκ. [see ch. vi. 1, 3]—nor to διδασκαλίᾳ, as Thl.,—τῇ ὑγ. διδ. τῇ οὔσῃ κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγ.,—all. (see D[1] in digest),—for certainly in this case the specifying article must have been inserted,—and thus also the above repetition would occur; —but to the whole preceding sentence,—the entire exposition which he has been giving of the freedom of Christians from the moral law of the decalogue) the gospel of the glory (not, 'the glorious gospel,' see ref. 2 Cor.: all propriety and beauty of expression is here, as always, destroyed by this adjectival rendering. The gospel is 'the glad tidings of the glory of God,' as of Christ in l. c., inasmuch as it reveals to us God in all His glory, which glory would be here that of justifying the sinner without the law by His marvellous provision of redemption in Christ) of the blessed God (μακάριος, used of God, is called unpaulinis(d) by De Wette, occurring only in 1 Tim. [ref.]: in other words, one of those expressions which are peculiar to this later date and manner of the Apostle. On such, see Prolegomena), with which I (emphatic) was (aorist, indicating simply the past; pointing to the time during which this his commission had been growing into its fulness and importance) entrusted (not these τινές. ὃ ἐπιστεύθην is a construction only and characteristically pauline: see reff. The connexion with the following appears to be this: his mind is full of thankfulness at the thought of the commission which was thus entrusted to him: he does not regret the charge, but overflows with gratitude at the remembrance of Christ's grace to him, especially when he recollects also what he once was; how nearly approaching [for I would not exclude even that thought as having contributed to produce these strong expressions] some of those whom he has just mentioned. from the immediate subject, even more completely and suddenly than is his wont in his other writings, as again and again in these pastoral Epistles: shewing thereby, I believe, the tokens of advancing age, and of that faster hold of individual habits of thought and mannerisms, which characterizes the decline of life): (12 ff.] See summary, on ver. 3.) I give thanks (χάριν ἔχειν [reff.] is only used by the Apostle here and in 2 Tim. ref.) to Him who enabled me (viz. for His work: not only as Chr., in one of his finest passages,—φορτίον ὑπῆλθε μέγα, καὶ πολλῆς ἐδεῖτο τῆς ἄνωθεν ῥοπῆς. ἐννόησον γὰρ ὅσον ἦν πρὸς καθημερινὰς ὕβρεις, λοιδορίας, ἐπιβουλάς, κινδύνους, σκώμματα, ὀνείδη, θανάτους ἱστασθαι, καὶ μὴ ἀποκάμνειν, μηδὲ ὀλισθαίνειν, μηδὲ περιτρέπεσθαι, ἀλλὰ πάντοθεν βαλλόμενον μυρίοις καθ' ἑκάστην ἡμέραν τοῖς βέλεσιν, ἀτενὲς ἔχοντα τὸ ὅμμα ἑστάναι καὶ ἀκατάπληκτον,—see also Phil. iv. 13,—for he evidently is here treating of the divine enlightening and strengthening which he received for the ministry: cf. Acts ix. 22, where the same word occurs—a coincidence not to be overlooked. So Thdrt.: οὐ γὰρ οἰκείᾳ δυνάμει χρώμενος ταύτην τοῖς ἀνθρώποις προσφέρω τὴν διδασκαλίαν, ἀλλ' ὑπὸ τοῦ σεσωκότος ῥωννύμενός τε καὶ νευρούμενος), Christ Jesus our Lord (not to be taken as the dativus commodi after ἐνδυναμώσαντι, but in apposition with τῷ ἐνδυν.), that (not, 'because:' it is the main ground of the χάριν ἔχω: the specification of τῷ ἐνδυναμώσαντι introducing a subordinate ground) He accounted me faithful (cf. the strikingly similar expression, 1 Cor. vii. 25, γνώμην δίδωμι ὡς ἠλεημένος ὑπὸ κυρίου πιστὸς εἶναι:—He knew me to be such an one, in His foresight, as would prove faithful to the great trust), appointing me (cf. ref. 1 Thess. The expression is there used of that appointment of God in His sovereignty, by which our course is marked for a certain aim or end: and so it is best taken here,—not for the act of 'putting me into' the ministry, as E. V. But the present sense must be kept: not 'having appointed,' θέμενος constituting the external proof of πιστόν με ἡγήσ.) to the ministry (what sort of διακονία, is declared, Acts xx. 24, ἡ διακονία ἣν ἔλαβον παρὰ τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ, διαμαρτύρασθαι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς χάριτος τοῦ θεοῦ), 13.] (and all the more is he thankful, seeing that he was once a direct opponent of the Gospel) being before (the participle is slightly concessive: as Ellic. from Justiniani, 'cum tamen essem;' almost equivalent to 'though I was') a blasphemer (see Acts xxvi. 9, 11) and persecutor and insulter (one who added insult to persecution. See on ὑβριστής, Trench, N. T. Synonyms, p. 112 f. The facts which justified the use of such a term were known to St. Paul's conscience: we might well infer them, from his own confessions in Acts xxii. 4, 19, and xxvi. 9—12. He describes himself as περισσῶς ἐμμαινόμενος αὐτοῖς): howbeit ("ἀλλά has here its full and proper seclusive ['aliud jam hoc esse, de quo sumus dicturi,' Klotz., Devar. ii. p. 2], and thence often antithetical force. Rev. xxi. 5, οὗτοι οἱ λόγοι ἀληθινοὶ καὶ πιστοί εἰσιν: similarly xxii. 6. The formula πιστὸς ὁ λόγος is peculiar to the pastoral Epistles, and characteristic I believe of their later age, when certain sayings had taken their place as Christian axioms, and were thus designated) is the saying, and worthy of all (all possible, i. e. universal) reception (see reff. Polyb., and Wetst. and Kypke, h. l. A word which, with its adjective ἀποδεκτός [ch. ii. 3: v. 4], is confined to these Epistles. We have the verb, οἱ μὲν οὖν ἀποδεξάμενοι τὸν λόγον αὐτοῦ ἐβαπτίσθησαν, Acts ii. 41), that Christ Jesus came into the world (an expression otherwise found only in St. John. But in the two reff. in Matt. and Luke, we have the ἦλθεν) to save sinners (to be taken in the most general sense, not limited in any way), of whom (sinners; not, as Wegscheider, σωζομένων or σεσωσμένων: the aim and extent of the Lord's mercy intensifies the feeling of his own especial unworthiness) I am (not, 'was') chief (not, 'one of the chief,' as Flatt,—nor does πρῶτος refer to time, which would not be the fact [see below]: the expression is one of the deepest humility: αὐτὸν ὑπερβαίνει τῆς ταπεινοφροσύνης ὅρον, says Thdrt.: and indeed it is so, cf. Phil. iii. 6; 1 Cor. xv. 9; Acts xxiii. 1; xxiv. 16; but deep humility ever does so: it is but another form of ἐμοὶ τῷ ἁμαρτωλῷ, Luke xviii. 13: other men's crimes seem to sink into nothing in comparison, and a man's own to be the chief and only ones in his sight): 16.] howbeit (as E. V.: "not resumptive, but as in ver. 13, seclusive and antithetical, marking the contrast between the Apostle's own judgment on himself, and the mercy which God was pleased to shew him." Ellic.) for this purpose I had mercy shewn me, that in me (as an example; "in my case:" see reff. and cf. εἰς ὑποτύπωσιν below) first (it can hardly be denied that in πρώτῳ here the senses of 'chief' and 'first' are combined. This latter seems to be necessitated by μελλόντων below. Though he was not in time 'the first of sinners,' yet he was the first as well as the most notable example of such marked long-suffering, held up for the encouragement of the church) Christ Jesus might shew forth (dynamic middle: see note on ref. Eph., and Ellicott there) the whole of His (not merely 'all' [all possible, πᾶσαν]: nor 'all His' [Conyb., Ellic.: πᾶσαν τὴν . . . .], but 'the whole,' 'the whole mass of μακροθυμία, of which I was an example;' ὁ ἅπας seems to be found here only. If the rec. reading be in question, in all other cases where ὁ πᾶς occurs with a substantive in the N. T., it is one which admits of partition, and may therefore be rendered by 'all the' or 'the whole:' e. g. Acts xx. 18, πῶς μεθ' ὑμῶν τὸν πάντα χρόνον ἐγενόμην: see also ref. Wetst. has two examples from Polyb. in which ὁ πᾶς has the meaning of 'the utmost:' τῆς πάσης ἀλογιστίας ἐστὶ σημεῖον,—and τῆς ἀπάσης (as here) ἀτοπίας εἶναι σημεῖον) long-suffering (not, generosity, magnanimity: nor is the idea of long-suffering here irrelevant, as some have said: Christ's mercy gave him all that time for repentance, during which he was persecuting and opposing Him, — and therefore it was his long-suffering which was so wonderful), for an example (cf. 2 Pet. ii. 6, ὑπόδειγμα μελλόντων ἀσεβεῖν τεθεικώς. Wetst. has shewn by very copious extracts, that ὑποτύπωσις is used by later writers, beginning with Aristotle, for a sketch, an outline, afterwards to be filled up. This indeed the recorded history of Paul would be,—the filling up taking place in each man's own case: see ref. 2 Tim., note. Or the meaning 'sample,' 'ensample,' as in 2 Tim. i. 13, will suit equally well) of (to, see Ellicott's note, and Donaldson, Gr. Gr. § 450) those who should (the time of μελλόντων is not the time of writing the Epistles, but that of the mercy being shewn: so that we must not say "who shall," but "who should") believe on Him (the unusual ἐπ' αὐτῷ is easily accounted for, from its occurrence in so very common a quotation as πᾶς ὁ πιστεύων ἐπ' αὐτῷ οὐ καταισχυνθήσεται, see reff. The propriety of the expression here is, that it gives more emphatically the ground of the πιστεύειν—brings out more the reliance implied in it—almost q. d., 'to rely on Him for eternal life.' Ellicott has, in his note here, given a full and good classification of the constructions of πιστεύω in the N. T.) to (belongs to πιστεύειν [see above] as its aim and end [cf. Heb. x. 39]: not to ὑποτύπωσιν, as Bengel suggests) life eternal: 17.] but (δέ takes the thought entirely off from himself and every thing else, and makes the following sentence exclusive as applied to God. 'Ex sensu gratiæ fluit doxologia.' Bengel. Compare by all means the very similar doxology, Rom. xvi. 25 ff.: and see, on their similarity, the inferences in the Prolegomena, ch. vii. § i. 33, and note) to the King (this name, as applied to God, is found, in N. T., only in Matt. v. 35 [not xxv. 34 ff.] and our ch. vi. 15. See below) of the ages (i. e. of eternity: cf. the reff. Tobit, where the same expression occurs, and Sir.—θεὸς τῶν αἰώνων: also Ps. cxliv. 13, ἡ βασιλεία σου βασιλεία πάντων τῶν αἰώνων,—מַלְכוּת כָּל־עֹלָמִים. Comparing these with the well-known εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, and the like, it is far more likely that οἱ αἰῶνες here should mean eternity, than the ages of this world, as many have understood it. The doxology is to the Father, not to the Trinity [Thdrt.], nor to the Son [Calov., al.]: cf. ἀοράτῳ), incorruptible (in ref. Rom. only, used of God), invisible (reff.: see also ch. vi. 16: John i. 18. Beware of taking ἀφθάρτῳ, ἀοράτῳ with θεῷ, as recommended by Bishop Middleton, on the ground of the articles being wanting before these adjectives. It is obvious that no such consideration is of any weight in a passage like the present. The abstract adjectives of attribute are used almost as substantives, and stand by themselves, referring not to βασιλεῖ immediately, but to Him of whom βασιλεύς is a title, as well as they: q. d. 'to Him who is the King of the ages, the Incorruptible, the Invisible, . . .'), the only God (σοφῷ has apparently come from the doxology at the end of Romans, where it is most appropriate), be honour and glory to the ages of the ages (the periods which are made up of αἰῶνες, as these last are of years,—as years are of days: see note, Eph. iii. 21: and Ellic. on Gal. i. 5), Amen.

18 ff.] He now returns to the matter which he dropped in ver. 3, not indeed formally, so as to supply the apodosis there neglected, but virtually: the παραγγελία not being the one there hinted at, for that was one not given to Timotheus, but to be given by him. Nor is it that in ver. 5, for that is introduced as regarding a matter quite different from the present—viz. the aberrations of the false teachers, who do not here appear till the exhortation to Timotheus is over. What this command is, is plain from the following. This command I commit (as a deposit, to be faithfully guarded and kept: see ref. 2 Tim. and ch. vi. 20: Herod. vi. 86, beginning) to thee, son Timotheus (see on ver. 2), according to (in pursuance of: these words belong to παρατίθεμαί σοι, not as Œc., Flatt, al., to ἵνα στρατεύῃ below) the former prophecies concerning thee (the directions, or, prophecies properly so called, of the Holy Spirit, which were spoken concerning Timotheus at his first conversion, or at his admission [cf. ch. iv. 14] into the ministry, by the προφῆται in the church. We have instances of such prophetic intimations in Acts xiii. 1, 2,—[xi. 28,]—xxi. 10, 11. By such intimations, spoken perhaps by Silas, who was with him, and who was a προφήτης [Acts xv. 32], may St. Paul have been first induced to take Timotheus to him as a companion, Acts xvi. 3. All other meanings, which it has been attempted to give to προφητείας, are unwarranted, and beside the purpose here: as e. g. 'the good hopes conceived of thee,' Heinrichs. The ἐπὶ σέ belongs to προφητείας, the preposition of motion being easily accounted for by the reference to a subject implied in the word), that thou mayest (purpose, and at the same time purport, of the παραγγελία: cf. note, 1 Cor. xiv. 13; and Ellicott on Eph. i. 16) war (στρατεύεσθαι, of the whole business of the employed soldier; not merely of fighting, properly so called) in them (not as De W. 'by virtue of them,' but as Mack, Matth., and Wiesinger, 'in,' as clad with them, as if they were his defence and confirmation. This is not zu [illegible], as Huther, seeing that the whole expression is figurative) the good warfare (not, as Conyb., 'fight the good fight,'—by which same words he renders the very different expression in 2 Tim. iv. 7, τὸν ἀγῶνα τὸν καλὸν ἠγώνισμαι. It is the whole campaign, not the fight alone, which is here spoken of), holding fast (more than 'having;' but we must hardly, as Matth., carry on the metaphor and think of the shield of faith Eph. vi. 16, such continuation being rendered unlikely by the unmetaphorical character of τὴν ἀγαθὴν συνείδησιν) faith (subjective: cf. περὶ τὴν πίστιν below) and good conscience (cf. ver. 5),—which (latter, viz. good conscience—not, both) some having thrust from them (there is something in the word implying the violence of the act required, and the importunity of conscience, reluctant to be so extruded. So Bengel: 'recedit invita: semper dicit, noli me lædere') made shipwreck (the similitude is so common a one, that it is hardly necessary to extend the figure of a shipwreck beyond the word itself, nor to find in ἀπωσάμενοι allusions to a rudder, anchor, &c. See examples in Wetst.) concerning (see reff., and cf. Acts xix. 25, οἱ περὶ τὰ τοιαῦτα ἐργάται, also Luke x. 40. The same is elsewhere expressed by ἐν,—so Diog. Laërt. v. 2. 14, ἐν τοῖς ἰδίοις μάλα ναναγηκώς,—Plut. Symp. i. 4, ἐν οἷς τὰ πλεῖστα ναυαγεῖ συμπόσια. See other examples in Kypke: Winer, edn. 6, § 49. i.: and Ellicott's note here) the faith (objective): of whom (genitive partitive: among whom) is Hymenæus (there is a Hymenæus mentioned 2 Tim. ii. 17, in conjunction with Philetus, as an heretical teacher. There is no reason to distinguish him from this one: nor any difficulty occasioned [De W.] by the fact of his being here παραδοθεὶς τῷ σατανᾷ, and there mentioned as overthrowing the faith of many. He would probably go on with his evil teaching in spite of the Apostle's sentence, which could carry weight with those only who were sound in the faith) and Alexander (in all probability identical with Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ χαλκεύς, 2 Tim. iv. 14. There is nothing against it in what is there said of him [against De Wette]. He appears there to have been an adversary of the Apostle, who had withstood and injured him at his late visit to Ephesus: but there is no reason why he should not have been still under this sentence at that time): whom I delivered over to Satan (there does not seem to be, as almost always taken for granted, any necessary assertion of excommunication properly so called. The delivering to Satan, as in 1 Cor. v. 5, seems to have been an apostolic act, for the purpose of active punishment, in order to correction. It might or might not be accompanied by extrusion from the church: it appears to have been thus accompanied in 1 Cor. v. 5:—but the two must not be supposed identical. The upholders of such identity allege the fact of Satan's empire being conceived as including all outside the church [Acts xxvi. 18 al.]: but such expressions are too vague to be adduced as applying to a direct assertion like this. Satan, the adversary, is evidently regarded as the buffeter and tormentor, cf. 2 Cor. xii. 7—ever ready, unless his hand were held, to distress and afflict God's people,—and ready therefore, when thus let loose by one having power over him, to execute punishment with all his malignity. Observe that the verb is not perfect but aorist. He did this when he was last at Ephesus. On the ecclesiastical questions here involved, Ellic. has, as usual, some very useful references) that they may be disciplined (the subj. after the aorist indicates that the effect of what was done still abides; the sentence was not yet taken off, nor the παίδευσις at an end. παιδεύω, as in reff., to instruct by punishment, to discipline) not to blaspheme (God, or Christ, whose holy name was brought to shame by these men associating it with unholy and unclean doctrines).

CH. II. 1—15.] General regulations respecting public intercessory prayers for all men (1—4): from which he digresses into a proof of the universality of the gospel (4—7)—then returns to the part to be taken by the male sex in public prayer (8): which leads him to treat of the proper place and subjection of women (9—15). I exhort then ('οὖν is without any logical connexion,' says De W. Certainly,—with what immediately precedes; but the account to be given of it is, that it takes up the general subject of the Epistle, q. d., 'what I have then to say to thee by way of command and regulation, is this:' see 2 Tim. ii. 1. "The particle οὖν has its proper collective force ['ad ea, quæ antea posita sunt, lectorem revocat.' Klotz.]: 'continuation and retrospect,' Donaldson, Gr. § 604." Ellic.), first of all (to be joined with παρακαλῶ, not, as Chr. [τί δ' ἐστὶ τὸ πρῶτον πάντων; τοῦτ' ἔστιν, ἐν τῇ λατρείᾳ τῇ καθημερινῇ], Thl., Calv., Est., Bengel, Conyb., E. V., and Luther, with ποιεῖσθαι, in which case, besides other objections, the verb would certainly have followed all the substantives, and probably would have taken πρῶτον πάντων with it. It is, in order and importance, his first exhortation) to make (cf. ref. Phil. It has been usual to take ποιεῖσθαι passive: and most Commentators pass over the word without remark. In such a case, the appeal must be to our sense of the propriety of the middle or passive meaning, according to the arrangement of the words, and spirit of the sentence. And thus I think we shall decide for the middle. In the prominent position of ποιεῖσθαι, if it were passive, and consequently objective in meaning, 'that prayer, &c. be made,' it can hardly be passed over without an emphasis, which here it manifestly cannot have. If on the other hand it is middle, it is subjective, belonging to the person or persons who are implied in παρακαλῶ: and thus serves only as a word of passage to the more important substantives which follow. And in this way the Greek fathers themselves took it: e. g. Chrys.—πῶς ὑπὲρ πάντὸς τοῦ κόσμου, καὶ βασιλέων, κ.τ.λ. ποιούμεθα τὴν δέησιν) supplications, prayers, intercessions (the two former words, δεήσεις and προσευχαί, are perhaps best distinguished as in Eph. vi. 18, by taking προσευχή for prayer in general, δέησις for supplication or petition, the special content of any particular prayer. See Ellicott's note cited there, and cf. ref. Phil. ἐντεύξεις, judging from the cognate verbs ἐντυγχάνω, and ὑπερεντυγχάνω (reff. Rom.), should be marked with a reference to 'request concerning others,' i. e. intercessory prayer. [Ellic. denies this primary reference, supporting his view by ch. iv. 5, where, he says, such a meaning would be inappropriate. But is not the meaning in that very place most appropriate? It is not there intercession for a person: but it is by ἐντευξις, prayer on its behalf and over it, that πᾶν κτίσμα is hallowed. The meaning in Polybius, copiously illustrated by Raphel, an interview or appointed meeting, compellatio aliqua de re, would in the N. T., where the word and its cognates are always used in reference to prayer, for persons or things, necessarily shade off into that of pleading or intercession.] Very various and minute distinctions between the three have been imagined:—e. g. Theodoret:—δέησις μέν ἐστιν ὑπὲρ ἀπαλλαγῆς τινῶν λυπηρῶν ἱκετεία προσφερομένη· προσευχὴ δέ, αἴτησις ἀγαθῶν· ἔντευξις δέ, κατηγορία τῶν ἀδικούντων:—Origen, περὶ εὐχῆς, § 14 [not 44, as in Wetst. and Huther], vol. i. p. 220,—ἡγοῦμαι τοίνυν, δέησιν μὲν εἶναι τὴν ἐλλείποντός τινι μεθ' ἱκετείας περὶ τοῦ ἐκείνου τυχεῖν ἀναπεμπομένην εὐχήν· τὴν δὲ προσευχήν, τὴν μετὰ δοξολογίας περὶ μειζόνων μεγαλοφυέστερον ἀναπεμπομένην ὑπό τοῦ ἔντευξιν δέ, τὴν ὑπὸ παῤῥησίαν τινὰ πλείονα ἐχοντος περί τινων ἀξίωσιν πρὸς θεόν κ.τ.λ. The most extraordinary of all is Aug.'s view, that the four words refer to the liturgical form of administration of the Holy Communion—δεήσεις being "precationes . . . quas facimus in celebratione sacramentorum antequam illud quod est in Domini mensa incipiat benedici:—orationes [προσευχαί], cum benedicitur et sanctificatur: . . . interpellationes vel . . . postulationes [ἐντεύξεις], fiunt cum populus benedicitur: . . . . quibus peractis, et participato tanto sacramento, εὐχαριστία, gratiarum actio, cuncta concludit." Ep. cxlix. [lix.] 16, vol. ii. p. 636 f.), thanksgivings, for all men (this gives the intercessory character to all that have preceded. On the wideness of Christian benevolence here inculcated, see the argument below, and Tit. iii. 2); for (i. e. 'especially for'—this one particular class being mentioned and no other) kings (see Tit. iii. 1; Rom. xiii. 1 ff.; 1 Pet. ii. 13. It was especially important that the Christians should include earthly powers in their formal public prayers, both on account of the object to be gained by such prayer [see next clause], and as an effectual answer to those adversaries who accused them of rebellious tendencies. Jos. [B. J. ii. 10. 4] gives the Jews' answer to Petronius, Ἰουδαῖοι περὶ μὲν Καίσαρος καὶ τοῦ δήμου τῶν Ῥωμαίων ὅτι τῆς ἡμέρας θύειν ἔφασαν, and afterwards [ib. 17. 2], he ascribes the origin of the war to their refusing, at the instigation of Eleazar, to continue the sacrifices offered on behalf of their Gentile rulers. See Wetst., who gives other examples: and compare the ancient liturgies—e. g. the bidding prayers, Bingham, book xv. 1. 2: the consecration prayer, ib. 3. 1, and on the general practice, ib. 3. 14. 'Kings' must be taken generally, as it is indeed generalized in the following words: not understood to mean 'Cæsar and his assessors in the supreme power,' as Baur, who deduces thence an argument that the Epistle was written under the Antonines, when such an association was usual) and all that are in eminence (not absolutely in authority, though the context, no less than common sense, shews that it would be so. Cf. Polyb. v. 41. 3,—τοῖς ἐν ὑπεροχαῖς οὖσι περὶ τὴν αὐλήν. He, as well as Josephus [e. g. Antt. vi. 4. 3], uses ὑπεροχαί absolutely for authorities: see Schweigh. Lex. Polyb. Thdrt. gives a curious reason for the addition of these words: μάλα σοφῶς τὸ κοινὸν τῶν ἀνθρώπων προστέθεικεν, ἵνα μή τις κολα- κείαν νομίσῃ τὴν ὑπὲρ τῶν βασιλέων εὐχήν. The succeeding clause furnishes reason enough: the security of Christians would often be more dependent on inferior officers than even on kings themselves), that (aim of the prayer—not, as Heydenreich and Matthies,—subjective, that by such prayer Christian men's minds may be tranquillized and disposed to obey,—but objective, that we may obtain the blessing mentioned, by God's influencing the hearts of our rulers: or as Chrys., that we may be in security by their being preserved in safety) we may pass (more than 'lead' [ἄγειν]: it includes the whole of the period spoken of:—thus Aristoph. Vesp. 1006 [see also Eccles. 240], ὅστ' ἡδέως διάγειν σε τὸν λοιπὸν χρόνον,—Soph. Œd. Col. 1615, τὸ λοιπὸν ἥδη τὸν βίον διάξετον: see numerous other examples in Wetst.) a quiet (the adjective ἥρεμος is a late word, formed on the classical adverb ἠρέμα, the proper adjective of which is ἠρεμαῖος, used by Plat. Rep. p. 307 a, Legg. 734 a &c. Cf. Palm and Rost's Lex. sub voce) and tranquil life (ἐκείνων γὰρ πρυτανευόντων εἰρήνην, μεταλαγχάνομεν καὶ ὑμεῖς τῆς γαλήνης, καὶ ἐν ἡσυχίᾳ τῆς εὐσεβείας ἐκπληροῦμεν τοὺς νόμους, Thdrt. On the distinction between ἥρεμος, tranquil from trouble without, and ἡσύχιος, from trouble within, see Ellicott's note) in all ('possible,' 'requisite') piety (I prefer this rendering to 'godliness,' as more literal, and because I would reserve that word as the proper one for θεοσέβεια: see ver. 10 below. εὐσέβεια is one of the terms peculiar in this meaning to the pastoral Epistles, the second Epistle of Peter [reff.], and Peter's speech in Acts iii. 12. See Prolegg., and note on Acts iii. 12) and gravity (so Conyb.: and it seems best to express the meaning. For as Chrys.,—εἰ γὰρ μὴ ἐσώζοντο, μηδὲ εὐδοκίμουν ἐν τοῖς πολέμοις, ἀνάγκη καὶ τὰ ἡμέτερα ἐν ταραχαῖς εἶναι καὶ θορύβοις. ἢ γὰρ καὶ αὐτοὺς ἡμᾶς στρατεύεσθαι δεῖ, κατασκοπέντων ἐκείνων ἢ φεύγειν πανταχοῦ καὶ πλανᾶσθαι: and thus the gravity and decorum of the Christian life would be broken up). 3, 4.] For this (viz. ποιεῖσθαι δεήσεις κ.τ.λ. ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀνθρώπων, &c. ver. 1: what has followed since being merely the continuation of this) is good and acceptable (both adjectives are to be taken with ἐνώπιον, &c., not as De W. and Ellic. 'καλόν, good in and of itself:' compare ref. 2 Cor., καλὰ οὐ μόνον ἐνώπιον κυρίου, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐνώπιον ἀνθρώπων. I still hold, against Ellicott, to this connexion, shrinking from the crude and ill-balanced form of the sentence which the other would bring in. ἀποδεκτόν, peculiar [cf. ἀποδοχή, ch. i. 15] to these Epistles. See 2 Cor. vi. 2) in the sight of our Saviour (a title manifestly chosen as belonging to the matter in hand, cf. next verse. On it, see ch. i. 1) God who (i. e. seeing that He) willeth all men to be saved (see ch. iv. 10: Tit. ii. 11. πάντας ἀνθρώπους is repeated from verse 1. Chrys.'s comment is very noble: μιμοῦ τὸν θεόν. εἰ πάντας ἀνθρώπους θέλει σωθῆναι, εἰκότως ὑπὲρ ἁπάντων δεῖ εὔχεσθαι. εἰ πάντας αὐτὸς ἤθελε σωθῆναι, θέλε καὶ σύ. εἰ δὲ θέλεις, εὔχου. τῶν γὰρ τοιούτων ἐστὶ τὸ εὔχεσθαι. Huther rightly remarks, that Mosheim's view, "nisi pax in orbe terrarum vigeat, fieri nullo modo posse ut voluntati divinæ quæ omnium hominum salutem cupit, satisfiat," destroys the true context and train of thought: see more below. Wiesinger remarks σωθῆναι,—not σῶσαι, as in Tit. iii. 5, as adapted to the mediatorial effect of prayer, not direct divine agency: but we may go yet further, and say that by θέλει πάντας ἀνθρ. σωθῆναι is expressed human acceptance of offered salvation, on which even God's predestination is contingent. θέλει σῶσαι πάντας could not have been said: if so, He would have saved all, in matter of fact. See the remarks, and references to English and other divines, in Ellicott's note. Calvin most unworthily shuffles out of the decisive testimony borne by this passage to universal redemption. As if kings and all in eminence were not in each case individual men), and to come to (the) certain knowledge (on ἐπίγνωσις, fuller and more assured than γνῶσις, see 1 Cor. xiii. 12: Col. i. 11; ii. 2) of (the) truth (the expression is a favourite one in these Epistles, see reff. This realization of the truth is in fact identical with σωτηρία, not only [Huther] as that σωτηρία is a rescue from life in untruth, but in its deepest and widest sense of salvation, here and hereafter: cf. John xvii. 3, αὕτη ἐστὶν ἡ αἰώνιος ζωή, ἵνα γινώσκωσίν σε τὸν μόνον ἀληθινὸν θεόν . . . . . and ib. 17, ἁγίασον αὐτοὺς ἐν τῇ ἀληθείᾳ).

5.] For (farther grounding of the acceptableness of prayer for all men,—in the UNITY of God. But this verse is joined by the γάρ directly to the preceding, not to ver. 1. Chrys. gives it rightly—δεικνὺς ὅτι σωθῆναι θέλει πάντας) there is ONE God (He is ONE in essence and one in purpose—not of different minds to different nations or individuals, but of one mind towards all. Similarly Rom. iii. 30, and, which is important for the understanding of that difficult passage, Gal. iii. 20. The double reference, to the unity in essence and unity of purpose, for which I have contended there, is plain and unmistakeable here), ONE Mediator (see reff. It occurs, besides the places in the Gal., only in the Epistle to the Heb., viii. 6; ix. 15; xii. 24. There is no necessity that the idea should, as De W. and Schleierm., be connected with that of a mutual covenant, and so be here far-fetched as regards the context [borrowed from the places in the Heb., according to De W.]: the word is used as standing alone, and representing the fact of Christ Jesus being the only go-between, in whatever sense) also (the εἷς prefixed to the καί for emphasis) of (between) God and men (if one only goes between, then that One must be for all), (the) man Christ Jesus (why ἄνθρωπος? Thdrt. answers, ἄνθρωπον δὲ τὸν χριστὸν ὠνόμασεν, ἐπειδὴ μεσίτην ἐκάλεσεν ἐνανθρωπήσας γὰρ ἐμεσίτευσεν: and so most Commentators. But it is not here the Apostle's object, to set forth the nature of Christ's mediation as regards its being brought about;—only as regards its unity and universality for mankind. And for this latter reason he calls him here by this name MAN,—that He gathered up all our human nature into Himself, becoming its second Head. So that the ἄνθρωπος in fact carries with it the very strongest proof of that which he is maintaining. Notice it is not ὁ ἄνθρωπος, though we are obliged inaccurately thus to express it: in personality, our Lord was not a man, but in nature He was man. It might be rendered, "Christ Jesus, Himself man."

I should object, as against Ellicott, to introduce at all the indefinite article: not individual but generic humanity is predicated: and "a man" unavoidably conveys the idea of human individuality. It is singularly unfortunate that Ellic. should have referred to Augustine, Serm. xxvi. as cited by Wordsw., in corroboration of the rendering "a man:" the Latin homo being of course as incapable of deciding this as the Greek ἄνθρωπος, and "a man" being only Dr. Wordsworth's translation of it. Nay, the whole tenor of the passage of Augustine (ed. Migne, vol. v. p. 174) precludes such a rendering. The stupidity of such writers as Baur and the Socinians, who regard such an expression as against the deity of Christ, is beyond all power of mine to characterize. In the face of εἷς θεός, εἷς μεσίτης θεοῦ καὶ ἀνθρώπων, to maintain gravely such a position, shews utter blindness from party bias even to the plainest thoughts expressed in the plainest words), who gave himself (reff., especially Tit.) a ransom (ἀντί-, as in ἀντιμισθία, Rom. i. 27; 2 Cor. vi. 13: ἀντάλλαγμα, Matt. xvi. 26, expresses more distinctly the reciprocity which is already implied in the simple word in each case. That the main fact alluded to here is the death of Christ, we know: but it is not brought into prominence, being included in, and superseded by the far greater and more comprehensive fact, that He gave HIMSELF, in all that He undertook for our redemption: see Phil. ii. 5—8) on behalf of all (not of a portion of mankind, but of all men; the point of ver. 1, ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀνθρώπων), —the testimony ('that which was [to be] testified:' so St. John frequently uses μαρτυρία, 1 John v. 9—11: "an accusative in apposition with the preceding sentence," Ellicott. This oneness of the Mediator, involving in itself the universality of Redemption, was the great subject of Christian testimony: see below) in its own seasons (reff.; in the times which God had appointed for it. Those who hold the spuriousness of our Epistle regard this returning to himself and his own case on the part of the writer as an evidence of his being one who was acting the part of Paul. So Schleierm. and De W. They have so far truth on their side, that we must recognize here a characteristic increase of the frequency of these personal vindications on the part of the Apostle, as we so often have occasion to remark during these Epistles:—the disposition of one who had been long opposed and worried by adversaries to recur continually to his own claims, the assertion of which had now become with him almost, so to speak, a matter of stock-phrases. Still, the propriety of the assertion here is evident: it is only in the manner of it that the above habit is discernible. See more on this in the Prolegomena. The same phrase occurs verbatim in ref. 2 Tim.),—I speak the truth, I lie not—(in spite of all that Huther and Wiesinger say of the evident appropriateness of this solemn asseveration here, I own I am unable to regard it as any more than a strong and interesting proof of the growth of a habit in the Apostle's mind, which we already trace in 2 Cor. xi. 31, Rom. ix. 1, till he came to use the phrase with less force and relevance than he had once done. Nothing can be more natural than that one whose life was spent in strong conflict and assertion of his Apostleship, should repeat the fervour of his usual asseveration, even when the occasion of that fervour had passed away. Nor can I consent to abandon such a view because it is designated "questionable and precarious" by Ellic., who is too apt in cases of difficulty, to evade the real conflict of decision by strong terms of this kind)—a teacher of the Gentiles (it was especially in this latter fact that the ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀνθρώπων found its justification. The historical proof of his constitution as a teacher of the Gentiles is to be found in Acts ix. 15, xxii. 21, xxvi. 17; but especially in Gal. ii. 9) in (the) faith and (the) truth (do these words refer subjectively to his own conduct in teaching the Gentiles, or objectively to that in which he was to instruct them? The former view is taken by Thdrt. and most Commentators: μετὰ τῆς προσηκούσης πίστεως καὶ ἀληθείας τοῦτο πᾶσι προσφέρω: the latter by Heydenreich, al. Huther [also Ellic.] takes the words as signifying the sphere in which he was appointed to fulfil his office of διδ. ἐθνῶν,—πίστις being faith, the subjective relation, and ἀλήθεια the truth, the objective good which is appropriated by faith: Wiesinger, as meaning that he is, in the right faith and in the truth, the διδ. ἐθν. Bengel regards them merely as another asseveration belonging to the assertion that he is διδ. ἐθν.,—'in faith and truth I say it.' This latter at once discommends itself, from its exceeding flatness: though Chrys. also seems to have held it—ἐν πίστει πάλιν· ἀλλὰ μὴ νομίσῃς ἐπειδὴ ἐν πίστει ἤκουσας, ὅτι ἁπλῶς τὸ πρᾶγμά ἐστι. καὶ γὰρ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ φησίν. εἰ δὲ ἀλήθεια, οὐκ ἔστι ψεῦδος. into account the usage of ἀλήθεια above, ver. 4, in a very similar reference, when it was to be matter of teaching to all men. There it undoubtedly is, though anarthrous, the truth of God. I would therefore take it similarly here, as Wiesinger, —the sphere in which both his teaching and their learning was to be employed—the truth of the Gospel. Then, if so, it is surely harsh to make ἐν πίστει subjective, especially as the ἐν is not repeated before ἀληθείᾳ. It too will most properly be objective,—and likewise regard that in which, as an element or sphere, he was to teach and they to learn: the faith. This ἐν π. κ. ἀλ. will be, not the object of διδάσκαλ., but the sphere or element in which he is the διδάσκαλος). 8.] See summary at beginning of chapter. I will then ("in βούλομαι the active wish is implied: it is no mere willingness or acquiescence," Ellic. On the distinction between βούλομαι and θέλω, see Donaldson, Cratyl. § 463, p. 650 f. ed. 2: and Ellic. on ch. v. 14) that the men (the E. V. by omitting the article, has entirely obscured this passage for its English readers, not one in a hundred of whom ever dream of a distinction of the sexes being here intended. But again the position of τους ἄνδρας forbids us from supposing that such distinction was the Apostle's main object in this verse. Had it been so, we should have read τους ἄνδρας προσεύχεσθαι. As it now stands, the stress is on προσεύχεσθαι, and τους ἄνδρας is taken for granted. Thus the main subject of ver. 1 is carried on, the duty of PRAYER, in general—not [as Schleierm. objects] one portion merely of it, the allotting it to its proper offerers) pray in every place (these words ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ regard the general duty of praying, not the particular detail implied in τους ἄνδρας: still less are we to join τους ἄνδρας [τους] ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ. It is a local command respecting prayer, answering to the temporal command ἀδιαλείπτως προσεύχεσθε, 1 Thess. v. 17. It is far-fetched and irrelevant to the context to find in the words, as Chr., Thdrt., al., Pel., Erasm., Calv., Beza, Grot., al., the Christian's freedom from prescription of place for prayer—πρὸς τὴν νομικὴν διαγόρευσιν τέθεικεν· οὐ γὰρ [vulgo δὲ γὰρ] τοῖς Ἱεροσολύμοις περιέγραψε τὴν λατρείαν, Thdrt.: and Chrys., ὅπερ τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις θέμις οὐκ ἦν), lifting up holy hands (see LXX, ref. Ps.: also Ps. xxvii. 2, xliii. 20; Clem. Rom. Ep. 1 to Corinthians, ch. 29, p. 269: προσελθωμεν αὐτῷ ἐν ὁσιότητι ψυχῆς, ἁγνὰς καὶ ἀμιάντους χεῖρας αἴροντες πρὸς αὐτόν. These two passages, as Huther observes, testify to the practice in the Christian church. The form ὁσίους with a feminine is unusual: but we must not, as Winer suggests [edn. 6, § 11. 1], join it to ἐπαίροντας. His own instances, στρατιὰ οὐράνιος, Luke ii. 13,—ἵρις ὅμοιος λίθῳ, Rev. iv. 3, furnish some precedent: and the fact that the ending -ιος is common to all three establishes an analogy. "Those hands are holy, which have not surrendered themselves as instruments of evil desire: the contrary are βέβηλοι χεῖρες, 2 Macc. v. 16: compare, for the expression, Job xvii. 9, Ps. xxiii. 4, and in the N. T., especially James iv. 8, καθαρίσατε χεῖρας καὶ ἁγνίσατε καρδίας." Huther. See classical passages in Wetst.) without (separate from, "putting away," as Conyb.) wrath and disputation (i. e. in tranquillity and mutual peace, so literally, sine disceptatione, as vulg., see note on ref. Phil. Ellic.'s objection, that we should thus import from the context a meaning unconfirmed by good lexical authority, is fully met by the unquestionable usage of the verb διαλογίζω in the N. T. for to dispute. At the same time, seeing that the matter treated of is prayer, where disputing hardly seems in place, perhaps doubting is the better sense; which, after all, is a disputation within one's self). 9.] So also (ὡσαύτως, by the parallel passage, Tit. ii. 3, seems to be little more than a copula, not necessarily to refer to the matter which has been last under treatment) I will that women (without the article, the reference to τοὺς ἄνδρας above is not so pointed: i. e. we need not imagine that the reference is necessarily to the same matter of detail, but may regard the verse [see below] as being to the general duties and behaviour of women, as not belonging to the category of οἱ προσευχόμενοι ἐν παντὶ τόπῳ) adorn themselves (there is no need, as Chrys. and most Commentators, to supply προσεύχεσθαι to complete the sense: indeed if I have apprehended the passage rightly, it would be altogether irrelevant. The ὡσαύτως serving merely as a copula [see above], the προσεύχεσθαι belonging solely and emphatically to τοὺς ἄνδρας, — the question, 'what then are women to do?' is answered by insisting on modesty of appearance and the ornament of good works, as contrasted [ver. 12] with the man's part. The public assemblies are doubtless, in ver. 12, still before the Apostle's mind, but in a very slight degree. It is the general duties of women, rather than any single point in reference to their conduct in public worship, to which he is calling attention: though the subject of public worship led to his thus speaking, and has not altogether disappeared from his thoughts. According to this view, the construction proceeds direct with the infinitive κοσμεῖν, without any supposition of an anacoluthon, as there must be on the other hypothesis) in orderly (ref.) apparel (cf. Tit. ii. 3, note: "in seemly guise," Ellic. καταστολή, originally 'arrangement,' 'putting in order,' followed in its usage that of its verb καταστέλλω. We have in Eur. Bacch. 891, αὐτὸν [τὸν πλόκαμον] πάλιν καταστελοῦμεν,—'we will re-arrange the dishevelled lock:' then Aristoph. Thesm. 256, τί νῦν καστάστελόν με τὰ περὶ τὰ σκέλη—clothe, dress me. Thus in Plut. Pericl. 5, we read of Anaxagoras, that his καταστολὴ περιβολῆς, 'arrangement of dress,' was πρὸς οὐδὲν ἐκταραττομένη πάθος ἐν τῷ λέγειν. Then in Jos. B. J. ii. 8. 4, of the Essenes, that their καταστολὴ καὶ σχῆμα σώματος was ὅμοιον τοῖς μετὰ φόβου παιδαγωγουμένοις παισίν, which he proceeds to explain by saying οὔτε δὲ ἐσθῆτας, οὔτε ὑποδήματα ἀμείβουσι, πρὶν ἢ διαρραγῆναι, κ.τ.λ. So that we must take it as meaning 'the apparel,' the whole investiture of the person. This he proceeds presently to break up into detail, forbidding πλέγματα, χρυσόν, μαργαρίτας, ἱματισμὸν πολυτελῆ, all which are parts of the καταστολή. This view of the meaning of the word requires ἐν καταστολῇ κοσμίῳ to belong to κοσμεῖν, and then to be taken up by the ἐν following, an arrangement, as it seems to me, also required by the natural construction of the sentence itself) with shamefastness (not, as modern reprints of the E. V., 'shame*faced*ness,' which is a mere unmeaning corruption by the printers of a very expressive and beautiful word: see Trench, N. T. Synonyms, § xx.) and self-restraint (I adopt Conybeare's word as, though not wholly satisfactory, bringing out the leading idea of σωφροσύνη better than any other. Its fault is, that it is a word too indicative of effort, as if the unchaste desires were continually breaking bounds, and as continually held in check: whereas in the σώφρων, the safe-and-sound-minded, no such continual struggle has place, but the better nature is established in its rule. Trench [ubi supra] has dealt with the two words, setting aside the insufficient distinction of Xenophon, Cyr. viii. 1. 31,—where he says of Cyrus, διήρει δὲ αἰδῶ καὶ σωφροσύνην τῇδε, ὡς τοὺς μὲν αἰδουμένους τὰ ἐν τῷ φανερῷ αἰσχρὰ φεύγοντας, τοὺς δὲ σώφρονας καὶ τὰ ἐν τῷ ἀφανεῖ. "If," Trench concludes, "αἰδώς is the 'shamefastness,' or tendency which shrinks from overpassing the limits of womanly reserve and modesty, as well as from the dishonour which would justly attach thereto, σωφροσύνη is that habitual inner self-government, with its constant rein on all the passions and desires, which would hinder the temptation to this from arising, or at all events from arising in such strength as should overbear the checks and hindrances which αἰδώς opposed to it." Ellic. gives for it, "sober-mindedness," and explains it, "the well-balanced state of mind, arising from habitual self-restraint." See his notes, here, and in his translation), not in plaits (of hair: cf. 1 Pet. iii. 3, ἐμπλοκὴ τριχῶν, and see Ellicott's note) and gold (καὶ περιθέσεως χρυσίων, 1 Pet. l. c., perhaps, from the καί, the gold is supposed to be twined among, or worn with, the plaited hair. See Rev. xvii. 4), or pearls, or costly raiment (= ἐνδύσεως ἱματίων, 1 Pet. l. c.),—but, which is becoming for women professing (ἐπαγγέλλεσθαι is ordinarily in N. T. 'to promise,' see reff. But the meaning 'to profess,' 'præ se ferre,' is found in the classics, e. g. Xen. Mem. i. 2. 7, ἐθαύμαζε δέ, εἴ τις ἀρετὴν ἐπαγγελλόμενος ἀργύριον πράττοιτο: cf. Palm and Rost's Lex., and the numerous examples in Wetst.) godliness (θεοσέβεια is found in Xen. An. ii. 6. 26, and Plato, Epinomis, pp. 985 d, 989 e. The adjective θεοσεβής is common enough),—by means of good works (not ἐν again, because the adornment lies in a different sphere and cannot be so expressed. The adorning which results from good works is brought about by [διά] their practice, not displayed by appearing to be invested with them [ἐν]. Huther's construction, after Thdrt., Œc., Luth., Calv., and Mack and Matthies,—ἐπαγγελλ. θεοσέβειαν δι' ἔργων ἀγαθῶν,—is on all grounds objectionable: —1) the understanding δ as ἐν τούτῳ δ or καθ' δ, which of itself might pass, introduces great harshness into the sentence: —2) the junction of ἐπαγγελλομέναις δι' is worse than that of κοσμεῖν δι', to which he objects:—3) the arrangement of the words is against it, which would thus rather be γυναιξὶν δι' ἔργων ἀγαθῶν θεοσέβειαν ἐπαγγελλομέναις:—4) he does not see that his objection, that the adornment of women has been already specified by ἐν καταστολῇ κ.τ.λ., and therefore need not be again specified by δι' ἔργων ἀγ., applies just as much to his own rendering, taking δ for καθ' δ or ἐν τούτῳ δ).

11.] Let a woman learn (in the congregation, and every where: see below) in silence in all (possible) subjection (the thought of the public assemblies has evidently given rise to this precept [see 1 Cor. xiv. 34]; but he carries it further than can be applied to them in the next verse): but (the contrast is to a suppressed hypothesis of a claim to do that which is forbidden: cf. a similar δέ, 1 Cor. xi. 16) to a woman I permit not to teach (in the church [primarily], or, as the context shews, any where else), nor to lord it over (αὐθέντης μηδέποτε χρήσῃ ἐπὶ τοῦ δεσπότου, ὡς οἱ περὶ τὰ δικαστήρια ῥήτορες, ἀλλ' ἐπὶ τοῦ αὐτόχειρος φονέως, Phryn. But Euripides thus uses it, Suppl. 442: καὶ μὴν ὅπου γε δῆμος αὐθέντης χθονός, ὑπεύθυνοι δ' ἀστοῖς ἧδεται ναυλίαις. The fact is that the word itself is originally a 'vox media,' signifying merely 'one who with his own hand' .... and the context fills up the rest, αὐθέντης φόνου, or the like. And in course of time, the meaning of 'autocrat' prevailing, the word itself and its derivatives henceforth took this course, and αὐθεντέω, -ία, -ημα, all of later growth, bore this reference only. Later still we have αὐθεντικός, from first authority ['id enim αὐθεντικῶς, nuntiabatur,' Cic. ad Att. x. 9]. It seems quite a mistake to suppose that αὐθέντης arrived at its meaning of a despot by passing through that of a murderer) the man, but (supply ["βούλομαι, not κελεύω, which St. Paul does not use." Ellic.] 'I command her:' the construction in 1 Cor. xiv. 34 is the same) to be in silence. 13.] Reason of this precept, in the original order of creation. For Adam was first (not of all men, which is not here under consideration, and would stultify the subsequent clause:—but first in comparison Gen., from which the word ἐπλάσθη seems to be taken: cf. 1 Cor. xi. 8, 9, and indeed that whole passage, which throws light on this), then Eve. 14.] Second reason—as the woman was last in being, so she was first in sin—indeed the only victim of the Tempter's deceit. And Adam was not deceived (not to be weakened, as Thdrt.: τὸ οὐκ ἠπατήθη, ἀντὶ τοῦ, οὐ πρῶτος, εἴρηκεν: nor, as Matthies, must we supply ὑπὸ τοῦ ὄφεως: nor, with De W., Wiesinger, al., must we press the fact that the woman only was misled by the senses. Bengel and Huther seem to me [but cf. Ellicott] to have apprehended the right reference: 'serpens mulierem decepit, mulier virum non decepit, sed ei persuasit.' As Huther observes, the ἠπάτησεν, in the original narrative, is used of the woman only. We read of no communication between the serpent and the man. The "subtlest beast of all the field" knew his course better: she listened to the lower solicitation of sense and expediency: he to the higher one of conjugal love): but the woman (not now Eve, but generic, as the next clause shews: for Eve could not be the subject to σωθήσεται) having been seduced BY DECEIT (stronger than ἀπατηθεῖσα, as exoro than oro: implying the full success of the ἀπάτη) has become involved (the thought is—the present state of transgression in which the woman [and the man too: but that is not treated here] by sin is constituted, arose [which was not so in the man] from her originally having been seduced by deceit) in transgression (here as always, breach of a positive command: cf. Rom. iv. 15).

15.] But (contrast to this her great and original defect) she (general) shall be saved through (brought safely through, but in the higher, which is with St. Paul the only sense of σώζω, see below) her child-bearing (in order to understand the fulness of the meaning of σωθήσεται here, we must bear in mind the history itself, to which is the constant allusion. The curse on the woman for her παράβασις was, ἐν λύπαις τέξῃ τέκνα [Gen. iii. 16]. Her τεκνογονία is that in which the curse finds its operation. What then is here promised her? Not only exemption from that curse in its worst and heaviest effects: not merely that she shall safely bear children: but the Apostle uses the word σωθήσεται purposely for its higher meaning, and the construction of the sentence is precisely as ref. 1 Cor.—αὐτὸς δὲ σωθήσεται, οὕτως δὲ ὡς διὰ πυρός. Just as that man should be saved through, as passing through, fire which is his trial, his hindrance in his way, in spite of which he escapes,—so she shall be saved, through, as passing through, her child-bearing, which is her trial, her curse, her [not means of salvation, but] hindrance in the way of it. The other renderings which have been given seem to me both irrelevant and ungrammatical. Chrys., Thl., al., for instance, would press τεκνογονία to mean the Christian education of children: Heinrichs, strangely enough, holds that her τεκνογ. is the punishment of her sin, and that being undergone, she shall be saved διὰ τῆς τ., i. e. by having paid it. Conyb. gives it 'women will be saved by the bearing of children,' i. e., as he explains it in his note, "are to be kept in the path of safety (?) by the performance of the peculiar functions which God has assigned to their sex." Some, in their anxiety to give διά the instrumental meaning, would understand διὰ τῆς τεκνογ. 'by means of the Child-bearing,' i. e. 'the Incarnation:' a rendering which needs no refutation. I see that Ellicott maintains this latter interpretation: still I find no reason to qualify what I have above written. 1 Cor. iii. 15 seems to me so complete a key of Pauline usage of σώζεσθαι διά, that I cannot abandon the path opened by it, till far stronger reason has been shewn than he here alleges. In his second edition he has not in any way strengthened his argument, nor has he taken any notice of the Pauline usage which I allege. After all, it is mainly a question of exegetical tact: and I own I am surprised that any scholar can believe it possible that St. Paul can have expressed the Incarnation by the bare word ἡ τεκνογονία. He himself in this same Epistle, v. 14, uses the cognate verb, of the ordinary bearing of children: and these are the only places where the compound occurs in the N. T.), if they (generic plural as before singular) have remained (shall be found in that day to have remained—a further proof of the higher meaning of σωθήσεται) in faith and love and holiness (see reff., where the word is used in the same reference, of holy chastity) with self-restraint (see above on ver. 9).

CH. III. 1—13.] Precepts respecting overseers (presbyters) [1—7], and deacons [8—13]. 1.] Faithful is the saying (see on ch. i. 15, from the analogy of which it appears that the words are to be referred to what follows, not, as Chrys., Thl., Erasm., al., to what has preceded): if any man seeks (it does not seem that he uses ὀρέγεται with any reference to an ambitious seeking, as De W. thinks: in Heb. xi. 16 the word is a 'vox media,' and even in ch. vi. 10, the blame rests, not on ὀρεγόμενοι, but on the thing sought: and in Polyb. ix. 20. 5, the word is used as one merely of passage, in giving directions respecting the office sought: κελεύοντες ἀστρολογεῖν κ. γεωμετρεῖν τοὺς ὀρεγομένους αὐτῆς [τῆς στρατηγίας]. So that De W.'s inference respecting ambition for the episcopate betraying the late age of the Epistle, falls to the ground) (the) overseership (or, bishopric; office of an ἐπίσκοπος; but the ἐπίσκοποι of the N. T. have officially nothing in common with our Bishops. See notes on Acts xx. 17, 28. The identity of the ἐπίσκοπος and πρεσβύτερος in apostolic times is evident from Tit. i. 5—7: see also note on Phil. i. 1, the article Bischof in Herzog's Real-Encyclopädie, and Ellic.'s note here), he desires a good work (not 'a good thing:' but a good employment: see 1 Thess. v. 13: 2 Tim. iv. 5: one of the καλὰ ἔργα so often spoken of [reff.]). It behoves then (οὖν is best regarded as taking up καλὸν ἔργον, and substantiating that assertion: "bonum negotium bonis committendum," Bengel) an (τόν generic, singular of τοὺς ἐπισκόπους) overseer to be blameless (Thucyd. v. 17, Πλεῖστοσιν δὲ . . . . . νομίζων . . . κἂν αὐτὸς τοῖς ἐχθροῖς ἀνεπίληπτος εἶναι . . . . . , where the Schol. has, μὴ ἂν αὐτὸς παρέξων κατηγορίας ἀφορμήν. Thdrt. draws an important distinction: μηδεμίαν προφασιν μέμψεως παρέχειν δικαίαν· τὸ γὰρ ἀνεπίληπτον, οὐ τὸ ἀσυκοφάντητον λέγει· ἐπεὶ καὶ αὐτὸς ἀπόστολος παντοδαπὰς συκοφαντίας ὑπέμεινεν), husband of one wife (two great varieties of interpretation of these words have prevailed, among those who agree to take them as restrictive, not injunctive, which the spirit of the passage and the insertion of μιᾶς surely alike forbid. They have been supposed to prohibit either 1) simultaneous polygamy, or 2) successive polygamy. 1) has somewhat to be said for it. The custom of polygamy was then prevalent among the Jews [see Just. Mart. Tryph. 134, p. 226, —διδασκάλοις ὑμῶν οἵτινες καὶ μέχρι νῦν καὶ τέσσαρας κ. πέντε ἔχειν ὑμᾶς γυναῖκας ἕκαστον συγχωροῦσι: and Jos. Antt. vii. 2 (so cited in Suicer and Huther, but the reference is wrong), πάτριον ἐν ταύτῳ πλείοσιν ἡμῖν συνοικεῖν], and might easily find its way into the Christian community. And such, it is argued, was the Apostle's reference, not to second marriages, which he himself commands ch. v. 14, and allows in several other places, e. g. Rom. vii. 2, 3: 1 Cor. vii. 39. But the objection to taking this meaning is, that the Apostle would hardly have specified that as a requisite for the episcopate or presbyterate, which we know to have been fulfilled by all Christians whatever: no instance being adduced of polygamy being practised in the Christian church, and no exhortations to abstain from it. As to St. Paul's command and permissions, see below. Still, we must not lose sight of the circumstance that the earlier Commentators were unanimous for this view. Chrys. is the only one who proposes an alternative:—τὴν ἀμετρίαν κωλύει, ἐπειδὴ ἐπὶ τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐξῆν καὶ δευτέροις ὁμιλεῖν γάμοις, κ. δύο ἔχειν κατὰ ταὐτὸν γυναῖκας. Thdrt.: *τὸ δὲ μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἄνδρα, εἴ μοι δοκοῦσιν εἰρηκέναι τινές. πάλαι γὰρ εἰάθεισαν καὶ Ἕλληνες κ. So Hermas Pastor, ii. 4. 4, p. 921 f., 'Domine, si vir vel mulier alicujus discesserit, et nupserit aliquis eorum, numquid peccat?' 'Qui nubit, non peccat: sed si per se manserit, magnum sibi conquirit honorem apud Dominum:' and Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 12 [81], p. 548 P., ὁ ἀπόστολος [1 Cor. vii. 39, 40] δι' ἀκρασίαν κ. πύρωσιν κατὰ συγγνώμην δευτέρου μεταδίδωσι γάμου, ἐπεὶ κ. οὗτος οὐχ ἁμαρτάνει μὲν κατὰ διαθήκην, οὐ γὰρ κεκώλυται πρὸς τοῦ νόμου, οὐ πληροῖ δὲ τῆς κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον πολιτείας τὴν κατ' ἐπίτασιν τελειότητα. And so in Suicer, i. p. 892 f., Chrys., Greg. Naz. [τὸ πρῶτον (συνοικέσιον) νόμος, τὸ δεύτερον συγχώρησις, τὸ τρίτον παρανομία. τὸ δὲ ὑπὲρ τοῦτο, χοιρώδης. Orat. xxxvii. 8, p. 650],—Epiphanius [δευτερόγαμον οὐκ ἔξεστι δέχεσθαι ἐν αὐτῇ (τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ) εἰς ἱερωσύνην. Doct. compend. de fide, p. 1104], Orig.,—the Apostolical Canon xvii. [ὁ δυσὶ γάμοις συμπλακεὶς μετὰ τὸ βάπτισμα, ἢ παλλακὴν κτησάμενος, οὐ δύναται εἶναι ἐπίσκοπος, ἢ πρεσβύτερος, ἢ διάκονος, ἢ ὅλως τοῦ καταλόγου τοῦ ἱερατικοῦ], &c. Huther cites from Athenagoras the expression εὐπρεπὴς μοιχεία applied to second marriage. With regard to the Apostle's own command and permissions of this state [see above], they do not come into account here, because they are confessedly (and expressly so in ch. v. 14) for those whom it was not contemplated to admit into ecclesiastical office. 3) There have been some divergent lines of interpretation, but they have not found many advocates. Some [e.g. Wegscheider] deny altogether the formal reference to 1) or 2), and understand the expression only of a chaste life of fidelity to the marriage vow: "that neither polygamy, nor concubinage, nor any offensive deuterogamy, should be able to be alleged against such a person." But surely this is very vague, for the precise words μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἀνήρ. Bretschneider maintains that μιᾶς is here the indefinite article, and that the Apostle means, an ἐπίσκοπος should be the husband of a wife. This hardly needs serious refutation. Winer however has treated it, edn. 6, § 18. 9 note, shewing that by no possibility can the indefinite εἷς stand where it would as here cause ambiguity, only where unity is taken for granted. Worse still is the Romanist evasion, which understands the μία γυνή of the Church. The view then which must I think be adopted, especially in presence of ch. v. 9 [where see note] is, that to candidates for the episcopate [presbytery] St. Paul forbids second marriage. He requires of them pre-eminent chastity, and abstinence from a licence which is allowed to other Christians. How far such a prohibition is to be considered binding on us, now that the Christian life has entered into another and totally different phase, is of course an open question for the present Christian church at any time to deal with. It must be as matter of course understood that regulations, in all lawful things, depend, even when made by an Apostle, on circumstances: and the superstitious observance of the letter in such cases is often pregnant with mischief to the people and cause of Christ), sober (probably in the more extended sense of the word ['vigilantem animo,' Beng: διεγηγερμένον, καὶ προσκοπεῖν τὸ πρακτέον δυνάμενον, Thdrt. τουτέστι

This duty in the early days of the Christian church was one of great importance. Brethren in their travels could not resort to the houses of the heathen, and would be subject to insult in the public deversoria), apt in teaching (τὰ θεῖα πεπαιδευμένον, καὶ παραινεῖν δυνάμενον τὰ προσήκοντα, Thdrt.: so we have τοὺς ἱππικοὺς βουλομένους γενέσθαι, Xen. All might teach, to whom the Spirit imparted the gift: but skill in teaching was the especial office of the minister, on whom would fall the ordinary duty of instruction of believers and refutation of gainsayers): 3—7.] (His negative qualities are now specified; the positive ones which occur henceforth arising out of and explaining those negative ones):

3.] not a brawler (properly, 'one in his cups,' 'a man rendered petulant by much wine:' τὸ τοίνυν παρ' οἶνον λυπεῖν τοὺς παρόντας, τοῦτ' ἐγὼ κρίνω παροινίαν, Xen. Sympos. vi. 1. And perhaps the literal meaning should not be lost sight of. At the same time the word and its cognates were often used without reference to wine: see παροινέω, -ία, -ιος, in Palm and Rost's Lex. As πλήκτης answers to πάροινος, it will be best to extend the meaning to signify rather the character, than the mere fact, of παροινία), not a striker (this word also may have a literal and narrower, or a metaphorical and wider sense. In this latter it is taken by Thdrt.: οὐ τὸ ἐπιτιμᾷν εἰς καιρὸν κωλύει· ἀλλὰ τὸ μὴ δεόντως τοῦτο ποιεῖν. But perhaps the coarser literal sense is better, as setting forth more broadly the opposite to the character of a Christian ἐπίσκοπος), but (this contrast springs out of the two last, and is set off by them) forbearing (reasonable and gentle: φέρειν εἰδότα τὰ πρὸς αὐτὸν πλημμελήματα, Thdrt. See note on Phil. iv. 5, and Trench, N. T. Syn. § xliii.; but correct his derivation, as in that note), not quarrelsome (cf. 2 Tim. ii. 24. Conyb.'s 'peaceable' is objectionable, as losing the negative character), not a lover of money ('liberal,' Conyb.: but this is still more objectionable: it is not the positive virtue of liberality but the negative one of abstinence from love of money, which, though it may lead to the other in men who have money, is yet a totally distinct thing. Thdrt.'s explanation, while true, is yet characteristic of an ἐπίσκοπος of later days: οὐκ εἶπεν ἀκτήμονα· σύμμετρα γὰρ νομοθετεῖ· ἀλλὰ μὴ ἐρῶντα χρημάτων. δυνατὸν γὰρ κεκτῆσθαι μέν, οἰκονομεῖν δὲ ταῦτα δεόντως, καὶ μὴ δουλεύειν τούτοις, ἀλλὰ τούτων δεσπόζειν):

4.] (This positive requisite again seems to spring out of the negative ones which have preceded, and especially out of ἀφιλάργυρον. The negatives are again resumed below with μὴ νεόφυτον) presiding well over his own house (ἴδιον, as contrasted with the church of God below, οἶκον, in its wide acceptation, 'household,' including all its members), having children (not 'keeping [or having] his children' [ἔχοντα τὰ τέκνα], as E. V. and Conyb. The emphatic position of τέκνα, besides its anarthrousness, should have prevented this mistake: cf. also Tit. i. 6,—μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἀνὴρ, τέκνα ἔχων πιστὰ, κ.τ.λ.) in subjection (i. e. who are in subjection) with all gravity ('reverent modesty,' see ch. ii. 2. These words are best applied to the children, not to the head of the house, which acceptance of them rather belongs to the rendering impugned above. It is the σεμνότης of the children, the result of his προστῆναι, which is to prove that he knows how to preside over his own house,—not his own σεμνότης in governing them: the matter of fact, that he has children who are in subjection to him in all gravity,—not So Chr. [νεοκατήχητος], Thl. [νεοβάπτιστος.] An objection has been raised to this precept by Schleierm., that it could hardly find place in the apostolic church, where all were νεόφυτοι. Matthies answers, that in Crete this might be so, and therefore such a precept would be out of place in the Epistle to Titus, but the Ephesian church had been many years established. But De W. rejoins to this, that the precepts are perfectly general, not of particular application. The real reply is to be found, partly by narrowing the range of νεόφυτος, partly in assigning a later date to these Epistles than is commonly held. The case here contemplated is that of one very recently converted. To ordain such a person to the ministry would, for the reason here assigned, be most unadvisable. But we cannot imagine that such period need be extended at the most to more than three or four years, in cases of men of full age who became Christians; and surely such a condition might be fulfilled in any of the Pauline churches, supposing this Epistle to bear any thing like the date which I have assigned to it in the Prolegg. ch. vii. § ii.), lest being besotted with pride (from τῦφος, smoke, steam, and hence metaphorically, the pother which a man's pride raises about him so that he cannot see himself or others as they are. Lex.] Hence τυφοῦσθαι, which is used only in this metaphorical sense, to be thus blinded or bewildered with pride or self-conceit. So τετυφωμένος ταῖς εὐτυχίαις, Strabo xv. p. 686,—ἐπὶ πλούτοις τε καὶ ἀρχαῖς, Lucian, Necyom. 12. [as an alternative: "activam significationem non rejicio, fore ut diabolo causam sui accusandi præbeat." He adds, "sed verior Chrysostomi opinio"], Beza [altern.], Huther. It is hardly worth while recounting under this head, the views of those who take τοῦ διαβόλου for a slanderer, inasmuch as ὁ διάβολος never occurs in this sense in the N. T. [on διάβολος, adjective, in this sense, see below, ver. 11]. This is done in both verses 6 and 7, by Luther [Lästerer], Rosenm., Michaelis, Wegsch., Flatt: in verse 6 and not in verse 7, by Erasm., Mosheim, al. In deciding between the above, one question must first be answered: are we obliged to preserve the same character of the genitive in verses 6 and 7? because, if so, we must manifestly take [2]: for [ὀνειδισμὸν κ.] παγίδα τοῦ διαβόλου [see below] cannot bear any other meaning than 'the [reproach and] snare which the devil lays.' This question must be answered, not by any mere consideration of uniformity, but by careful enquiry into the import of the substantive κρῖμα. I conceive we cannot understand it here otherwise than as a condemnatory sentence. The word is a vox media; οὐκ εὔκριτον τὸ κρῖμα, Æsch. Suppl. 392: but the dread here expressed of falling into it necessarily confines it to its adverse sense. This being so, Bengel's remark is noticeable:—"diabolus potest opprobrium inferre, judicium non potest: non enim judicat, sed judicatur." To this Huther answers, that we must not consider the κρῖμα of the devil as necessarily parallel with God's κρῖμα, any more than with man's on his neighbour. "To understand," he continues, "the κρῖμα τοῦ διαβόλου, we must compare Eph. ii. 2, where the devil is called τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ νῦν ἐνεργοῦν ἐν τοῖς υἱοῖς τῆς ἀπειθείας: so that whatever the world does to the reproach [zur Schmach] of Christ's Church, is the doing of the spirit that works in the world, viz. of the devil." But surely this reply is quite inadequate to justify the use of the decisive κρῖμα: and Huther himself has, by suggesting 'reproach,' evaded the real question, and taken refuge in the unquestioned meaning of the next verse. He goes on to say, that only by understanding this of a deed of the Prince of the antichristian world, can we clearly establish a connexion with the following verse, pointed out as it is by δέ. But this is still more objectionable: δὲ καί disjoins the two particulars, and introduces the latter as a separate and additional matter. From the use of the decisive word κρῖμα, I infer that it cannot be an act of the adversary which is here spoken of, but an act in which ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου κέκριται. Then as to uniformity with ver. 7, I should not be disposed to make much account of it. For one who so loved similarity of external phrase, even where different meanings were to be conveyed, as St. Paul, to use the genitives in κρῖμα τοῦ διαβόλου and παγὶς τοῦ διαβόλου in these different meanings, is surely nothing which need cause surprise. τοῦ διαβόλου is common to both: the devil's condemnation, and the devil's snare, are both alike alien from the Christian, in whom, as in his divine Master, the adversary should find nothing, and with whom he should have nothing in common. The κρῖμα τοῦ διαβόλου is in fact but the consummation of that state into which the παγὶς τοῦ διαβόλου is the introduction. I therefore unhesitatingly adopt [1]—the condemnation into which Satan fell through the same blinding effect of pride).

7.] Moreover (δέ, bringing in the contrast of addition; 'more than this,' .... καί, the addition itself of a new particular) he must have a good testimony (reff.) from those without (lit. 'those from without:' the unusual -θεν [reff.] being added as harmonizing with the ἄνω, the testimony coming 'from without'), lest he fall into (a question arises which must be answered before we can render the following words. Does ὀνειδισμὸν [1] stand alone, 'into reproach, and the snare of the devil,' or is it [2] to be joined with παγίδα as belonging to διαβόλου? For [1], which is the view of Thl., Est., Wolf, Heyden., Huther, Wiesinger, al. [and Ellic. doubtfully], it is alleged, that ὀνειδισμὸν is separated from καὶ παγίδα by ἐμπέσῃ. But this alone cannot decide the matter. The Apostle may have intended to write merely εἰς ὀνειδισμὸν ἐμπέσῃ τοῦ διαβόλου. Then in adding καὶ παγίδα, we may well conceive that he would keep εἰς ὀν. ἐμπ. for uniformity with the preceding verse, and also not to throw κ. παγίδα into an unnatural prominence, as would be done by placing it before ἐμπέσῃ. We must then decide on other grounds. Wiesinger, seeing that the ὀνειδισμὸς τοῦ διαβόλου, if these are to be taken together, must come immediately from οἱ ἔξωθεν, objects, that he doubts whether any where the devil is said facere per se that which he facit per alterum. But surely 1 John iii. 8 is a case in point: ὁ ποιῶν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν ἐκ τοῦ διαβόλου ἐστίν, ὅτι ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ὁ διάβολος ἁμαρτάνει. εἰς τοῦτο ἐφανερώθη ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, ἵνα λύσῃ τὰ ἔργα τοῦ διαβόλου, —and indeed Eph. ii. 2, τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ νῦν ἐνεργοῦν ἐν τοῖς υἱοῖς τῆς ἀπειθείας. Huther supports this view by ch. v. 14: but I am unable to see how that verse touches the question: for whether the ὀνειδισμὸς belong to τοῦ διαβ. or not, it clearly must come in either case from οἱ ἔξωθεν. One consideration in favour of this view has not been alleged:—that ἡ παγὶς τοῦ διαβόλου seems, from 2 Tim. ii. 26, to be a familiar phrase with the Apostle, and therefore less likely to be joined with another governing substantive.

For [2], we have Thdrt. [τῶν ἔξωθεν τῶν ἀπίστων λέγει. ὁ γὰρ καὶ παρ' ἐκείνοις πλείστην ἔχων πρὸ τῆς χειροτονίας διαβολήν, ἐπονείδιστος ἔσται, καὶ πολλοῖς ὀνείδεσι περιβαλεῖ τὸ κοινόν, καὶ εἰς τὴν προτέραν ὅτι τάχιστα παλινδρομήσει παρανομίαν, τοῦ διαβόλου πάντα πρὸς τοῦτο μηχανωμένου], al., — Bengel ["diabolus potest antistiti malis testimoniis laboranti plurimum excitare molestiæ, per se et per homines calumniatores"], De W., al. The chief grounds for this view are, [a] grammatical—that the εἰς is not repeated before παγίδα. I am not sure, whether we are right in applying such strict rules to these Pastoral Epistles: but the consideration cannot but have some weight. [b] contextual—that the Apostle would hardly have alleged the mere ἐμπεσεῖν εἰς ὀνειδισμόν as a matter of sufficient importance to be parallel with ἐμπ. εἰς παγίδα τοῦ διαβόλου. This latter, I own, inclines me to adopt [2], but I would not by any means speak strongly in repudiation of the other) the reproach and the snare of the devil (reff. This latter is usually taken as meaning, the danger of relapse [cf. Thdrt. cited above]: so Calv.: "ne infamiæ expositus, perfrictæ frontis esse incipiat, tantoque majore licentia se prostituat ad omnem nequitiam: quod est diaboli plagis se irretire. Quid enim spei restat ubi nullus est peccati pudor?" Grot. gives it a different turn: 'ne contumeliis notatus quærat se ulcisci.' These, and many other references, may well be contained in the expression, and we need not, I think, be at the pains precisely to specify any one direction which the evil would take. Such an one's steps would be shackled—his freedom hampered—his temper irritated—his character lost—and the natural result would be a fall from his place, to the detriment not of himself only, but of the Church of Christ).

8.] The construction continues from the preceding—the δεῖ εἶναι being in the Apostle's mind as governing the accusatives. In like manner (the ὡσαύτως seems introduced by the similarity of character,—not merely to mark an additional particular) the deacons (mentioned as a class, besides here, only Phil. i. 1, where, as here, they follow the ἐπίσκοποι. Phœbe, Rom. xvi. 1, is a διάκονος of the church at Cenchrea. The term or its cognates occur in a vaguer sense, but still indicating a special office, in Rom. xii. 7: 1 Pet. iv. 11. The connexion of the ecclesiastical deacons with the seven appointed in Acts vi. is very doubtful: see Chrysostom's and Œc.'s testimony, distinguishing them, in note there. But that the ecclesiastical order sprung out of similar necessities, and had for its field of work similar objects, can hardly be doubted. See Suicer, διάκονος: Winer, RWB.: Neander, Pfl. u. Leit. i. p. 54 note) (must be) grave, not of double speech (= δίγλωσσος, Prov. xi. 13 [Ellic. adds διχόμυθος, Eurip. greedy of gain (hardly, as E. V., to be doubly rendered,—'greedy of filthy lucre,'—so also Thdrt., ὁ ἐκ πραγμάτων αἰσχρῶν κ. λίαν ἀτόπων κέρδη συλλέγειν ἀνεχόμενος. It would appear from Tit. i. 11, διδάσκοντες ἃ μὴ δεῖ αἰσχροῦ κέρδους χάριν, that all κέρδος is αἰσχρόν which is set before a man as a by-end in his work for God: so likewise in 1 Pet. v. 2,—ἐπισκοποῦντες μὴ . . . . . μηδὲ αἰσχροκερδῶς. . . . . 'nor with a view to gain,' such gain being necessarily base when thus sought. This particular of the deacons' character assumes special importance, if we connect it with the collecting and distributing alms. Cyprian, Ep. 54 [12 ad Corn. Pap. § 1, Migne, Patr. Gr. vol. iii. p. 797], stigmatizes the deacon Felicissimus as 'pecuniæ commissæ sibi fraudator'), holding the mystery of the (or their) faith (that great objective truth which man of himself knows not, but which the Spirit of God reveals to the faithful: cf. That expression makes it probable that τῆς πίστεως is here to be taken subjectively: the, or their, faith: the apprehension which appropriates to them the contents of God's revelation of Christ. That revelation of the Person of Christ, their faith's μυστήριον, they are to hold. See Ellic.'s note) in pure conscience (see reff. and ch. i. 19. On this force of καὶ . . . δέ, see Hartung, i. 182: Ellic., here. There is no connexion in καὶ . . . δέ with the former requirements regarding ἐπίσκοποι) let these (who answer, in their candidateship for the diaconate, to the above character) be put to the proof first (viz. with regard to their blamelessness of life, cf. ἀνέγκλ. ὄντες below: e. g. by testimonials, and publication of their intention to offer themselves: but no formal way is specified, only the reality insisted on), then let them act as deacons (or, minister: but more probably here in the narrower technical sense, as in reff.(?) Not 'be made deacons,' as Conyb.: the word is of their act in the office, not of their reception of it, which is of course understood in the background), if they are (found by the δοκιμή to be) irreproachable. 11.] (The) women in like manner (who are these? Are they (1) women who were to serve as deacons,—deaconesses?—or (2) wives of the deacons?—or (3) wives of the deacons and overseers?—or (4) women in general? I conceive we may dismiss (4) at once, for Chrys.'s reason: τί γὰρ ἐβούλετο μεταξὺ τῶν εἰρημένων παρεμβαλεῖν τι περὶ γυναικῶν;—(3) upheld by Calv., Est., Calov., and Mack, may for the same reason, seeing that he returns to διάκονοι again in ver. 12, be characterized as extremely improbable,—(2) has found many supporters among modern Commentators: Luth., Beza, Beng. [who strangely adds, 'pendet ab habentes ver. 9'], Rosenm., Heinr., Huther, Conyb., al., and E. V. But it has against it (a) the omission of all expressed reference to the deacons, such as might be given by αὐτῶν, or by τάς: (b) the expression of ὡσαύτως, by which the διάκονοι themselves were introduced, and which seems to mark a new ecclesiastical class: (c) the introduction of the injunction respecting the deacons, ἔστωσαν μιᾶς γυναικὸς ἄνδρες, as a new particular, which would hardly be if their wives had been mentioned before: (d) the circumstance, connected with the mention of Phœbe as διάκονος of the church at Cenchrea in Rom. xvi. 1, that unless these are deaconesses, there would be among these injunctions no mention of an important class of persons employed as officers of the church. We come thus to consider (1), that these γυναῖκες are deaconesses,—ministræ, as Pliny calls them in his letter to Trajan [see note on Rom. xvi. 1]. In this view the ancients are, as far as I know, unanimous. Of the moderns, it is held by Grot., Mosh., Mich., De W., Wiesinger, Ellicott. It is alleged against it—(a) that thus the return to the διάκονοι, verse 12, would be harsh, or, as Conyb. "on that view, the verse is most unnaturally interpolated in the midst of the discussion concerning the deacons." But the ready answer to this is found in Chrys.'s view of verse 12, that under διάκονοι, and their household duties, he comprehends in fact both sexes under one: ταῦτα καὶ περὶ γυναικῶν διακόνων ἁρμόττει εἰρῆσθαι: (b) that the existence of deaconesses as an order in the ministry is after all not so clear. To this it might be answered, that even were they nowhere else mentioned, the present passage stands on its own grounds; and if it seemed from the context that such persons were indicated here, we should reason from this to the fact of their existence, not from the absence of other mention to their non-indication here. I decide then for (1): that these women are deaconesses) (must be) grave, not slanderers (corresponds to μὴ διλόγους in the males, being the vice to which the female sex is more addicted. Cf. Eurip. Phœn. 298 ff., φιλόψογον δὲ χρῆμα θηλειῶν ἔφυ, | σμικρᾶς τ' ἀφορμὰς ἦν λάβωσι τῶν λόγων, | πλείους ἐπείσφέρουσιν ἡδονὴ δέ τις | γυναιξὶ, μηδὲν ὑγιὲς ἀλλήλαις λέγειν.

12.] General directions respecting those in the diaconate (of both sexes, the female being included in the male, see Chrys. cited above), with regard to their domestic condition and duties, as above (verses 4, 5) respecting the episcopate. Let the deacons be husbands of one wife (see on this above, ver. 2), ruling well over children (the emphatic position of the anarthrous τέκνα, as above ver. 4, makes it probable that the having children to rule is to be considered as a qualification: see Tit. i. 6, note. Chrys. gives a curious and characteristic reason for the precept: πανταχοῦ τίθησι τὴν τῶν τέκνων προστασίαν, ἵνα μὴ ἀπὸ τούτου οἱ λοιποὶ σκανδαλίζωνται) and their own houses. 13.] The importance of true and faithful service in the diaconate. For those who served well the office of deacon (the aor. participle, not the perf., because the standing-point of the sentence is at first the great day, when their διακονία has passed by. In fact this aor. participle decides between the interpretations: see below) are acquiring (the Apostle having begun by placing himself at the great day of retribution, and consequently used the aor. participle, now shifts, so to speak, the scene, and deals with their present conduct: q. d., 'Those who shall then be found to have served well, &c. . . . . are now, &c.' On περιποιέω and περιποίησις, see notes, Eph. i. 14: 1 Thess. v. 9) for themselves (emphatic—besides the service they are rendering to the church) a good standing-place (viz. at the great day: cf. ch. vi. 19, ἀποθησαυρίζοντας ἑαυτοῖς θεμέλιον καλὸν εἰς τὸ μέλλον, ἵνα ἐπιλάβωνται τῆς ὄντως ζωῆς:—and Dan. xii. 3 [Heb. and E. V.], where however the metaphor is different. The interpretations of βαθμόν, a step, or place to stand on [in LXX, the threshold, or step, before a door: see reff.], have been very various. (1) Ambr., Jer., Pel., Thl., Erasm., Bull, Beza, Corn.-a-Lap., Est., Grot., Lightf., Beng., Wolf, Mosh., Schöttg., Wordsw., al., understand it of a degree of ecclesiastical preferment, scil. from the office of deacon to that of presbyter, and take καλόν for a comparative. Against this is (a) the forcing of καλόν; (b) the improbability that such a rise upwards through the ecclesiastical offices was known in the Apostle's time: (c) the still greater unlikelihood, even if it were known, that he would propose as a motive to a deacon to fulfil his office well, the ambitious desire to rise out of it. (2) Mack, Matth., Olsh., Huther, al., following Calv. and Luther, understand by it a high place of honour in the esteem of the church [see on παῤῥησία below]: "qui probe
